CHAPTER THE FIRST.

MONEY.

THERE was much commotion in the district of Kingshaven when the report circulated that George Methven was dead. It was not so much his death come passed five hundred a year—a degree of prosperity demanding extra diligence in well-doing (that is, increasing the store), and punctual kirk-attendance—stared at each other in blank amazement as they listened to the reports of the fabulous which caused the commotion as the rumours of the enormous wealth he had left behind. Some said he had left half a million; others that a million was more like the thing; others again that the sum amounted to nearly two millions in bonds, shares, and stock of various kinds. It was therefore natural that profound interest should be taken in the man's death: the wonder is that the good folk did not insist upon a public funeral—for was not the late George Methven a millionaire?

The people of Kingshaven, who regarded ten thousand as a handsome fortune, and who considered themselves exceedingly prosperous when their in-wealth acquired by Geordie Methven. The deceased was still mentioned by the inhabitants of his native place as plain "Geordie," sometimes "poor Geordie" Methven.

"I doubt it's not all well come by," observed the provost—a man of position and means. He owned property in the town; and lately—to please his wife, who wished to spite her neighbours—he had braved the jeers of his brethren, and started a brougham (second-hand). But he was a bold man, and having made the innovation, he was resolved to extract from it the greatest amount of credit which could be extracted. So, towards the close of any social gathering, you would hear the provost demanding in a loud voice if his "carriage and lamps" had come. Never before had any magistrate of Kingshaven presumed to any grander vehicle than a dog-cart.

"Geordie was a queer lad," said Todd the miller; "but we're a' deadly and lively, and it must come some day." He was very solemn, but somewhat vague; probably he was the more impressive in consequence.

"He was never married," was the comment of Brunton the farmer, who thought he had solved the problem of Methven's riches. He had been himself twice married,

"Well, well, well!" continued the provost with an air of retrospective patronage, "if I had only known what he was to come to, I might have helped the laddie."

"He seems to have got on pretty well without your help," was the disagreeable rejoinder of the bailie, who was also the oldest doctor of the town.

The provost walked home, thoughtful.

"Who is to be the heir?" inquired his wife, Mrs. Dubbieside; "will it be Dalmahoy?"

"More like to be Miss Wishart, if it's either of them. But there's no saying how it will go, for I hear there's no will, and the property will fall to the nearest friends. I wonder if any of our forebears were connected."

The eyes of Mrs. Dubbieside started on her fat cheeks at the mere possibility of a relationship about which, not long ago, she would have been discreetly silent if it had existed. She was a short, stout Lancashire woman, and she was described by the bailie's wife as "a poor creature who was always ailing and always cooking."

The provost and his wife laid their heads together, and devoted the day to a diligent study of genealogy, ranging as far as fourth and fifth cousins seven times removed. There were other people occupied at that moment in similar exciting speculations.

George Methven was a natural child; his mother, a poor lass, who died soon after his birth: his father, a wild young laird, who never remembered the existence of the boy, and who happened to be married to a wealthy widow on the very day George was born.

The child was left to the care of his maternal grandmother: an honest, hard-working woman, who had too much respect for the "gentry," and too much awe, to make any fuss about the misfortune of her daughter. She belonged to that class of dames who were ready to say, as one had said to a son who had offended his chief, "Come awa and be hanged, Dugald, to please the laird."

Mrs. Methven's system of nursing was singularly simple. She filled a common bottle with milk, warm water, and a little coarse sugar; then she tied a piece of soft rag, in several folds, over the mouth of the bottle, which she placed beside the baby on the floor. Then she went forth to her work in the fields. Perhaps a neighbour wife would step in during the day to see how the bairn was getting on; otherwise he was left to hug his bottle-mother until granny returned home in the evening.

And the child lived! Not only lived, but became so venturesome that soon granny found it necessary to tie him to the leg of the table during her absence. At eighteen months he was firm on his feet; at two years he had to be sent to an infant-school to keep him out of mischief.

The school was a small room in a sort of hut, kept by a half-witted creature called Singgy Brod—"Singgy," a nickname suggested by the man's sing-song intonation of speech. Nobody knew whence Singgy had come; but he had been so long settled in the district that the people accepted him as a permanent institution. Droll, too, that nobody remembered Singgy as anything but what he was when George Methven became his pupil—a little wiry old man, with lank iron-grey hair, and dressed in a long frock-coat, brown with age and diversified with patches. His hut contained a single room; and he took charge of all the children who had to be left unprotected by their natural guardians during working-hours. Singgy's was, in a manner, a feeder to the parish school—at which he was never wearied scoffing. He did manage to instil into his pupils a dim idea that the alphabet by certain magical combinations formed words, and a few of the children acquired the art of making bad pot-hooks. But in winter Singgy was chiefly occupied trying to keep up a fire with very little peat and no coal—down on his knees, alternately puffing at the feeble flame and scolding the urchins; and in summer he generally began his day's work with the announcement—

"We'll have no school to-day, bairns; we'll awa to the burn and fush for minnows."

The infants, delighted to get out to the sunshine, raised a joyful shout, and followed their master. In the course of these excursions he would sometimes obtain a pennyworth of candy from the perambulating rag and bone merchant; with this confection—made of treacle and flour—he would treat all the good boys and girls, and the bad ones equally; for although Singgy threatened much, he seldom carried his punishment beyond the threat. He fared well enough himself, for usually he stepped into the nearest farm-house at dinner-hour, and nobody ever thought of denying him a share of whatever might be on the table. Sometimes he would fix upon the house where he intended to dine, and he would call in the morning to intimate his intention, also to direct the goodwife to "be sure and put ingans in the broth."

All this freedom was rarely resented. Singgy was pitied and laughed at with an under-current of liking; for he always carried in his hand a torn dirty copy of Horace (which he was never known to read); and Latin and the Church being so closely allied in the agricultural mind, the book served as a talisman which secured for the owner food and endurance.

By this man, George Methven was conducted to the threshold of the beautiful world of which reading, writing, and arithmetic are the gates. The boy actually did learn something; he had a power of instinctive acquisition of the meaning and spirit of the lessons which were set before him; and at seven he could read the whole of the first horn-book! There is no telling what he might have been able to do at that age, if he had been brought up by an experienced crammer; as it was, the little he could do was a marvellous achievement under the circumstances. It was fortunate for him that he had succeeded so well; for at this period granny died, and he was left homeless, without a friend able or willing to pay on his account the moderate penny a week which was Singgy's charge for tuition. But the schoolmaster did not desert his pupil; he took care of him for a year—making some profit out of his benevolence, it must be owned; but then benevolence is so much more enjoyable when it is profitable—and after that placed him with a small farmer as a herd.

Geordie was only about eight when he began the real work of life. In return for his services in herding sheep and cattle, he had food, and a corner of the stable-loft to sleep in at night, besides any cast-off clothes which the farmer's wife might give him. At ten he earned a few shillings as wages, in addition to food and lodging. On the hill-side during the day, by the kitchen fire at night, he spelled through every scrap of printed matter which fell in his way, and he exercised his penmanship with the aid of a bit of slate which had been blown off a roof, and a piece of pencil which had been given to him by one of the farmer's children. At twelve he could read tolerably, and write plainly, thanks in some measure to the hours which Singgy spent with him during the bright summer days when study and herding were congenial occupations, and thanks still more to his own dogged resolution to learn.

The boy was not much liked; he was too silent—dour, he was often called. He performed whatever task was set before him, but there was no alacrity in his movements, no sign of pleasure in his work; and although he seldom blundered, he was set down as a very stupid, discontented lad, who would come to no good. He was conscious of the little esteem in which he was held; yet he did not try to win favour. On several occasions he had been abused as an "ill-getted loon," and reminded of his illegitimate existence. He hung his head and made no reply, but the reproach sank deep in his nature. The world seemed to him a very hard place to live in, and the future very blank. He was shy and nervous. There was a pinched, eager look in his face, and never a glint of warmth. The face seemed to reflect the warped condition of the poor child's heart.

One cold day when the east wind, which thereabout was known very appropriately as "the razor," was blowing in keenly from the sea, Geordie had to make a journey across the moors to bring sheep down from the hills into the home fields. With his jacket buttoned close up to his neck, his bonnet pulled over his brows, and his head bent against "the razor," he trudged along the bleak road.

A solitary crow sat on a dilapidated fence, uttering at intervals a melancholy "Caw, caw."

Geordie looked at the bird, and whilst the wind was biting through his jacket, and some thoughts of his own miserable position were passing through his mind, he muttered—

"Caw, caw, you idiot! What for did the Lord gie you wings, if it wasna to flee awa from a country like this?"

The crow, frightened by his approach, rose on the wing, and the boy watched it till it disappeared over the trees of a distant plantation.

Geordie wished he could fly. Then it occurred to him that although he had no wings he had legs, and they might be used to as good purpose.

At fourteen he took leave of Kingshaven. He had a red cotton handkerchief in his hand, full of oatcakes and cheese, and he had a white shilling in his pocket. The cakes and cheese sufficed to satisfy his appetite during the day, and at night he slept under the most convenient haystack. So he tramped to Glasgow, the shilling safe in his pocket when he entered that smoky city. He had also a letter written by the minister of Kingshaven, certifying that he was an honest lad. With the help of this certificate he obtained a situation as message-boy in the office of a small contractor, at a salary of five shillings a week. On that sum he contrived to exist and to save a few pence.

He was painfully methodical in the performance of every act, whether the act affected himself or his master. In three years he was advanced to a stool in the office; at twenty he was regarded as one of the most valuable of the contractor's assistants; at twenty-five he was head clerk; and at thirty he was in Manchester, beginning business in a very humble way on his own account.

He prospered rapidly, marvellously. It seemed as if all the ills of his youth were to be compensated by the unprecedented success of his manhood. Everything he touched seemed to turn to gold.

Amongst Manchester men it became a business to note the speculations in which Methven interested himself, and to leap at them the instant they were assured that he was "in the swim," satisfied that the results must be profitable. His "good luck," the title which people like to give to clear vision and steadfast work, never failed him. The confidence he inspired was unlimited. There was a serious crisis in his affairs, as there is in the affairs of every man. He went to the bank, told the directors plainly his position, and the risk they would run in trusting him. They were a little frightened, but they trusted him. The bank gained a hundred thousand through the faith of its directors, and Methven was established as a millionaire.

The man was cold, silent, dour, as the boy had been. His life was a sort of golden nightmare. There was in it no love, which is the sun of life. He had no friends, no affections. No woman's shadow crossed his thoughts, to interfere with his entire devotion to business success. He gave large sums to charities, he assisted the deserving, he paid his full income-tax—and there his moral responsibilities appeared to end. If he had regrets, desires, or hopes outside his ledger, they were never apparent in word, act, or look.

One grateful act he had performed. He had brought his old dominie from the hut at Kingshaven, and established him in his Manchester palace. He clothed him anew, made him an allowance for pocket-money, which in the dazed eyes of Singgy Brod was unbounded wealth, and the servants were directed to attend to his wishes as they would to their master's.

At first Singgy was dumb with bewilderment. He was humble, grateful, although he sometimes sighed for the freedom of his hut and rags. He was afraid of the servants, and slunk out of their way as quietly as possible. He was afraid to use the beautiful furniture of the grand mansion. Dinner was a daily torture to him. He never dared to ask for "ingans" in the soup now. He ate in fear and trembling lest the butler should be offended, and was always anxious to save trouble by using one plate throughout the meal. The exclamation he had uttered on his arrival was continually rising in his throat, and half choking him as he gulped it down—

"Man, Geordie, it's no possible that it's you!"

It was so like enchantment—a modern version of Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp. Some day it would all disappear just as suddenly as Aladdin's palace, and he would find himself back in the old hut, with the bairns squalling around him. He thought he would prepare for the evil day, and he began to hoard his allowance. But as time passed and the dreaded transformation did not take place, his mood changed. He began to think, "It is to me that Geordie owes all this. If it had not been for me, where would he have been? Certainly not here."

This idea developed gradually into a conviction that whatever Methven possessed, he had a right to share it. Presently, instead of being timid in dealing with the domestics, he took to bullying them. He detected waste everywhere; with nervous anxiety to punish the delinquents, he took to listening at keyholes and spying into drawers and cupboards. He roundly abused the whole staff, from scullion to butler, for robbing him. The servants grumbled at this tyranny; but Methven would not interfere. In consequence there were frequent changes in the household, and soon there was not left one of the domestics who had witnessed the dominie's arrival.

Then the old man felt more at ease, but he did not relax his vigilance, and his parsimonious ways became more marked than before. He had been happy as a vagrant schoolmaster, depending almost upon charity for his dinner; he was miserable with wealth at his command. The gold-fever had entered into the poor creature's blood, and had wrought a greater transformation in his nature than in his circumstances. It was the passion of the miser which possessed him. He had no sense of the power of happiness with which the genius of benevolence can inspire money; it was the gold itself he loved. Formerly he had seldom had the opportunity to rub two coppers together; now his one amusement was to sit with a roll of sovereigns, slowly dropping them from one hand to the other, and listening with pitiful glee to the music they made.

By-and-by he found another occupation in watching with greedy interest Methven's movements and progress. He began to consider who were Methven's relations; to speculate upon the possibility that all the great fortune of his benefactor might descend to himself. The possibility grew into probability, and then into assurance that nobody else could be or should be Methven's heir. He became jealous of every creature who approached him, hunted them away, or with transparent cunning warned his pupil that they had designs upon him. The last stage of his mania was soon reached; without the slightest regard to the difference between them in years, the old man waited for the comparatively young man's death.

One day Singgy was thrown into a frenzy, upon learning that George Methven's father—the Laird, now a ruined man—was with his son. He revived when he saw the Laird go away with head bowed, humbled and evidently disappointed. All his efforts to learn the result of this visit failed, and he never quite recovered from the effects of the fright it had given him. He took ill—died—railing at his benefactor, wildly accusing Methven of having cheated him, robbed him, and poisoned him. It docs, in certain moods, appear unkind of other people to outlive us.

Methven buried his old teacher quietly, erecting a plain marble slab to his memory, inscribed with nothing more than his name and date of death. He never again tried to make a friend. Friendship and love seemed denied to him, more decidedly now that he was rich than when he had been a poor laddie, herding sheep on the hill-side, striving to acquire knowledge and to attain the something which he had missed, notwithstanding his marvellous success.

"But work cures everything," was his constant cry; "regrets, the loss of hope, shame, all yield to work."

So he worked harder than ever, and fortune still favoured all his efforts. In his office, in his house, he was always at work. He sat late in his study; he was there early in the morning; and one morning he was found seated at the writing table, pen in hand, the lamp still burning, although the sun was up, his eyes fixed upon a blank sheet of paper. He was dead: the cause—paralysis.

There was no will; and that circumstance astounded every one who had known the methodical habits of the man. One feasible explanation was suggested by the solicitors who had transacted much business for the deceased: that it had been Mr. Methven's intention to distribute his wealth whilst living, and thus he had omitted to prepare a will. Whether that was the case or not, here was a great fortune going a-begging for an heir.

CHAPTER THE SECOND. THE FISHER-FOLK.

THE cottage of Dan Thorston stood on the high point known as the Norlan' Head, overlooking a little bay, round which the huge black and brown rocks formed a rugged horse-shoe. A few steps from the door of the cottage, was the opening of a perilous footpath which wound round the rocky walls of the bay, down to the pale yellow sand where lay Dan's boat, and where, in a sheltered corner, he had a tar-painted hut for his oars and fishing tackle. The cottage was like two buildings placed lengthwise together, the one being smaller than the other. The walls were of unhewn stone, whitewashed; the roof, thatch—in colour, a piebald of brown and green—and the two big squat chimneys were carefully bound with straw-rope. It was a weather-beaten building, for it was exposed to every wind that blew. That was why Dan made it his home.

Wind and sea were his comrades; he loved them; they spoke to him—he understood them, and he was happiest when in closest communion with them. There was something of the old Viking in his heart, and much of the Norse blood in his veins.

When any one spoke of the dangers of stormy seas, he laughed in wonder. He seemed to have no sense of danger; and in this respect his daughter, Christina, or Teenie as she was always called, resembled him.

"It was just frightsome to see her," was the opinion of the wives of Rowanden—women who were not cowards—as she clambered over the rocks; or when, in the wildest weather, she stood on the Norlan' Head, gazing at the storm, and apparently taking delight in the furious strife of the elements. There was something "uncanny" about the bairn, was the unanimous verdict.

Thorston and his daughter were much respected, but in many minds the respect was dashed with a degree of fear. "Master" or "Skipper" Dan, as he was called, on account of a share he had in a small whaling vessel, was supposed to be endowed with a special gift for forecasting the weather. At early morning his movements were eagerly observed. If when he looked out he thrust his hands into his pockets, as if satisfied with the appearance of affairs, there was a general race for the boats and a struggle who should be out first. But if Dan raised his hand to his brow, as if to concentrate his vision upon some object far out at sea, every man turned into his cot again with the growl, "There will be nae fish the-day."

Dan had not sought this singular reputation; but having formed it, he was proud of it—sometimes, even, he would catch himself stooping to some little trick to heighten the fishers' faith in him, and he would feel ashamed of himself. When away upon a whaling expedition, it gratified him to think that he would be missed at Rowanden; that he would be joyfully welcomed home; and that, during his absence, Teenie would be guarded and cared for as if she were queen of the land.

Although the village of Rowanden was near neighbour to the town of Kingshaven, and had many friendly transactions with it, the two communities were quite distinct. The first was entirely composed of fisher-folk; the second contained the usual mixed population which gathers around flax-mills, ship-building yards, fish-curing establishments and agricultural markets. The first stuck fast to its old ways and old superstitions; the second was eager to be in advance of the time, and was never done shouting "Progress," as if the mere word were a charm by which miracles could be wrought. The fishers looked on stolidly, and would not believe in the new charm. The nuisance inspector was, in their eyes, himself the nuisance. Folk had lived and died comfortably for hundreds of years before there had been any ado about drainage and atmosphere, and they could not see why they should not be permitted to go on living and dying in their own way as their fathers had done.

The village, from a distance, looked like an irregular pile of whitewashed walls diversified by sheets of black, red, and dark grey, where tar-coated huts, red-tiles, or thatch prevailed. Closer inspection showed that the village and its belongings formed three terraces, one rising above the other. First there was the shore, on which were groups of boats, tall stakes overhung with nets like huge cobwebs, black huts for housing oars, cords, floats, baskets, and other fishing-gear; in the background, a dark wall of rock, in which a steep flight of steps had been cut, leading up to the shelf or terrace above. Here were piles of nets, dried, mended, and ready for use; and upon them lounged men and boys, in rough blue trousers and jackets, smoking, gossiping, and repairing other nets. The women, stout-limbed and healthful, in big white caps, short grey or red-striped petticoats, thick blue or grey stockings, and heavy boots, were busy at large tubs cleaving and salting fish, or preparing bait. On the walls were rows of haddocks drying; heaps of refuse dotted the sides of the roadway, and the fine fishy atmosphere could be tasted. The third row of houses was approached by a steep pathway; and behind this upper row were patches of vegetable gardens, then rocks and fields.

On the top of the hill stood a white house—the manse; on the gable facing the village, the minister had placed a large barometer for the benefit of the fishers. During a storm which continued for several days, the women marched up to the manse and prayed the minister to set the weather-guide to “fair.” He endeavoured to explain the nature of the instrument; but the women were not satisfied. They believed in Skipper Dan’s weather-wisdom—they could not believe in this strange machine; so they took stones and smashed it. Soon after, the weather changed for the better, and old Tibbie Gow, who had been a ringleader in the outrage on the barometer, exclaimed triumphantly—

But foul weather came again, notwithstanding; wives were widowed and children left fatherless, just as before. Tibbie Gow, however, firmly believed that the storms might have been subdued if she could have only offered to each the sacrifice of a barometer.

There was another ado in the village when the railway was planned and made. The first intimation of the appearance of a train was given by Willie Stark—a man in years, but a child in mind. He had been at Kingshaven one winter evening, and on his way home saw a train. He burst into his mother’s cottage, crying in much wonder—

“Eh, mither, mither! what do you think I saw but the smiddy running awa with a row of houses!”

Another report was made by David Finnie, an old man, who, expressly to see this new monster called a train, walked over to the hill through which a tunnel had been made. He took his stand on the height and observed the animal approaching.

They were slow to appreciate modern improvements, but they were an honest, sturdy race. Simple in heart, and in many respects commonplace enough in nature, their coarseness was leavened by their kindness, and by a certain unconscious humour in their ways and sayings. Rugged in form and speech as their own rocky coast, they were capable of the tenderest sympathy for the suffering, and of much self-sacrifice to help a neighbour in peril or misfortune. Every bay, every cavern along the coast had its name and legend; every one of the rocky islets, which rose like strange monsters from the sea, dripping and flashing their watery diamonds in the sunlight, was a monument of some sad loss or of some brave deed of rescue. There was the black-looking rock near the bar, ominously named “the Wrecker,” on account of the many disasters for which it was accountable. One of the latest incidents which had justified its evil repute was the destruction of a cobble from a northern fishing station.

It was midday, and the sea was in one of its angry moods. There were three men and a boy in the cobble; they attempted to cross the bar, but the boat struck the rock and capsized. Men, women, and children hastened down to the beach, and six stalwart fellows put off to the rescue. The boy was seen clinging to the keel of the upturned boat, and his piteous cries were heard by those on shore. A great wave was rolling towards him; it would break above him and destroy him. The people held their breath as they watched the race between the destroyer and the rescue. A woman, at whose breast clung a frightened infant, whilst her eyes were fixed upon the boy in such sore need out yonder, gave voice to the prayer of all who stood by—

The boy and one of the men were saved.

This was the kind of legend which formed part of the fisher-folk’s lives, and, in their eyes, endowed rocks and sea and wind with a spiritual significance. They had a plain inatter-of-fact way of speaking about things spiritual as well as temporal. Providence was a real presence to them; He walked amongst them, noted their doings, and promptly punished the sinners. They spoke of Him with a familiarity which would have startled a stranger. They carried this matter-of-fact spirit even to their tombstones, on one of which appeared this droll epitaph :—

"Here lies poor Susan Gray;
She would if she could, but she could not stay.
She had two bad legs and a very bad cough,
But it was the two bad legs that carried her off"

It was written in all seriousness. The conversation of the men was mostly occupied with questions as to the state of the fishing, accidents to the stakes and to comrades, quarrels with the water-babies in close-time and out of it. Sick men and plasters, with an occasional diversion about the price of fish and provisions, engaged the tongues of the elder women. Rheumatism was an enemy they had frequent struggles with; and they encountered him with vigorous measures.

"Sandy's just that bad he canna move hand or foot," said Jean Watt to a cronie; "but he's had mustard and vinegar on at the foot o' the shoulder-blades, and a batter as big as your twa hands, and I canna tell you how muckle salts he's taken, so I'm thinking he'll be some better the-morn. What are you paying for tatties now?"

Teenie Thorston grew up amongst these fisher-folk, sharing in their superstitions, listening to their eerie stories, to their merry or sad ballads—one of themselves apparently, and yet curiously unlike them. "Uncanny," said all; "a bairn of the storm," said some; "a sea-kelpie," said old David Finnie, grinning at his own conceit.

"Eh, but she's bonnie," sigher, the youths who looked at her, yearning, and dare not speak.

END OF CHAPTER THE SECOND

LYDFORD BRIDGE.

HERE is nothing more curious than the way in which different natural phenomena affect different people. To one a broad expanse of ocean is the most striking object in creation; another, who sees nothing but ennui in the dreary waste of waters, will wander for hours, rapt in admiration, on the shores of some inland lake, which mirrors the mountains that surround it. There are men, again, who never understand what it means to take pleasure in scenery until they find themselves amongst frowning precipices and glaciers; and there are also people who turn with a sort of horror from such barren scenes, to gaze with keen delight on a country flat as Holland, when the setting sun, mellowed by rising exhalations, invests the pollards, and the windmills, and the cows with a Cuyper-like glory.

Others, again, are quite cold until they find themselves watching the light shimmering through the trees of a thick forest. The desert, or the boundless prairie, strikes some imaginations most forcibly, while I know a man who esteemed all taste for the picturesque to be romantic foolery until he visited a large waterfall, the continual rush and roar of which entranced him in a sort of pleasurable awe.

The happiest are those who can derive an equal amount of satisfaction from all aspects of nature.

One great element in the pleasure to be derived from scenery is the Unexpected. When you turn a corner and come upon a fine view suddenly, without having been put up to it by grandiloquent guide-book or fussy cicerone, you appreciate it infinitely more than when you approach it gradually—as from the sea, for example.

That is the reason why we thought so much of Lydford Bridge, I suppose. Lydford Bridge is in Devonshire, near Tavistock; and there is a railway station close by, so it is very comestable. It is always raining there, I believe, but people who mind rain had better not visit Devonshire, Westmoreland, the Highlands of Scotland, or Ireland at all.

When the Autumn Manœuvres came off on Dartmoor, I thought some correspondent must get hold of Lydford Bridge, but I did not see any account of it in the special letters, though of course there may have been; for, quidnunc as I am, I do not profess to read every column of every daily journal; but at any rate it was not made the prominent feature which I expect it would have been, had the footsteps of sham-war chroniclers happened to turn in that direction.

You quit the train, arrange your waterproofs so as not to leave an exposed spot at the neck or the knees (according to your sex), and stroll along a road.

If you have been led to expect a view you are disappointed; the country is rather tame, for that part of the world. On one side moorland, and a tor; on the other meadows, woods, undulating hills: pretty enough for Surrey, but not up to the mark of Devonshire and Cornwall.

There is a tempting variety of ferns on either side of the road, if you are a collector, and have got your trowel with you; and they require a deal of careful digging to get at. So your progress is slow, and as the prospect ahead is unpromising, you may possibly strike off to the more tempting-looking valley where the waterfall is, and pass the day in wandering about that locality.

I have known people who went to see Lydford Bridge from train to train, and returned without doing it. I believe we were within an ace of making the same mistake. We did go off and do the water-fall, and potter about the pretty valley it tumbled into.

A very curious little cascade it was, and as the weather miraculously cleared up for an hour, our artist water-coloured it. We tried to light a fire in a cave, and if the wood had done anything but smoulder and smoke us out, I believe we should have stopped there. As it was we returned, and made up our minds to go on to Lydford, principally, I do believe, to verify the watchmaker's comic epitaph in the churchyard there; for we were rather disgusted at having come by rail to a place not nearly so pretty as the immediate neighbourhood of Tavistock itself.

We were plodding tediously along the road, and thinking it a long one, when we came suddenly upon a crevasse. There is nothing wild, rocky, volcanic, earthquaky, about the neighbourhood of the place to account for the crack; but there it is, frightfully deep, the sides two clean cuts, so narrow that it is spanned by a single arch, over which the high-road runs. Some poet has sung of Nature smiling; perhaps it was here that the grin came off, and she cracked her lip in the operation. She durst not risk it again apparently, but sticks to weeping.

I have crossed several Devil's Bridges, hanging over precipices, in various localities, but I never looked down from one that impressed me so much, or made me feel so giddy, as Lydford Bridge, though it has not been dedicated, like the more conventionally frightful ones, to the evil spirit. A precipice amongst other precipices you are prepared for, but when you come upon one unexpectedly, in the midst of a quiet homely field, you are naturally startled. It is as if an excited bull were suddenly to spring up and charge you on a glacier.

It is a most fascinating spot, and if you despise a notice-board which threatens you with the utmost rigour of the law, and trespass in a field, following the edge of the ravine to the left, you will come to a corner from whence you get a capital view of the bridge and a good depth of the chasm beneath it.

Our artist sat on a loose stone wall, designed to protect men and beasts from wandering over, and prepared to paint. It was a water-colour; though we held umbrellas over her, and endeavoured to improve the shelter by spreading waterproofs, the rain insisted on penetrating. It came down with a weight and in a volume that were irresistible, and general saturation could not be stalled off.

I do not believe there is a living man who would have persevered with the sketch, but our artist was a lady, and not to be beat. I do not say that work of art was equal to others done by the same hand under more favourable circumstances, but I aver that it is a good memorial of the place, and a triumphant victory over the Impossible.

The present bridge over the chasm is a comparatively new one: the last was destroyed in a storm, I could not learn how—by lightning probably. On the night of the tempest the village quidnuncs were gathered round the fire of the inn-parlour, smoking their pipes and discussing the damage that had been done, when a horse's hoofs were heard clattering up to the door, and presently a dripping traveller came in.

"A wild night!" he remarked, ridding himself of his wraps.

"Ay, it is indeed, sir. Have you come far?"

"From Tavistock."

Down went every pipe. Wide went every eye, and several mouths.

"From Tav—Do you know this country, sir?" asked the landlord.

"Never was here before; don't know the name of the place where I am. Very glad to be under cover though."

"Did you find any sort of check or obstruction on the road?"

"No; I came at a good gallop, dark as it was, and—Oh, by-the-by, my horse did jump something just before we came into the village."

Jump something! They showed him next day what he had jumped, and it turned him sick.

LEWIS HOUGH.

SERENADES.

BY ROBERT BUCHANAN.

I.

LEEP on thine eyes, peace in thy breast!
White-limb'd lady, lie at rest;
Near thy casement, shrill of cry,
Broods the owl with luminous eye.

Midnight comes; all fair things sleep
While all dark things vigil keep;
Round thy sleep thy scented bower
Foldeth like a lily-flower.

All so still around thee lies,
Peace in thy breast, sleep on thine eyes!
All without is dark as death,
And thy lover wakeneth.

Underneath thy bower I pace,
Star-dew sparkling on my face;
All around me, swift of sight,
Move the creatures of the night.

Hark, the great owl cries again,
With an echo in the brain,
And the dark Earth in her sleep
Stirs and trembles, breathing deep.

Sleep on thine eyes, peace in thy breast !
Fold thy hands and take thy rest ;
All the night, till morning break,
Spirits walk and lovers wake !

"SLEEP ON THINE EYES, PEACE IN THY BREAST."

Sleep sweet, beloved one, sleep sweet !
Without here night is growing,
The dead leaf falls, the dark boughs meet,
And a chill wind is blowing.

II.

Strange shapes are stirring in the night
To the deep breezes' wailing,
And slow, with wistful gleams of light,
The storm-tost moon is sailing.

Sleep sweet, beloved one, sleep sweet !
 Fold thy white hands, my blossom !
 Thy warm limbs in thy lily-sheet,
 Thy hands upon thy bosom.
 Though evil thoughts may walk the dark,
 Not one shall near thy chamber,
 But dreams divine shall pause to mark
 Singing to lutes of amber.

Sleep sweet, beloved one, sleep sweet !
 Though, on thy bosom creeping,
 God's hand is laid to feel the beat
 Of thy soft heart in sleeping.
 The brother angels, Sleep and Death,
 Stoop by thy couch and eye thee ;
 And Sleep stoops down to drink thy breath,
 While Death goes softly by thee !

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—HOW HE GOT INTO DEBT.—I.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

WHEN the elder Mr. Weller found himself in possession of that legacy which had so narrowly escaped the unctuous grasp of the Shepherd, he not unnaturally consulted with his son as to what should be done with it.

When, further, he announced his resolution to invest it in "those things which are always going up and down in the City," Sam, ever literal, suggested that his worthy parent meant "omnibuses."

It turned out, however, that the old gentleman meant Consols. The definition, though undoubtedly true as far as it goes, is scarcely exhaustive or scientific. It would seem, indeed, that Mr. Weller's knowledge of finance was hardly so extensive as his knowledge of widows.

Now, without for one moment hinting that any reader of CASSELL'S MAGAZINE can share in Mr. Weller's confusion of ideas, we yet think it possible that some may like to hear a little about the Consols in which that illustrious sire of an immortal son invested his wife's legacy. In other words, what is the National Debt? How did John Bull get into debt?—a debt so large that the interest of it swallows up twenty-seven millions of pounds every year.

The National Debt of Great Britain is commonly supposed to have originated with the Revolution. Undoubtedly the special exigencies of the Government of William the Third, and the refusal of that Government to resort to those unconstitutional modes of raising money for which former Governments were conspicuous, necessitated a systematic recourse to loans, and an enormous development of the practice of borrowing ; but the foundation of the National Debt had been laid long before, by men who had neither the difficulties to encounter, nor the ability to cope with them, that characterised William's statesmen. The truth is, the National Debt of this country was commenced as far back as the former half of the thirteenth century. And as the source of many a mighty river is simply the trickling spring which a child can leap, so the origin of the debt may be traced to customs of the simplest and rudest kind.

In these days of a monarchy limited by constitutional law and usage, can our readers for a moment conceive of the boundless wealth and power of a Norman king, such as, for instance, William the Conqueror? As proprietor of the soil, under the feudal system, he extorted aids, special and ordinary, from all his tenants, and only permitted the towns to escape indiscriminate plunder by the levying of taxes called tallages. As custodian of the property of the Church he made heavy charges on each benefice. Customs' duties on all merchandise, fines levied in the courts of law, wreck and treasure-trove, money commutation for military service, and a hundred other sources of revenue, alike odious and injurious, helped to swell his coffers. Twice every year, at Easter and Michaelmas, the Royal Order, known as the Summons of the Exchequer, was issued through the length and breadth of the land, and then the sheriffs and other collectors brought in the revenue of their districts. The machinery of receipt and payment was conducted by means of the Exchequer Tally. The tally was simply a hazel wand, with the sides squared. The sum to be indicated was represented by notches of various dimensions, the rod was then split lengthwise, one-half, constituting the tally, being handed to the person who paid in the money, while the counter-tally was kept at the Exchequer as a check. When at any time an audit was called for, the correspondence of tally and counter-tally was practically the discharge of the account.

Very stately and very cumbersome were all the arrangements of the Court of Exchequer in the old feudal times. The "scaccarium," or chequered cloth on which the money was counted, and from which the word "Exchequer" is derived ; the long array of officials, commencing with the Treasurer, the representative of our modern Prime Minister, and including the Barons, the Tellers who received all moneys, and the cutter and writer of the tallies ; the formal and tardy precision with which every detail of the transaction was recorded ; and the long catalogue of oaths and affirmations by which every official was bound—all indicate the Norman character of the period we are referring to.

But notwithstanding the vast revenues of the monarch, there were often times when both Plantagenet and Tudor monarchs were sadly in want of money. And then, in the graphic words of Macaulay, "it had been necessary for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to go, hat in hand, up and down Cheapside and Cornhill, and to make up a sum by borrowing £100 from this hosier and £200 from that ironmonger." Very piteous at such times were the entreaties of the monarch. We have before us as we write a form of letter of Privy Seal of James the Second, which is positively ludicrous in its plaintive supplication. These Privy Seals were generally addressed to the nobility of the realm, or to the "good men" of this or that town, or to "noble and wealthy persons generally." Whittington, thrice Lord Mayor of London, is mentioned in the Exchequer Rolls as a considerable lender to the Crown ; and the citizens of London generally were evidently most frequently and successfully appealed to.

It will be readily understood that these modes of raising money, although avowedly voluntary, were really exactions on the part of the Crown. It might be all very well for a Plantagenet to tell his "trustie and well-beloved" subjects that their "love and duty must be the chiefe motive of ready performance" of the royal request, but the feudal system afforded so many modes in which a recalcitrant peer or burgher might be oppressed, that the Privy Seal, spite of its effusive politeness, was really a royal command. For security the king's creditor would have his tally, or he would retain the form of Privy Seal, and be repaid on presentation at the Exchequer. We may mention here one peculiar security which Henry the Third made use of. Our limits would fail were we to recall all the monstrous persecutions to which the Jews were exposed in England. Suffice it to say they were commonly known as the "king's cattle," and no cruelty or extortion was too bitter for them to endure. Thus we find Henry the Third borrowing five thousand marks of Richard, Earl of Cornwall, and "for securing the payment thereof, assigning and setting over all the Jews of England to the said earl, with power to distrain them by their bodies for the same."

It must not be supposed, however, that the king's creditors were always satisfied with securities of the kind we have mentioned. Very frequently the king's jewels were pledged for loans of money. In those days the Regalia was not, as now, stored in the Tower, for the delight of country cousins, only to be removed thence on the occasion of a coronation or public ceremonial ; but it was under the custody of the officers of the king's Exchequer, where it was always available as a ready means for raising money. The ancient records of the Exchequer, conspicuous always for their extreme minuteness and elaboration, enable us to form no inadequate idea of the extent and character of the jewels thus pledged, and of the amount advanced. And if the jewels of the present day surpass those of the Plantagenet and Norman kings in their intrinsic value, the latter possessed some virtues which no modern Regalia can boast. Not even the Koh-i-noor diamond itself could be so acceptable a security as the "gold tabernacle, with a piece of the holy garment without seam placed in the middle thereof, and garnished with 27 great pearls," which we find the Bishop of Norwich, Treasurer to Henry the Fifth, pawning to Robert Popyngay for the very modest loan of £80. Again, he would be an obdurate creditor who would not be contented with "the tabernacle, with image of the blessed Mary upon a green ground, and images of Adam and Eve, with four angels at the corners," with which, from the same records, we find Henry the Sixth obtained sums of money.

Instances of this kind might be easily multiplied, for this pawning of the Regalia was systematic, and not a casual occurrence. Sometimes we find one monarch redeeming jewels which his predecessor had pledged ; sometimes the sudden necessities of war would compel the adoption of most peremptory measures, and then the king's council would intercede, and recover the royal jewels, pawning them again for fresh advances. Thus we have the sword of the Black Prince, which had been pawned to Sir Thomas Hawley for £12 8s., redeemed by the especial mediation of the Lord High Treasurer for £10. The king's sword, indeed, seems to have been rather a favourite pledge, for it is mentioned not unfrequently in the Exchequer annals. On the other hand, jewels which were supposed to possess magical virtues were very scrupulously guarded. On one occasion Hubert de Burgh was impeached for having pawned to Llewelyn of Wales, a gem, the property of the Crown, which rendered the wearer invisible in battle.

Here, then, we have the spectacle of a regular system of borrowing on the credit of taxes not yet collected, the actual security being either a tally, a Privy Seal, or Crown jewels. The king was, in fact, a great pawnbroker. In process of time, as, on the one hand, the demands on the monarch increased, and, on the other, the growing vigilance of Parliament controlled in some degree unconstitutional modes of meeting them, important modifications of this system were made. Money was urgently needed for payment of current services, and the Exchequer was barren. The difficulty was met by giving the claimant a tally for the amount of his claim, with a written "Order of Repayment," which was to be satisfied out of some specified tax. Gradually it was seen that this Order of Repayment would be accepted much more readily if it were allowed to pass from hand to hand by endorsement. This was accordingly done, and the idea of a negotiable public security was realised. Meanwhile the relaxation of the old laws against usury was bearing good fruit, and people were found willing to postpone their claims on the Government if they were paid interest for doing so. At length, in the seventeenth year of Charles the Second, Government, being in urgent need of money, agreed to issue Tallies of Loan and Orders of Repayment to all persons who would contribute to the loan, such orders to bear interest at £6 per cent., and to be negotiable by endorsement.

To the Act by which this plan was carried out may fairly be traced the origin of the National Debt. Thus were forged the first links in that massive chain of debt that has since held the nation in a grasp which can never be eluded, and which the highest statesmanship can make only not unbearable.

At the Revolution the amount owing by the nation on these Tallies of Loan was about £85,000, which constituted the entire debt at that period. Let us now inquire how this insignificant liability swelled into the gigantic total of £750,000,000. Anything like a detailed statement of the various steps by which this ponderous debt has grown would be, of course, impossible; we can only hope to throw light on the principles which have regulated its growth. It is, above all things, necessary to get a clear idea of the mutual relations of the parties to the debt, and to grasp clearly in what the indebtedness consists. With this object we will imagine a case.

Let us suppose the Government, finding that the taxes are not bringing in as much money as is wanted to carry on the public service, resolve to raise a loan of a million sterling. They invite subscriptions from brokers or bankers, or private persons, but these subscriptions can be received on one condition only—that the lender shall not be able ever to claim repayment of the principal sum advanced, though the Government may, at any time they choose, pay off the debt. This point being understood, the next thing is to settle the conditions on which subscribers shall compete, in order that Government may raise the loan on the best terms possible. Now, a debt consists of two elements, principal and interest; and in announcing the loan, Government may deal with either one or the other. They may fix the rate of interest per cent. they mean to pay for the loan, in which case subscribers will bid what sum they will be prepared to give to obtain the stipulated rate of interest; or they may fix the principal and let the competition relate to the interest. In other words, the Government may either say to the subscribers, "How much will you give us for a specified annuity?" or, "What annuity will you expect us to give you for the loan of a specified sum—say £100—you having no power to demand repayment of your loan?" In this country the former of these two is the mode always adopted, because more minute variations can take place in the price of the principal, called technically "stock," than can conveniently occur in the rate of interest payable on that stock.

In the case before us we will assume that the Government have fixed the rate of interest at £3 per cent., and have moreover determined to fix their minimum at £96—that is to say, have resolved to accept of no tender which offers less than £96 for the purchase of £100 stock with interest of £3 a year thereon. We will further suppose that Messrs. Rothschild are the successful contractors, and have negotiated the loan at £96 10s. per cent. What now are the respective positions of the parties?

Messrs. Rothschild are inscribed in the books of the Government as public creditors to the extent of £1,000,000, on which they are to receive £30,000 a year; in other words, they are said to be holders of £1,000,000 Three per Cent. Stock. For this they have paid, be it remembered, only £965,000—that is, £96 10s. for every £100 stock—so that Government have had to submit to a loss of £35,000 on the total of £1,000,000. The latter, however, are content, because the minimum of £96 shows they would have been content to receive only £960,000.

Let us now conceive of the National Debt as consisting of a vast number of loans raised in the way just described. Moreover, let us imagine that these loans were negotiated at a great variety of rates of interest; that these rates have been from time to time reduced, as successive Finance Ministers have dealt with them, and that in process of time certain loans bearing a uniform rate of interest have been united into one general stock. Finally, let us understand that these consolidations have given a distinctive title to this or that stock. Thus the term "Consols" indicates the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, because a number of stocks paying three per cent. have been consolidated into one stock or fund.

What then has the purchaser now-a-days of £100 Consols really bought? He is simply the possessor of a perpetual annuity of £3. He is nominally the owner of £100 stock in the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities, but he has no power to demand payment of the principal sum on which the interest of £3 is calculated. In short, his contract with the Government amounts to this, that he has purchased the title to be inscribed in the Government books as the recipient of £3 a year; and this title he can sell or dispose of in any way he pleases, its value depending, of course, on the credit of the debtor who has to provide the annuity —that is, the nation. On the other hand, the nation cannot reduce this annuity—that is, alter their specified rate of interest—without offering to their creditor the full value of his share in the debt—viz., £100. Thus the National Debt is a debt consisting of annuities, and the principal thereof is in reality an index to the number of these annuities.

POOR RELATIONS.

Is it not Longfellow who says, "A blind man is a poor man, and blind a poor man is ; for the former seeth no man, and the latter no man sees?" If it is, I beg leave to differ from the tuneful poet of New England.

In my opinion one sees a great deal more of the poor man than is desirable ; and my millennium will lie in that day when there shall be neither rich nor poor, and when poverty and want shall be banished from the face of the earth.

But at least too many of us try not to see the poor man, and do all in our power to shut our eyes when he comes across the line of our vision ! Quite so. There I agree with you heartily ; and before I begin to rail at such mental ophthalmia let me beat my own breast and cry, "Mea culpa, mea culpa, mea maxima culpa !" for be it known I am even now, not exactly in a bad temper, but cross, irritable, bored—anything you will that is peevish and fractious in a small way—and simply because I have been obliged to "see," and to see for a long time, when I would much rather have shut my eyes.

In other words, a poor relation has just chosen to call at the very moment that the cloth was laid for dinner ; and I have been forced to entertain her for more than three-quarters of an hour, with the smell of over-roasted mutton in my nostrils, and a dreadful sense of the duty of being more courteous and amiable than I need be to a friend or acquaintance weighing on my mind, and hampering every word with an iron fetter of constraint.

Well, I took it out afterwards by being fretful with my long-suffering family, who had in this instance left the burden of entertainment on my shoulders instead of taking it on their own ; but I don't know that that did me much good ; and when deservedly sent to Coventry for the nonce, I fell to thinking on the race of poor relations in general, and in connection with ourselves.

In the first place, if you will allow me to express my opinion, I see no reason for their existence at all, and utterly rebel against the idea of there being any necessity for such a blot in the map of society.

Every man is related to somebody or other, and many men are poorer than the rest of their relations ; but it does not follow that they need be what are technically called "poor relations" on that account. God forbid ! I am poor myself, very poor, inasmuch as I have only just enough to live upon, and not enough to enjoy myself with, or do one tithe of the good to my fellow-creatures that I should desire.

But notwithstanding my want of riches I have always stood out, and intend to stand firmly to the end of my life, against the idea of sinking into the contemptible and barely tolerated estate of a "poor relation." Do you blame me ? And yet there are some among my wealthier relatives who, instead of smiling on such a resolution—which, to say the least, is economical for themselves—are disposed to be indignant, aggrieved, and even insulted at this contumacy, this "want of proper humility" on the part of a person who possesses as many pence as they possess pounds, and who is better pleased to earn one guinea for herself by the writing of this page, for instance, than to gain a present of two by graceful submission and judicious humility to the powers that be.

Ah ! believe me, there is no labour so tiresome as lowering the stature God has given you to the level of a rich man's pocket ; no toil so degrading as a life of slavish dependence and false humility ; no gain so dearly bought as the gift which lowers the recipient even in the eyes of the giver ; and yet there are some among the latter who prefer to give and grumble and despise, than by the honest independence of their poorer relatives to be spared the call on pocket, pride, and uncharitableness altogether.

Why not ? Did the rich man desire that Lazarus should be driven from his door-step, or attempt to put down the degrading spectacle of such a contrast between the luxury within and the misery without ? By no means. Don't we all know that he suffered him to remain there, to eat of the crumbs from his table, and have his sores licked by his patron's dogs ? Indeed, I have no doubt that the contrast, so far from being painful to Dives, rather gratified that gentleman than otherwise, and that he regarded Lazarus as a tolerably useful foil to his own magnificence.

Even thus it is now-a-days, and so much so that Mr. Dives is quite angry if Lazarus declines to sit on his door-step, covers up his sores, and professes to enjoy his own miserable pickings more than the crumbs from the rich man's table.

The poor relation proper is generally (I shame to say it) of what Artemus Ward calls the "female sect," and is seldom very young. I suppose there is something in the innate vigour and vitality of youth opposed to the proper carrying out of the situation.

She wears faded garments, the cast-off offerings of her friends, which are generally as obsolete in make as they are limp and scanty about the skirts. Her bonnets are home-made, and of a sodden appearance. She eschews bright colours and renounces heels to her boots. She knocks in a feeble and uncertain manner, and is invariably a long time rubbing her feet on the mat before venturing to cross the hall. She is always very much afraid of the footman, and on whisperingly familiar terms with the lady's-maid who patronises her. She never takes wine, or at most "half a glass of sherry, please," and makes a point of declining the daintier dishes, and taking the outside slice of the joint. She says "Sir," and praises everything she eats. She has no single opinion of her own, and would rather die than differ, demur, or even hesitate before accepting the most outrageous propositions of her wealthy relatives. She giggles at her host's dullest jokes, and applauds her hostess's silliest speeches. She submits to be sent up and down stairs half a dozen times in an hour. She shuts the door, whether there be a gentleman present or not, and puts on coals. She is invited to the house when some one is wanted to play the piano for dancing, when the new stock of linen has to be marked, when nurse has a holiday and the mother is too lazy to amuse her own children. She is left sitting alone and unnoticed for an hour at a time while her hostess entertains more important guests, and will vow at leaving that she has paid "a most delightful visit." She starves and begs rather than derogate from her relations' dignity by following any honest profession. She walks in pouring rain rather than offend their susceptibilities by alighting from the omnibus at their door. She smiles feebly when snubbed, and apologises humbly when rebuked. She likes draughts, and to have her back to the horses. She prefers weak tea to strong, and enjoys reading aloud beyond everything. She starves her cat and screws her servant, to make small offerings to her wealthy connections, thereby greatly annoying them, and obliging them to make her a costly return at their earliest convenience. Mrs. Dives asks her to put on Tommy's boots; Mr. Dives swears in her presence, and inquires "what that woman is doing here?" in her hearing. Her relations in general speak of her as "poor Eliza." She tells the Diveses what the Bashaws have for dinner, and describes the family squabbles of the Diveses to the Bashaws with equal unction. She is generally weak in constitution, gushing in temperament, feeble in mind. She—But have I not been suffering from her for the last three-quarters of an hour? Has she not admired everything that I have on, mentioned casually that five pounds would be invaluable in repairing the dilapidations of her family wardrobe, insinuated a knowledge of some vile scandal in the house of a relative at whose table she breaks bread constantly, and alternately called me "dear" and "miss," till my patience, never the strongest point in an invalid, was worn to the last shred, and I began to fear lest my courtesy should begin also to fray at the edges before she took her departure?

And can you wonder now that, being poor, I would hold the outworks of my own citadel to the last gasp, rather than run the risk of sinking from simple want of money into this low and parasitic condition?

Surely, surely it is possible to be poor and yet dignified; to have an opinion of your own, though you have not a guinea in your pocket; to work and not be ashamed; to decline unasked interference in your private affairs, even though you decline assistance by so doing; to hold your head as high as your equals, though their income counts by thousands, and yours by hundreds only!

I once knew a young lady in very reduced circumstances, who was invited to a garden-party at a wealthy relative's house.

The day was sultry, and most of the girls present were declaring that they had had hardly energy enough to fan themselves all the morning, or sit up while their maids were dressing them, etc.

A rich and handsome admirer of one of the languid over-dressed daughters of the house, noticing the bright-looking girl, in clear, fresh muslin, to whom he had been introduced on some previous occasion, asked her how she had managed to get through the day. She looked him full in the face and answered with prompt frankness—

"In starching and ironing the dress I have on; and it took a long time to finish properly, so I hope you think it is nicely done, and will take care not to tread on the flounce."

Her cousins wellnigh fainted at this cool avowal. They declared it was the height of bad taste—nay, more than coarse, almost indecent, to confess to such servile work, even if obliged to do it; and in their house too! In fact they decided it would be impossible ever to invite her again. The gentleman fell in love with her honest pride on the spot, and asked her to be his wife before the month was out.

Noblesse oblige. It is only the old motto carried into every-day practice: sure to exact the respect of the truly noble; equally sure to incur the condemnation of the vulgar and narrow-minded. Surely the voice of the former is worth more than the senseless braying of the multitude!

I have been chiefly inveighing against servility and hypocrisy on the side of the poor relation; but, after all, if we look into the matter, are not these the natural fruit of that systematic belief which numbers of rich people cherish—i.e., that the fact of their connections being poorer than themselves entitles them to meddle with, slight, tyrannise over, and even insult these latter, as if poverty were not only something disgraceful in itself, but that it rendered null, void, and worthless all those graces and good qualities which would otherwise have won their owner consideration and respect in society? And the worst of it is that this doctrine forms part of the unspoken "Credo" of many of the otherwise best and kindest of human beings. Take, for instance, those amiable and benevolent people, the Welfeds, who, as you know, have a town and a country house, are descended from a good old family, and have lots of relations, rich and poor. Welfed has quite a name for kindness and hospitality; and when he meets even that distant connection of his, young Lord Wildoats, he grasps the lad's hand with effusion and cries out

"Why, what a time since we've seen you, Wildoats! When are you coming to dine with us? Say Monday, do; and I'll have your friend Sir Harry Pipeclay, and Lord Fanfare's daughters, to meet you."

Also, as soon as the hunting season commences, does he not indite a cordial note to the same fast youth, whose tastes and manners must be a continual offence to the worthy old gentleman, urging him to spare a week at least to Welfed Hall, and promising him plenty of mounts if he does not care to bring his own cattle down to that out-of-the-way place for so short a time?

And am I blaming him for these marks of goodness? Far from it. Only why, in Heaven's name, not extend the same kindness to his own nephew, Jack Landless, who is as upright, steady, and gentlemanly a young fellow as walks the earth; whose father took higher rank than Welfed in society; who has been educated at Rugby and Oxford; and who, ever since the Landless smash-up, has occupied a dingy stool in the City with equal honour and cheerfulness? Jack Landless has the same scientific tastes as his uncle, and a better seat on horseback than Wildoats. Why doesn't old Welfed seek him out, ask him to dinner, and invite some pleasant fellows and pretty girls to meet him? Why doesn't he press Jack to spare them a week at Christmas, and give him a mount in the hunting-field?

Why?

It is not want of kindness to his young relatives; for there must be more kindness in welcoming a scapegrace like Wildoats than a pleasant, honourable fellow like Jack; and the latter would appreciate it ten times as much as the young nobleman, who votes Welfed "a bore," and sneers at the whole affair. Is it true that the mere fact of Jack's poverty has not only robbed him of worldly comforts, but of his rightful place in society, and the rightful recognition of his merits? Indeed, I fear it is so; for the mere idea of treating young Landless as he does Wildoats and Pipeclay never even enters Mr. Welfed's head; and it is not want of liking for his nephew, for the old gentleman speaks highly in his praise to his wife, and says—

"That boy behaves himself very creditably, my dear, and we musn't forget to notice him. Let me see, we shall be all alone on Sunday. Suppose I tell him to come and dine here. It'll be a kindness to the lad; and I say, tell him to go at ten o'clock; for, with dinner-parties every other night, I don't want to be kept up late that evening."

And Jack goes; but he doesn't feel grateful, for he is quite aware of the Wildoats and Pipeclay dinners, and knows that on those festive occasions his uncle does not bring out his worst wine, or go to sleep after dinner; that his aunt does not criticise her guests' parents, or put them through an examination as to their quarterly expenditure; neither does she say before ten o'clock, "Now, you won't think me unkind, but we want to go to bed early; and I know you've to be at your office betimes of a morning." Nor (worst of all!) does old Welfed put his hand in his pocket and present Wildoats with a half-sovereign, almost in the presence of the footman who opens the door to let him out.

Poor Jack! he takes trouble manfully enough; but those dinners at Uncle Welfed's stick in his throat, and he curses the half-sovereign audibly as he trudges away from the door.

"Can't they treat me like other men, instead of making me feel my poverty every minute?" cries the young man bitterly. "I'm as good as they are, hang them!" and this black ingratitude is all that the Welfeds' kindness produces, simply because the young fellow has sense and spirit enough to know that courtesy and consideration, the treatment of one gentleman to another, are his due; and that, till he receives those, kindness is but a sorry and ungracious equivalent.

The fact is, there is one great mistake at the root of the matter, the old mistake of all, which rules this country, and this country only, till it has earned us the well-deserved title of a nation of shopkeepers—the slavish worship of Mammon; and till this is rectified—till we can learn to lift our eyes above the till, and recognise the fact that if relations are equal in birth, money differences can, and ought to be, blotted out altogether from between them—rich and poor will never hang well together when they are members of the same family. A lady cannot be more than a lady, though she be a duchess; a gentleman cannot be less than a gentleman, though he have but sixpence in his pocket. If it be a piece of presumptuous ill-breeding, to walk into Lady Blank's drawing-room and take her to task for putting pearl-powder on her nose, it is exactly as bad to sit down in Cousin Dash's poor parlour and exclaim at her for wearing imitation lace in her caps. As bad, did I say? Nay, it is a thousand times worse; for Lady Blank would order you out of her house, and Cousin Dash only wishes to do so, knowing the while that you consider her honoured by your presence. What do you think of a great brutal man who wantonly strikes a woman? Yet that is what you do who take on you to insult, however pettily, those of your blood who are poorer than yourselves, you good-natured, generous, kind-hearted people, who tell me that the thanklessness of those thriftless Dashes has nearly broken your heart.

Bah! there are heart-breaks which mend with surprising easiness; while the pricks and stabs and bruises, which have given rise to them, bleed and rankle until only death has cast its healing balsam over every wound—the balsam of the grave. Did I not begin this paper by sneering at the poor relation? Upon my word, I fear I must conclude by condemning the rich brother, whose treatment has actually produced the worm he crushes. And, believe me, though I may be in the minority, yet am I not alone in my protest. Read "The Adventures of Philip," by the keenest and cleverest por-trayer of human nature who has ever existed in these modern days. Where Thackeray points it is pretty safe to follow. It may not be convenient always, it may not be pleasant often (have I not said how agreeable it is to be blind on occasions?) but it is sure to hit the mark; and oh! my friends, if the telling of a thing be nasty, surely the thing told of is nastier. It is better to alter that than to hold your tongue, to cut out a gangrened spot rather than cover it with sticking plaster, to remove evils for your own sakes, at least, that you may walk freely in God's sunlight with your eyes open, and without the dread of a conscience-prick from some unpleasant sight at every turn.

There are people who do so (should I have written these pages if I could not end them thus?)—people who, acting on no spoken theory, unrecognisant even of their neighbours' error, unrecognised themselves for any ultra-pitch of delicacy, but simply acting on that command, Do unto others as ye would that others do unto you, contrive to give as much pleasure and gratification to their poorer relatives as their neighbours give the reverse. It is in houses like these—all honour and blessing attend them!—at whose choicest dinner-parties the poor relation is never forgotten, and ever treated with even a larger share of courtesy and attention than that offered to wealthier guests: down whose broad stairs the host himself conducts Laura Penniless and, bareheaded, places her in her hackney cab with the same care as he tucks Lady Beta Brown into her cushioned barouche: at whose croquet-parties Jack Landless's presence is made as much a favour as Lord Wildoats': whose sons would as soon attempt to trifle with Lucy Lazarus as with Amaryllis Dives: whose owners will wrap a gift round with so much love and appreciation, as to make it seem that the recipient is rather conferring a favour than accepting one, and—still greater kindness sometimes—will even abstain from the luxury of giving when the gift could possibly remind their friend of his poverty, and thus confer a higher benefit than he who flings away hundreds in semi-contemptuous liberality.

This is true refinement; this, the purest use of wealth. To give kindness while you make believe even to yourself that you are receiving it; to thank God for your money as a means of bestowing pleasure, not mortification; to rate a man for what he is, not for what he has; to feel equally honoured by the friendship of your poorest as of your richest relative, so they be but of equal merit; to spare the feelings instead of wounding them—this is indeed the rarest proof of charity, that charity which "is courteous, is kind, is not puffed up;" and for which, small thing as it seems, there shall be given a right royal measure, in that day when the members of one family, whether rich or poor, whether in rags or in velvet, shall meet together. THEO. GIFT

DAYS PRING.

WHEN early blossoms dot the dells
With gold, and white of crimson lip,
And hedges, blue with blowing bells,
Green tassels in the water dip,
Young love is light, and who can tell
The joy of lovers loving well?

When Spring drops jewels in the lake,
And sticks around it stem and stalk;
And kingcups glimmer in the brake,
And blackbirds to each other talk,
True pleasure is a lover's need,
And love in truth is love indeed.

The fairest dayshine is begun;
The coloured tide of song and scent;
The joyous coming of the sun;
The time of village merriment,
When laughter of the birds and trees
Will set a lover's heart at ease.

In the lane the cowslips grow;
Boughs are amorous of the streams;
In the forest lovers go Down the rosy path of dreams.
Fairies move the leaves above—
Life were nothing without love!

THE STORY OF A MINIATURE, AS TOLD BY A PIECE OF GOLDSMITH'S WORK.
BY THOMAS ARCHER.

'AS SHE STOOD WATCHING FOR HER LOVER'S FLUTTERING SIGNAL.'

IN FIVE CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE FIRST

NOT that I am made of gold, but of silver. Silence is said to be golden, and speech silvern, therefore I shall speak: not so much of myself as of those amidst whom my latter days have been passed. There was a time when, on rare occasions, I flushed with the glow of rare old Burgundy spiced with fragrant cinnamon; or, better still, held the essence of odorous flowers distilled into subtle liqueur that trembled with topaz hues, and reflected the deep glow of my burnished edge. For I am bowl, goblet, tazza, as the occasion serves, and there is a world of meaning in the dark depths of my reflections. Need I say that I am "old silver?" Perhaps the work of Cellini, or it may be of some later hand—what do I know? One thing I know: that it was in France I first saw the light, and that, with the respect due to my birth and station, I held a place of honour in the house I was destined to adorn. That house was one of note in Languedoc, not that its owner was noble by birth, but he was of the great Protestant families—the old Huguenots—whose undaunted spirit Louis Quatorze could not quell, even with the fortress that he built to frown them into submission, or with the dragonnades that wrecked their fortunes and their homes.

They were troublous times even long afterwards, when Anton Dormeur, owner of looms and factory of velvet, went about with a serious face, as though he had met Hugon himself upon the bridge. Anton Dormeur was a man who kept his own counsel, and, as the persecutions had been stayed, made money, hoping to rebuild the fortunes of his house for those two daughters, who were but children when his wife died and left a vacant place that never could be filled.

They were lovely—these girls—each in a different fashion. The elder, tall, slender, dark-haired, haughty, with the complexion of a peach; the younger, soft and fair, with locks that hung like silken skeins upon a neck of snow, and eyes of that dark changeful sheen that is either grey, or black, or blue, as you seek to look into their depths.

Hers were the plump white fingers that pulled the delicate rose-leaves with which I was filled, and sprinkled subtle perfume on them, till all the air of that long gloomy room was fresh with the exhalations of a garden after evening rain.

Mathilde, her dark, proud sister, loved lilies best, and set them in a jewelled vase that stood in the window next to mine. That vase perished in the great calamity that fell upon the house, and I was among the few relics that were saved. Alas! the beautiful, imperious Mathilde perished also in those evil times, and her sister followed her after the fall of the Gironde, when she and her husband, Achille Dufarge, were swept away in the tide of blood that deluged Paris, and made its gutters run red.

Yes, this beautiful creature, whose coming seemed to lighten the dim room in the old château with its hangings of amber damask, its gilded panels framed with long slips of looking-glass that had a mysterious blackness like my own; with its satin chairs, its quaint carved cabinets, filled with rare knickknacks of ivory carvings, jade-stones, jewelled daggers, boxes of filigree, and rare cups of porcelain, like great opals, gleaming with strange lights that paled the pearls with which their rims were set. There were tables and tripods too, bearing bronzes and Oriental jars filled with scented woods and spices; but it was over me that the sweet glowing face of Sara Dormeur bent, as she stood watching for her lover's fluttering signal amidst the trees that belted the sloping parterre, beyond the broad stone balcony on which the windows opened.

For the father, Anton Dormeur, was averse to young Dufarge, who, though he belonged to a Protestant family among the tanners of Alais, was a man of the people, without that connection with the old régime which the Huguenots cherished, even though they suffered continually by the laws that king and nobles put in force against them.

Who does not know how some of the émigrés in England—old, poverty-stricken, bed-ridden as many of them were at that time—waved their withered hands and screamed "Vive le Bourbon!" after the downfall of Napoleon, and the restoration of the royal family? So it was in olden times. The Protestants were loyal to the caste which yet refused to own them, though they were of the best blood in France, or owned them secretly and in fear, lest to be identified with the heretics might bring fire and sword upon themselves.

Thus old Dormeur forbade Sara to have any more to say to Achille, but encouraged the lover of his eldest girl, a man of twice her age, the grim and saturnine Bartholde, by birth seigneur of an estate near Lozère, where however he lived only on sufferance, for the seignury had been abated after the persecutions following the Edict of Nantes, and though Bartholde was passing rich, he had abandoned both title and the display that belonged to it.

His was just such an alliance as the stately reserved manufacturer might have been supposed to choose for his eldest daughter, and, indeed, after they were married he would go and stay for days together at his son-in-law's house—a place less gloomy for him now that the light had gone out of his own; for Sara had yielded to her handsome young lover in his entreaties for a private marriage, after which they hoped and believed that the old man would relent. He never relented, or at least never to their knowledge. As his sweet fair daughter knelt to him, her golden hair streaming about her, her hands held up in supplication, he denounced her in words taken from Holy Scripture, and would have struck her, but that the young husband stood with earnest eyes and folded arms—he having knelt in vain, or, as he said, bent his pride to his love for his sweet wife's sake.

So Sara Dufarge went out cursed, undowered, and an orphan, from the old house in Languedoc, and Père Dormeur was left desolate indeed.

Yet amidst the gloom that settled on his life, and the hard unyielding determination which resisted any attempts on the part of her sister to bring him to receive his disowned daughter again, the manufacturer had frequent struggles with his pride and obstinacy. They were scarcely acknowledged even to himself. He thought he could trample the suggestions of nature under foot, and he succeeded in so far as to suffer in silence, and to make no sign of yielding, nor of admitting the possibility of foregoing his resentful purpose.

He had much to occupy his thoughts at that time, for there were rumours of renewed persecutions of the Protestants by command of bishops and clergy. Not contented with refusing them the legal registration of marriage and the certificate of death, it was said that a general confiscation of property was ordained, and that recantation or death by fire and sword might once more be the doom of the sectaries. Anton Dormeur was frequently at Alais with Bartholde, and the people there whispered that it would go hard with the manufacturer when the dragoons came. He had already made some preparations, however. Always in communication with the refugees that had settled here in Spitalfields and Coventry, he held money in England. This was pretty well understood, but what few people knew was that for weeks before the blow fell he had had a vessel ready, and that some of his most valuable effects and merchandise was stowed among the cargo. I was on board this vessel myself, hidden away in a case, where I was surrounded by silk brocade and velvet, clothes, and lace. For days we swung with the tide, waiting for Anton Dormeur, who sought to bring his daughter Mathilde and her husband, with their child, to be his companions in flight. But Bartholde delayed, loth to part from his birth-right. I know not all that happened—how should I when I was shut up in darkness by a wharf-side miles away?—but this I know, that Bartholde and his little boy—the first and only child—were on a visit to the old lonely house and its grave master, when a messenger, his horse covered with blood and foam, came thundering at the door, with the fearful intelligence that the alarm was ringing at Alais, and that the persecutions of the Protestants had begun.

Bartholde was in the saddle in a minute.

"Stay for nothing, but bring my daughter. Come on straight for your lives to Saint Jean," said the old man. "There will be post-horses there, and I will order relays along the road where the people know me. Meantime I will take the boy; he will be safe with me."

What do I know?—Only that they never met again in this world. Bartholde died fighting on his own threshold; his wife, the beautiful Mathilde, perished, perhaps, in the flames. At all events, a wild figure was seen at an upper window just before the great leaden roof curled up and fell. Fire and sword spread in a widening circle round that devoted district; the château of Anton Dormeur was sacked. Achille Dufarge and his wife, the lovely Sara, were in Paris, where no word reached them till long after, and then only by a stranger, an old workman of the factory in Languedoc; so the months went by, and then came the awful recoil that put an end to a dynasty, and enthroned the guillotine. When the revolution had passed out of the hands of men, and the destinies of France seemed to be in the keeping of the paralytic Couthon and the bloodstained Barrère, the old man and his grandson were in England: age with its remorse—youth with its vague and undisciplined longings.

On the doorposts of a tall gaunt-looking house, in a street of that queer neighbourhood lying between Spitalfields and Norton Folgate, and known as "The Liberty of the Old Artillery Ground," might be seen the words "A. Dormeur, Silk Manufacturer."

It was a dim-looking place enough, where the yellow blinds were nearly always drawn over the front windows, and the summer's dust collected in the corners of the high flight of steps, and was blown round and round in little eddies, along with bits of string and snippings of patterns or shreds of silk and cotton. The front door stood open every day from ten till five, to give buyers access to the warehouse, in which Anton Dormeur—older, more withered, slightly bent, and with a set look upon his face which even his rare smile failed to disturb—unrolled pieces of silk, made bargains, examined with a critical eye and with the aid of a magnifying glass the fabrics brought in by the weavers, and in fact carried on his trade as though he had for ever been separated from the tragedy which befel him in Languedoc nearly fourteen years before.

And yet that heavy affliction darkens his mind to-day as he rolls and unrolls his silks, or carefully matches the skeins that have come from the dyers with the patterns that lie before him. The sun is shining through the windows, the lower panes of which are dulled in order to obtain a clear high light; but the cloud upon his puckered brow is not lighted. Hour by hour the warehouse clock ticks away the afternoon. Customers have departed; the sound of the scale and the clatter of reels and bobbins, in another warehouse beyond the long passage, have ceased since midday.

Presently some passing thought too bitter for absolute self-control crosses the old man's mind, and he bows down his grey head for a moment upon his folded hands; but the next instant glances round with the half-startled look of a man who fears he has betrayed himself, and is busy over his patterns again as he notes that a young man at the other end of the room is regarding him with a wistful, pitying look.

"Come, Antoine," he says, "you have had a long day's work, and we dined early; it is time you had finished your ledger for the day. Come and help me put up these pieces, and then get you into the fresh air. Would that I could make the old house more cheerful for thee, boy; but remember it is all thine own one day, and do not add to the sorrows of the past, anxiety for the future."

The young man had come to his side—a slender, handsome fellow, with an olive cheek, curling hair, and a dark eye both frank and fearless.

"And you, grandpère," he said, touching the old man's hand; "why will not you go out and seek some change from your dull life? What sorrow is it that seems to press so hard on you to-day, and why do you think it necessary to give me words of warning? What shadow has come between us?"

"What shadow?" echoed the old man, peering at him from under his bent brows. "None of my throwing, boy; but do you forget what day it is? A dark anniversary for me, if not for you; and I scarcely thought you would have let it pass without a thought. Nay, I need not wish its darkness to lie on you for ever either; but, Antoine, remember you are all I have left. In my silent, lonely life, and this dull house—and I always a reserved and seeming loveless man—you may well pine for something more, some lighter, gayer time, and ever brood over the means to find it. But remember, my son, that you are by birth above the paltry pleasures of the herd; that you can come to me and ask for money if you covet some pastime that befits you; that you need conceal nothing from me—have no friend that I may not know also."

Antoine's face flushed for a moment. It was seldom, indeed, that his grandfather spoke in a voice so tender and so yearning. Almost insensibly his arm stole round the old man's neck.

"What is it?" he said again. "What have I done?"

"I accuse you of nothing, lad," replied his grandfather, gently disengaging himself. "I thought perhaps your tastes may have needed more money. You do not gamble, Antoine; you are never out late, for I can hear you come in, and the sound of your violin penetrates to my room, so that I know when you are at home. I don't expect you to be always with me; I would not have it so; but when you want money——"

"Grandfather," said the young man hastily, "I know not what you mean. Have I ever asked for more than the allowance you make me? Do I complain? Except for the two or three bills that you have paid for me of your own free will, do I exceed your bounty?"

"Talk not of bounty, boy," said the elder, flushing in his turn. "Antoine, could you read my heart you would see that all I desire is to show to you the love that the world would give me no credit for, that my own children even, thy—thy mother, Antoine, and—Sara—ah! leave me just now, my dear; I am surely growing old and childish, but I have still enough of the old manhood left not to wish even my grandson to witness my weakness. Leave me, boy, and let us meet at supper in my room. I shall go out presently to see old Pierre, and if I can to bring him home with me. Poor old faithful Pierre!"

The young man slowly left the warehouse, and ascended the stairs into the house, when he shut himself in his own room, and flung himself into a chair, in profound dejection.

END OF CHAPTER THE FIRST.

POVERTY PASTURES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EPISODES IN AN OBSCURE LIFE."

A PAIR OF MUDDLARKS.

HE river no longer lapped against the lower stairs; the raised stone causeway, that sloped from their foot to the water, rose bare above the pebbly hard, and green-brown mud. One wherry had been dragged down to the foot of the causeway, in readiness for almost despaired-of passengers; half a dozen others were huddled high and dry at the foot of the stairs; another lay, bottom upwards, at the top. By it stood an old waterman, in a glazed round hat, sleeved brass-buttoned waistcoat, and brown pair of breeches patched in places with canvas. Occasionally he removed his hands from his pockets, in order to take his pipe from his mouth and adjust the tobacco. On these occasions he growled down a word or two to another smoking ancient mariner, attired in a chapped sou'-wester, a faded comforter, a pea-jacket with only two of its big horn-buttons on it, and a pair of blue breeches patched with green cloth at the knees, who sat upon the gunwale of one of the boats, kicking his heels against its side. When addressed, the second waterman, without taking his pipe from his mouth, growled a few words in reply, and then went on kicking his heels; whilst the first, having replaced his pipe, began again to stamp his feet in a "Bruin-dance" to warm his numb toes—for a biting north-east wind, threatening frost, was blowing across the river. "L'âge d'or, qu'une aveugle tradition a placé jusqu'ici dans le passé," says St. Simon, "est devant nous ;" but London watermen are no St. Simonians. The old fellows were lamenting their lost golden age, when watermen took more in a day than now they earn in a fortnight. "Might jist as well be a mudlark," growled one old boy.

"Poor beggars !" answered his comrade, with a mingled contempt and pity in his tone which showed that he thought that, after all, watermen had not sunk quite so low as that. Some baker's dozen of mudlarks could be seen from the stairs : an old man dressed in what seemed to have been once a woman's caped cloak, the black stripes and the green ground of the pattern equally almost obliterated by grease ; an old woman with a nut-cracker nose and chin, which almost dipped into the filthy slush into which she peered, and dirty flesh as well as a scrap or two of dirty linen showing through the slashes of her burst gown, over which, for "warmth's sake," she wore a tippet of ragged sack-cloth ; and a flock of frowsy, touzled-headed youngsters—a good many with no covering to the touzled heads—of every variety of grimy tatteredness : some with their petticoats kilted or their trousers tucked up mid-thigh high, but most with petticoats and trousers which saved their owners trouble in that way, through being normally abbreviated to the regulation wading-measure. With their bags and their biscuits—both, but for scraps of miscellaneous material put in loose to stop the leaks, very much like Danaïdian buckets—with their old hats, and kettles, and pots and pans—the mudlarks, young and old, groped backwards and forwards along the hard, which plum-pudding-stoned their bare feet with little pebbles, paddled in the chilly slush, or splashed like shrimpers in the margin of the water.

Everything almost seemed fish that came to their very miserable nets. If any one wants to know the value of seeming rubbish, the straits to which people are put sometimes to procure a subsistence in this vast "London"—whose very vastness, however, through the multitude of paltry waifs which it furnishes, enables a little army of human strays to live after a fashion : a miserable fashion, but nowhere else could such a multitude of such people live in any fashion—let him take his seat in one of those queer beer-and-tobacco-scented, many-angled, notched-tabled rooms of public-houses, often weather-boarded, whose backs give on the river, and watch mudlarks at work. They pounce upon little knobs of coal as if they were "real Whitby jet" brooches ; lovingly coil up limp lengths of sodden rope that look like drowned, putrefying snakes ; wrangle over broken bones which starving dogs would relinquish to one another without a snarl ; make prize of bits of wood which seem about as valuable ; exult over a rusty iron bolt or lock, and can scarce believe their delighted eyes when their grubby hands have fished up half a dozen verdigrised copper nails.

Watch the poor creatures clustering about that heeled-over schooner, out of which coal is being whipped ; see them clambering up the stranded black coal-lighters, which, though "empty," may still hold coal that will be worth their taking ; feeling in the muddy channel meandering in front of the shipwrights' closed dock, and reproachfully eyeing the shut gates which bar them out from precious spoil ; creeping as near as the indignantly barking dogs on board will permit, to the high-piled hay-and-straw and other craft beached stern on in ranks upon the hards, lying broadside and lobside beneath the dangling crane-chains of many-floored warehouses and mills, flush with the water when the tide is in, or jammed into dark clefts between those towering piles. And what do the poor creatures get for their dismal groping in all weathers ? If a mudlark clears sixpence in a day, he thinks himself a most lucky mudlark—often he gets far less than that—sometimes he gets nothing.

The incoming tide gradually drives the mudlarks ashore. They tramp in file up the stairs, printing fresh muddy footprints on the stones, and sprinkling them with unfragrant drippings from their drenched garments.

"What luck, old gal ?" asks a waterman of the nut-cracker-visaged old woman.

"Same 's ever," she answers at once, without looking round, in a tone almost too sleepy to be peevish.

Her bag looks full, but if her luck to-day has only been her usual fortune, the bulky find under which she bends cannot be very valuable—if one may judge by her appearance.

She slinks off to her lair, followed by an imp bearing a rusty crumpled colander, piled with its find. Its sex is indistinguishable. It has long mud-hued hair hanging down in a mat over its shoulders. Through the hair one gets a glimpse of a never-washed little face, whose only sign of intelligence is an occasional glance of wicked knowingness. The imp is clad in a corduroy waistcoat, sleeved like the round-hatted old waterman's ; the sleeves are turned back at the wrists, to enable the grubby little hands at the end of stick-like little arms to find their way out. What other clothes, if any, the imp has on, it is impossible to say, since the waistcoat comes down to its kibed little heels—bare of everything except ingrained dirt, thickly lacquered with a fresh layer of malodorous slime—like the Ulster great-coats in which men make Noah's-ark guys of themselves now-a-days; and though some of the bone buttons are off, the capacious overlapping double breast quite hides the no doubt skinny little frame within.

"Poor ole Sue!" said the round-hatted old waterman; "an' yet she worn't a bad-looking young 'ooman once upon a time."

"Well, you ain't a chicken, but that must ha' been long afore your time, Sam," interjected a younger comrade who had joined Sam on the stairs-head.

"No, 'tain't," answered Sam. "I don't mean as I can remember her so 's to 've kep' company wi' 'er, or the like o' that; but when I was about 'alf-way through my 'prenticeship, she come to live 'erc. She were fresh from the country, jist married, an' an unkimmon pretty young wife she were, though she do look a deal more like a guy now, or a Punch-and-Judy show."

"Boat, sir—boat?" the watermen had greeted me with, when I first made my appearance on the stairs, and they had naturally looked rather glumpy when they found that I did not want one, especially since they could not make out what I did want—except to stare at the river, and perhaps listen to them. The round-hatted old fellow answered me civilly enough however when, interested by what he had said, I tried to get into conversation with him.

"About ole Sue? Oh, yes, I can tell ye all I know about her, sir, if you want to know it, but I can do talkin' as well walkin' as standin'. I was jist thinkin' o' goin' 'ome to git a bit of a warm, for it's no good waitin' about 'erc any longer sich a day as this."

I proposed that, instead of going home for his "warm," he should have a drop of hot spiced beer in the river-side room from which I had recently issued.

He accepted my invitation nothing loth, and thus discoursed ovr his steaming pewter:—

"As I was a-sayin', sir, I remember poor old Sue when she was fust married. From the country she come. The chap she was married to was a ship's butcher, leastways the son o' one, and went down into the country to look arter beasts an' so on, an' that's 'ow he fell in wi' 'er. There was a good many young chaps envied him his luck when they saw the wife he'd got, but there was never a word said agin 'er—not that way. They was like a pair o' turtle-doves or two young pigeons, as the Scriptur' says, when they was fust married, and a nice little family they 'ad—most on 'em gals, as took arter their mother in their looks. The young chap went pardners wi' his father, an' they was goin' ahead like steam, when all of a suddint they blew up, jist like one o' them precious kittles that's spilt our trade. The ole feller never 'eld his 'ead hup agin. The young chap 'ired hisself as journeyman to another butcher, but he'd 'ad one for 'isself 'too. To keep his sperrits up he took to drinkin', an' beat his wife an' starved his children. At last he went downright to the bad—ran away an' was never heerd on arterwards; an' nobody missed him, 'cept 'twas Sue. His youngsters had got to 'ate him, an' make game on him when he were too far gone to drub 'em; but she'd stuck to him through all, an' kep' fond on him, some'ow, for all his drubbin's. They're queer cattle, is women. There's my ole 'ooman, now, as I never laid a finger on, or crossed 'er—not to speak on—in a single thing she wished; an' yet she hain't 'alf the respec' for me as them as has cotched Tartars has for them. She wouldn't order me about as she do, if I'd given 'er every now and then a jolly good beatin'.

" 'A 'ooman, a dog, and a walnut-tree,
The more you hit 'em, the better they be."

"I don't 'old, though, with them as is for ever thrashin' their missises. They gits used to it, and so it loses its effec'—but now and again it's as well to let a 'ooman feel the weight o' your 'and, jist to show 'er who's master."

I quoted the well-known sentiment, "The man who lays," etc.

"Oh, yes," continued the old man, at first in a tone of contemptuous offendedness, "I've heerd the sailor chap a-spoutin' that at the theaytur. That's all wery well in a play, but sailors is as free wi' their fists as other folks when a 'ooman riles 'em, an' if you was to know 'ow haggerawatin' our wives sometimes is—I don't know 'ow 't may be wi' ladies—you'd wonder they didn't git walloped horfener than they does. It's all wery fine to talk about not layin' yer 'and on a 'ooman, but what are you to do, if you can't keep the 'ooman from layin' of 'er 'ands on you? But I was a-talkin' about Sue, poor ole gal. There she were left wi' all them bairns to look arter, an' 'ard she tried. Work her fingers off, she would, but as they grewed hup they was no comfort to 'er. She'd no time to look arter 'em, you see, when she was a-slavin' at the wash-tub. They run about the streets, an' did as they liked. There was on'y two boys. One on 'em went to sea, an' we never heerd no more on him. I don't know what become o' t'other. There was 'alf a dozen gals or so. None on 'em come to no good. Some on 'em married, an' some on 'em didn't, but there worn't much to choose betwixt 'em. 'Tain't to be wondered at that Sue got to be a bit too fond o' drink, when she could git it, poor ole girl. You see, they give it 'er at the 'ouses where she went washin' an' sich, an' so she got to know the comfort on it. Folks said as she drank when she was fust married, but it's my belief as 'twas all a fib. It was the women as said it, as was enwious of the colour she 'ad. A fine 'igh colour it were, but not a bit more like drinkin' nor a rose is like a radish. She were fair druv to drinkin', was poor ole Sue, by her 'ard life, an' then the wery folks as 'ad give her the gin at their 'ouses wouldn't give her no more work. She couldn't git no more washin', nor charin'; nor nuffink. Down she sunk, poor ole gal, till she come to mudlarkin', an' that she've been starvin' at this ten year. 'Ow she 'olds hout's a myst'ry to me—a frost'll finish her hoff some night, I expec'—but she must ha' 'ad a rare constitooshun to stand all she's stood—sorrer, an' slavin', an' drinkin', an' starvin'. A gran' thing is a fine constitooshun, sir; but them as has got 'em is mostly fools—they take liberties with themselves. If they didn't, it's my belief as they'd live pretty nigh for ever, if they didn't git drowned, or killed by axedint some'ow."

"Oh, that young limb," my informant proceeded, when I asked about the old woman's young companion. "That's poor ole Sue's youngest daughter's youngest. A reg'lar character he is, the owdacious young toad! I guess he's forgotten more wickedness than you ever knowed, sir. He 'on't be a mudlark long arter poor ole Sue's gone.

A thief, an' wuss, that's what he'll be. He's tried his 'and at it a'ready, the sarcy young rascal! Poor ole Sue might be comfor'bler if she'd let him steal, but that she won't, an' the on'y good thing about the young scamp is that he minds his granny."

"If you'd like to see where the ole 'ooman lives, there it is," said my waterman, pointing up the lane, when we were parting at the door of the hostelry.

What he pointed at was the dilapidated, pigsty-like, built-out back-kitchen of a tumble-down house, which could find no paying tenants even in that densely populated neighbourhood, and had been appropriated accordingly by squatters.

"An' if the ole 'ooman's in as you go by, an' you've a shillin' to spare, you might do wuss than if you give it to her, sir," the old man, who had grown sentimental over his spiced beer, remarked in conclusion. "She were a wery fine young 'ooman once upon a time."

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

THE BOOK OF FATE.

SHE stood at the door of the cottage. A clear day. She could see miles of the bare coast-line guarded by its savage battlements of rock; the busy port of Kingshaven, nestling in its natural bay, and behind, long stretches of moorland melting into fields of ripe grain, which rolled upward to the mountains, whose bright green plains hung upon the edge of black valleys. Before her, the opal sea, always restless, often furious, flecked with foam and fishing smacks. The colour deepened as the waters reached the horizon, and through a white haze mingled with the sky. All the wrath of the sea appeared to be close at hand; out yonder there seemed to be a placid mere, from which came long sweeping waves, graceful, and so calm in their strength, lifting their white crests, beneath which flashed the colours of the rainbow, trembling an instant in the sunlight, then dipping and curving with such gentle lines shoreward, that it seemed a lover in his happiest mood hastening to kiss his mistress. But as they neared the shore the waves became turbulent, rose in white jagged points, broke in spiteful foam upon the rocks, and retired moaning, disappointed. Within that hazy horizon line those who looked from shore saw, for themselves or those who were dear to them, rough work and danger enough; beyond it, the discontented or ambitious imagined mysterious possibilities, and gazed long, with vague yearnings; until, by-and-by, quickened by necessity or hope, some broke the ties of the old home, and sailed out into the mists of new worlds, to find fortune or despair.

At times Teenie was conscious of these vague yearnings, and became restless as the sea she loved.

There was a large dove-cot above the door of the cottage; the pigeons were continually fluttering about the roof, cooing and pluming themselves. They were Teenie's pets; they would gather around her, sit on her shoulders, on her arms, and peck from her hand, but they took flight as soon as a second person appeared. This familiarity with animals was regarded as another element of uncanniness in her character.

The pigeons were flocking about her now. One fine fellow, with a grand sheeny blue breast, was marching up and down before her, cr-r-ooing, dipping his head at intervals to give emphasis to his guttural notes, and patronising his mates with all the pomposity of the provost at a tea-meeting. Teenie spoke to her pets occasionally, but she was much occupied looking down the road towards the village which lay below her, Kingshaven behind it, yellow and black in the sunlight, its church tower and dissenting steeple rising sharp and clear against the sky.

the other now playing with the fringe of the little blue scarf which was pinned round her neck, and again raised to shade her eyes from the bright rays of the sun. A tall sinewy lass, with wavy fair hair, and plenty of it, hanging down her back; big blue eyes; soft rounded features, sun-browned and healthful. Her dress a simple stuff gown, apron, white stockings, and thick-soled shoes. There was a sense of grace and strength in her appearance—beauty, in fact; the light of blissful ignorance of sorrow in her eyes, and a smile on her lips.

She saw a woman with a square yellow basket on her arm, marching up the hill. Teenie's whole face beamed with delight; pressing her elbows to her sides, her pets were scattered right and left as she sprang forward to meet the woman, all the poetry of emotion in her joyful bounding pace.

"Have you gotten it, Allie?" she cried.

Alison nodded, and Teenie clapped her hands gleefully.

"Eh, but that's fine! Come on; let's try it at once!"

Catching the woman's sleeve, she dragged her towards the house, impatient of her pace, although Alison Burges, having the bones and muscles of a man, walked with the stride of one. Alison was about sixty—clean, neat, and fresh, from the white cap with its huge frill on her head to the clumsy but serviceable boots on her feet. She had long dry features, marked with red marble lines; pale grey eyes, in which there was plenty of shrewdness, but not a glimpse of tenderness apparent. She yielded to the impulsive girl, but neither smiled nor frowned.

Inside the house, Alison placed the basket on the table, wiped her dry mouth with the corner of her apron, rested her hands on her sides, and then, shaking her head slowly, she exclaimed, in a sing-song tone which might have indicated pity or surprise, or both—

"Eh, Teenie, Teenie, you may die for want o' breath, but no for want o' wiles."

Teenie laughed, and said, "Haste you."

Alison deliberately sat down on a wooden chair, the back of which formed a rough imitation of a lyre. Then she lifted her skirts, and after much fumbling found a capacious leathern pouch, from which she produced a small pamphlet, printed on dingy coarse paper. This Alison handled respectfully, and laying it on her knee with much care smoothed out the creases.

The sun seemed to flash on Teenie's face. She dropped on her knees, crying—

"Let's see it; let's see it!"

It was one of those penny chap-books which at one time were extensively sold throughout the country by pedlars, and which constituted the chief literature of the people, affording them, in the long winter evenings, delight, wonder, and material for conversation when they gathered round the kitchen fire. The chap-books comprised sheets of songs, anecdotes—not always particular in regard to delicacy—tales of the Covenant Martyrs, sermons, biographies (one sheet contained the lives of all the Kings of England, from Arthur to George III.), and half a dozen different instructors in the arts of fortune-telling and charm-working, each professing to unveil the future to the duller eyes. Amongst the sheets of verse, "Chevy Chase" and "Thrummy Cap" were the most popular. Of the serious works a favourite one was "The Life and Wonderful Prophecies of Donald Cargill, who was Executed at the Cross of Edinburgh on the 26th July, 1680, for his Adherence to the Covenant and Work of Reformation." The most read of the ghost-stories was "The Laird of Cool's Ghost;" whilst by far the best relished of the humorous sheets was "The Life and Wonderful Sayings of Geordie Buchanan, the King's Fool." That was George Buchanan the poet and historian, who, when tutor to the Scottish Solomon, proved his independence by quickening the wits of his majesty by the help of a birch—and he became famous amongst his countrymen in later days as the King's Fool!

The chief favourite of the fortune-telling sheets was the one which Alison held in her hand, entitled "Napoleon Bonaparte's Book of Fate." Beneath the title was a smudgy wood engraving which represented Bonaparte, in dancing pumps with round buckles, standing on a rock; arms folded on his breast, head bowed, and the smear of ink intended to indicate his eyes, supposed to be gazing sadly into space, or at four black spots beneath him which symbolised anything the imagination of the onlooker might suggest.

Turning over the leaf Teenie saw a curious table, called grandly "THE ORACULUM." She had not the least idea what that hard word meant, and therefore looked with some awe at the mystery.

The table was divided into small squares, each occupied by a letter of the alphabet; along the top were a series of asterisks arranged in various forms, thus—

* * * *	* * * * * *	* * * * *	* * * * * *	* * * * * *
------------------	----------------------	--------------------	----------------------	----------------------

and so on. The left-hand side of the page was occupied by sixteen interesting questions:—1. Shall I obtain my wish? 2. Shall I have success in my undertakings? 3. Shall I gain or lose in my cause? 4. Shall I have to live in foreign parts? etc.

This looked delightfully cabalistic and promised some amusement.

But there was no suspicion of fun in Alison's mind. She understood the working of the oracle and respected it. She made Teenie write at random four lines of dots. They counted the first line and found that the number of the dots was even, so Teenie was told to mark two dots opposite the end of the first line. The number of the next line was odd, so one dot was scored beneath the first two; the third line even—two dots again; the fourth line odd, which gave one dot; the whole producing a figure like this— . . . and corresponding with the second square of asterisks.

"Now," said Alison solemnly, and lowering her

 "Whatever your desires are, for the present  decline them."

The light of expectation and hope left the girl's face. She knotted the fringe of her scarf and absently tried to unravel it. Then she laughed as if at her own doubts, and said boldly—

"We'll try it again, Ailie."

Alison was astounded at this irreverence.

"You're not allowed to try the same question twice in the same day; it's no lucky, and it would spoil the charm."

"THEN WE'LL TRY ANOTHER ONE."

voice as if fearing to mar the spell which was being worked, "what question would you like to speir?"

A moment of hesitation, and Teenie pointed to the first question—

"Shall I obtain my wish?"

Alison traced with her forefinger the line of the question till it came to the letter B, beneath the asterisks corresponding with the form of Teenie's six dots. She wetted her thumb, and slowly turned over the leaves till she came to the page at the top of which was a big black B. Down the side of the page were asterisks similar to those of the "Oraculum," and opposite the second figure was the answer to Teenie's question—

"Then we'll try another one," cried fearless Teenie.

The dotting process was repeated, and after grave consideration Teenie sought the answer to this important question—

"Does the person love and regard me?"

The answer was found—"This love is from the heart and will continue until death."

"That's fine!" she cried, delighted and ready to believe in the oracle, now that its promise accorded with her wishes. She repeated the gratifying words with a kind of wondering pleasure, as if listening to some one.

She would try her luck again, and now, with something of the reckless or defiant spirit in which the gambler throws his last stake, she demanded—

"Will the marriage be prosperous?"

The answer was given—"Various misfortunes will attend this marriage."

"It's just nonsense," Teenie exclaimed, jumping up, indignant. But the cloud passed immediately; she stooped and whispered to Alison, "And the book does not tell true—for I've got my wish, and there he is at the door!"

CHAPTER THE FOURTH. YOUNG DALMAHOY.

It was Walter Burnett, Dalmahoy's son, who was at the door. And what was the Laird's son doing there? People had been asking that question frequently of late, with suggestive looks, sly winks, or foreboding shakes of the head. There was no particular reason for this questioning, except that he was the Laird's son and she was Dan Thorston's daughter. But Walter—or young Dalmahoy, as he was generally called to distinguish him from his father, old Dalmahoy—Walter had been from childhood accustomed to visit the cottage.

He used to go out fishing with Thorston, and Teenie—a bare-legged cutty then, flying about in healthy recklessness—used to find bait for the big boy, who brought her handfuls of sweets in exchange. Often she would go out in the boat with them, and she would mend Walter's lines, or bait the hooks when the fish was taking fast, whilst Thorston sat guiding the bark, watching the sail, and attending to his own lines. The boat leaping over the waves, the brown sail flapping between the man and the children, the latter would gossip in this fashion:—

She: "Ha'e you got a bite?"

He: "I think there was a nibble."

"Your bait will be off."

"No, I saw the float bobbin'—there!—aha, I've got him this time!"

He would draw in the line, hand-over-hand, she bending over the side, eyes wide, eagerly watching the arrival of the prize. Then at the first silvery flash in the water, she would clap her hands, crying—

"Eh, it's a fine ane—it's a codlin—ca' canny or you'll miss him."

That accident happened occasionally, when Walter in his enthusiasm, panting and anxious, sensible that the hook was not secure in the gills of the fish, was straining his strength as if to convey the energy of his own desire into the line; the prize rose to the surface, half out of the water, and then—snap! a silver gleam, and fish and hook disappeared, a wave washing the boy's heated face with spray.

"Hoot, you fool!" was Teenie's exclamation,

"you've lost him, and he was such a bonnie one. You'll no get another chance like that."

And she would turn contemptuously from him to the lines, whilst Walter, looking sheepish and disappointed, would humbly prepare to try his fortune again.

"You canna catch a' the fish in the sea," Dan would say consolingly, as he quietly hauled in a brace of whittings.

The brave breeze, the refreshing salt smell of the sea, the inspiring pulsations of the boat, and another "bite," presently dispelled from the boy's mind all remembrance of his disappointment, and from Teenie's all sense of scorn.

"There now!" he would shout, his cheeks glowing with joy, as success rewarded his next effort.

"Man, but that's fine!" says Teenie, sharing his joy.

There never was the least shyness between them, and no thought of degree. The only difference Teenie was conscious of observing between Walter and the other boys of the neighbourhood was, that his clothes were never ragged and seldom patched—they were patched sometimes. The material of them—a rough tweed—was not in childish eyes a bit finer than the coarse homespun of the other loons. Then, like them, he went to the parish school, got his palmies like the rest, scrambled and fought amongst them, conquered or got beaten just like an ordinary boy. It was the proper training for a sturdy youth; and even if he had been in the least priggish or "upsetting," he would have been speedily taught, by the fists of his schoolmates, that in the republican playground the strong arm carries the day.

After the parish school—at which girls as well as boys obtained their first lessons, and competed in the same classes—came the Academy at Kingshaven. Every morning Walter, with his brothers and sisters, took his breakfast of porridge and milk in the kitchen—sometimes, as an indulgence, he was allowed to have a cup of coffee—and then he trudged off to the Academy, four miles distant. Besides books he carried in his satchel his "twal-hours" or "piece"—plain bannocks and cheese generally; or, rare delight, a penny in his pouch, with which to buy for his noonday meal the coveted delicacy, a treacle-bapp—a scone of coarse flour cut open and spread with treacle.

On his way home he would halt at the cottage, to hear from Dan some wild story of his whaling adventures, or to tell Teenie how many marbles he had won during the play-hour, or maybe to play a game at "ringgy" with her, or to help her in making some alteration in the dovecot. Then he would trudge on to his motherless home to supper—six o'clock—the preparation of his lessons for the following day, "a chapter," prayers, and bed. Occasionaly the evenings were diversified by a merry hour spent with his cousin Grace Wishart, to whom he was accustomed to appeal for help in all his boyish troubles. She was his senior by two or three years—a vast period in childish eyes—and her quiet ways made her appear to Walter quite woman. Teenie was his playmate; Grace was his guide and counsellor.

On one occasion, for some slight ailment he was taken by his nurse to Dr. Lumsden—then beginning to be recognised as the established surgeon of the district. Walter's old nurse, who believed him to be the most wonderful boy that had ever been born, assured the doctor that the "laddie fashed himself far ower muckle with books."

"You mean that he studies too much," said Dr. Lumsden pompously.

"Jist that—he's aye reading and stealing candles to read with when a' decent folk are bedded."

"Indeed! and what does he read?"

"I dinna ken—he reads the Bible for ae thing."

"A very excellent work," said the doctor, with something like patronage of the book and the boy in his tone.

"And he reads Burns."

The doctor looked disappointed.

"And he reads Shakespeare, and that's a' I ken about."

The doctor lifted his nose contemptuously. He was a man of middle-age, who by very severe effort had passed through college, and obtained his degree. The moment he had touched his first fee, he felt that he was a superior person to all and everything around him. He knew little of Burns, for he never had time to indulge in miscellaneous reading; nothing of Shakespeare except by report; and he was conscious of being practically much better than either of these persons—morally, infinitely their superior.

"Very trivial reading indeed," he said scornfully.

Had she told him that the boy had been reading the Materia Medica, he would have called that study; but the idea of applying the word study to such ephemeral works as those of Burns and Shakespeare!

"His stomach is disordered—he only needs a powder," concluded the doctor decisively.

The powder was compounded, the boy never took it, and he recovered!

By-and-by came the important change from home to the university, and the decision as to a profession. The Laird had certain ideas about minerals, and therefore wished Walter to become an engineer. Walter was delighted with the idea, and for a while devoted himself arduously to physics and mechanical science. But, slowly at first, and then rapidly, there took place a transformation in the character of the youth—it was really a development—and to the surprise of everybody he determined to enter the ministry. He had been always regarded as such a light feather of a youth, stirred and influenced by every wind that blew, that it was difficult for those who knew him to imagine him capable of fulfilling the grave duties of a parish minister.

The Laird was angry, and all the more so that his neighbours were quite satisfied that Walter was unfitted for the services and responsibilities he was so boldly and recklessly, not to say presumptuously, about to undertake.

It was not the responsibility which affected the Laird, but the destruction of a long-cherished scheme.

Walter, however, was resolute, and so he applied himself to the study of theology—still keeping up his acquaintance with Burns and Shakespeare. He was full of enthusiastic aspirations, but was curiously unconscious of his own growth. He never thought of himself as a man, and he paid a kind of boyish respect to his seniors. He sometimes had visions of marriage, a happy home in some quiet manse near the sea, and great work to be done in helping others; but that was such a long way off in the future that the visions were very dim. So it was that he was very slow to realise the fact that Teenie had become a woman. But a word was spoken—"Some smart lad will carry her off before long," said one of his college friends in the course of a summer day's ramble—and Walter awakened from a dream. He felt shy, and amused with himself; he felt awkward, and puzzled with himself.

Teenie went blithely to the door, and threw it open.

"I knew you would come," she said, looking up with her clear frank eyes into the face of the man.

He was a tall fellow, dressed in grey tweed. The welcome pleased him, and with the smiling curiosity of one who is amused by the drollery of a child, he asked—

"And how did you know I would come, Teenie?"

"Because I dreamed you were sailing away out on the sea, never to come back, and dreams go by contraries!"

"Were you frightened when you saw me sailing away?"

"No; what would I be frightened for?—Hoosh, cat!—she's always trying to worry the doos."

Teenie threw a stone at a large tortoise-shell cat, which had been patiently watching an opportunity to pounce upon one of the pigeons.

"Frightened that I might not return," he said, continuing the conversation.

"Oh, but I knew you would come back."

"You would trust me then, no matter what others might say?"

"I suppose so," she answered somewhat carelessly, for she did not observe the seriousness of his tone.

"But if I did not come back, you would be sorry?"

"I dare say I would, for a while at any rate."

"Only for a while!" he cried, making a wry face.

"Yes; what more?—did you not tell me that we would be awful miserable creatures if we could not forget?"

"So we would; but for all that I would not like you to forget me, for that would be a sign you did not care much for me."

"Oh, but I do care a great deal for you."

"More than for anybody else?"

"I cannot say that" (thoughtfully).

With a mock tragical air he said—

"Would you die for me?"

"I am quite sure I would not," she answered with disagreeable frankness.

"What!" he exclaimed, laughing, "if you saw me in the bay there, and the waves dashing me about like a shuttlecock, and heard me crying, 'Teenie, Teenie, come, or I'll be drowned!'—wouldn't you try to save me?"

"To be sure I would, and I would do the same for any other poor creature in such a pass."

Although he had been speaking apparently in jest, he did not quite enjoy the answer. Only a little while ago she had been questioning the future about her relations with this man; and yet here she was speaking as if she cared no more for him than for anybody else! But she had neither desire nor intention to deceive him. She had a child's reckless way of uttering the thought which happened to be uppermost, without the least speculation as to the effect her words might produce on the hearer. She saw that he was not satisfied.

"Why do you ask me these questions," she said, "if you do not like me to answer them?"

"But I do like you to answer them, only—in another way. Let us go down to the bay, and I'll tell you a story."

"Yes, and I'll tell you the ploy I had with Ailie this morning.—I'll be back in a while, Ailie," she added, thrusting her head in at the door.

Then she darted off after Walter, who was walking towards the path which led down the face of the rock to the bay. She passed him, and sprang down the steep path; he followed quickly, and yet was far behind her. She seemed to bound along with the buoyancy and brightness of a wavelet upon which the sun is flashing. He watched her, admiration and a kind of wonder in his eyes.

She stood on the yellow sand, throwing back her long hair, as the wind tossed it on her face and round her neck—looking up and laughing at the laggard. What could he make of this bright creature?—at one moment she was such a child in thought and desire, and in the next, a woman of prompt word and action.

"Is it no fine?" she cried pointing to the sea, her eyes reflecting its colours; "do you no hear the waters bamfling on the stones, and do you no see the bonnie tarns of silver and gold the sun is making out yonder? Oh, I would just like to be aye sailing, sailing on the bonnie water."

"Aye, but there are storms and wrecks as well as sunshine, Teenie."

"What a pity!" she said, her face darkening whilst she continued to gaze with vague questioning across the sea. "What's at the other side—land, and folk something like ourselves?"

"Yes, and water again, and land; and if you went on far enough, you would just come back to where you started from."

She laughed, and the cloud passed away from eyes and face.

"It's scarcely worth while starting then."

She seated herself on a large stone beside a boat which lay dry on the sand, smelling of tar and fish. Walter sat on the boat, and tiny waves rippled up to their feet, casting bits of sea-weed and specks of foam towards them. The brown rocks, with their many black clefts, rose up high around them; and the two seemed to be shut into a little world of their own, from which there was only one outlet—the big one, so easy to pass, opening upon the great sea, and its storms and wrecks, as well as its sunshine.

END OF CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

LEECH-GOSSIP.

FROM an early period in the history of medical science, we find the leech to figure as a valuable adjunct to the surgeon's repository. Indeed, so fully have its merits and usefulness been recognised, that there are not wanting those who maintain that this curious worm has been specially created for the purpose for which it is commonly employed. But zoological science gives no countenance to such a belief. Whilst we may recognise close adaptation of means to any particular end, we are not entitled to regard the animal or the vegetable world as primarily subservient, through any of their members, to the many ends and expedients which the fertile mind and ingenuity of man may conceive or invent. If we so regard animals or plants, we necessarily lose sight of the great uniformity of structure and principle of design seen throughout either kingdom of living beings; and we at the same time neglect the laws and principles according to which the great life-realms of nature are directed, and by which they are harmoniously controlled.

But apart from these very necessary observations, we certainly find that the entire structure of the leech is pre-eminently adapted for the special and particular use to which in the human economy it is applied. We may commence our cursory examination of its life and habits by making some inquiry as to its place in the series of animal forms. Thus we first find that the leeches form a very distinct and well-marked order in the class of the "worms." And this leech-order is primarily distinguished by the possession of a sucker-like disc at one or both extremities of the body. Hence the leeches are sometimes collectively known as Suctoria, or "Suctorial" worms; whilst the name of Discophora, or "disc-bearers," is also applied to the group in allusion to the presence of the sucking-discs.

The group of leeches includes several other kinds besides the two which figure in the surgeon's list of armamentaria. The two "official" species are the Sanguisuga officinalis of Savigny—the "speckled leech"—and the "green leech" (Sanguisuga medicinalis). Both species are imported into England chiefly from Hamburg, but the former appears to be an inhabitant of the south of Europe, whilst the latter is found for the most part in the northern regions of the Continent.

The other species of "leeches" comprise forms which are not used in medicine, and which exhibit a widely different structure from the official members of the group. Such are certain forms which live as parasites on shell-fish, on water-snails, and on fishes; but there are also forms more nearly allied to the medicinal leeches. Examples of these latter species are seen in the horse-leech of our ponds and ditches (Hæmopsis), and in the land-leeches of Ceylon and India.

Directing our attention, however, to the ordinary and familiar leech, we find evidence of its worm-like nature in the ringed or jointed structure of its body. At first sight one would hardly think that the body was jointed at all, so closely set are the rings or joints. But if we look closely at the body, and watch it especially when in movement, we shall be able to perfectly see the segments. The joints are exceedingly numerous, and vary in number from seventy to a hundred. The body itself is flattened on its under surface, and convex on its upper surface; and in coloration, as indicated by their common names, the two medicinal leeches exhibit some difference. Thus the green leech possesses a uniform olive-green colour, whilst the speckled leech is of a greenish-yellow colour spotted with black.

At either extremity of the contractile muscular body, we find the "suckers," by means of which the locomotion or movements of these creatures are performed. And we are all familiar with the nature of these movements, since the phrase "leech-like motion" has become a familiar expression of every-day life. The one sucker is first securely fixed, and then the other sucker and the hinder part of the body are drawn up towards the fixed point, and the body at this stage assumes the form of an inverted letter U. The hinder sucker is fixed in its turn, and the front sucker now pushes itself forward to fix once more at a further distance from its former point of attachment. And, by successive contractions and expansions, the animal contrives to move quickly around its natural or artificial habitat.

Beginning with the front or anterior sucker, we find at this point one of the chief and most characteristic features of the creature. This feature consists in the "triradiate" or star-shaped form of the mouth, which opens in the middle of the front sucker. And within this triangular or star-shaped mouth a curious set of three sharp jaws is found. Each jaw is of a half-moon or crescentic shape, the convex or rounded edge of the jaw being placed uppermost in the mouth; and this edge is seen to be provided with two rows of exceedingly minute conical teeth. Indeed, this cutting edge of each jaw might be compared to a doubly serrated and semicircular saw, the teeth of which are placed in the most favourable position for rapidly and effectually dividing any substance against which they may be made to act.

The mouth leads into a short muscular throat, which in turn expands into a capacious stomach of curious conformation. The stomach of the leech, without the slightest exaggeration, may be said to occupy nearly the whole interior surface and cavity of the body. And we further find that the capacity of this receptacle is greatly increased by the presence of a number of side-pouches, which open from the stomach, and serve to contain a large supply of the peculiar nutriment on which the leech subsists. This capacious stomach with its side-pouches is suspended within a simple body-cavity, and from its peculiar form admits of a very large quantity of blood being stored up within a comparatively limited space.

Then, lastly, we find the leech to be provided with a system of vessels, by means of which the circulation of the blood is performed; and its breathing is provided for by a series of little sacs, or pouches, situated in the sides of the body, and which open externally by small apertures termed "stigmata." In these organs it is believed that the nutritive fluid, or blood, is exposed to the purifying influences of the surrounding water. The general surface of the body may also be regarded as assisting materially in this latter process. And, to complete the list of structural organs and systems, we may notice the possession by the leeches of a distinct nervous system, situated on the floor of the body, and consisting of a double chain of nerve-cords. The only organs of sense that appear to be represented are the eyes, which exist in the form of a number of simple eyes, or "ocelli," situated on the upper aspect of the ill-defined head or anterior extremity.

Having thus gained some idea of leech-structure, we may shortly observe the mode in which the peculiar functions of its life are performed. By aid of the front sucker, the skin to which the leech attaches itself is made tight and tensely stretched; and then the three semicircular jaws with their sharp teeth are made, through their powerful muscles, to play with a sawing motion against the tightly stretched skin. And having in this manner obtained access to the bloodvessels below, the sucker-like action is again called into operation to draw the blood from the wound and force it into the capacious stomach.

The three teeth of the leech are so placed in the mouth that the wound resulting from their action is of a Y-shape, the three limbs of the letter being formed each by the cut of a single jaw. This description of wound, it is to be noted, is of a kind which permits a large flow of blood, and at the same time is exceedingly difficult to close. It is thus somewhat analogous to the well-known bayonet-wound, which is similarly of a three-cornered or triangular shape. The three flaps of the wound meet in the middle point of the Y, and there is thus a free outlet for the blood; whilst the edges of such a puncture are conversely difficult to approximate with a view to their union and healing.

The side-pouches of the stomach are first filled with blood, and then the latter cavity is itself replenished; and it is said that the blood may be stored up even for months within these pouches, the fluid being allowed at intervals, and for the purposes of digestion and nutrition, to escape into the stomach. In this way, therefore, the leech lays up a store of nutriment; although, when employed in the interests of humanity, we take means to insure the rejection of the blood, and so, by inducing hunger, again incite the creature to renew its repast.

The quantity of blood extracted by leeches varies in different instances, and under different circumstances; but, as nearly as can be estimated, the average quantity extends from a drachm to half an ounce, or even more.

A few words on the mode of obtaining these useful creatures, and on the chief sources of supply, may conclude our brief gossip.

The medicinal leeches are chiefly fished for by practised professional leech-gatherers, a people sui generis, and who stand out from among the peasantry of their districts as a decidedly "peculiar people."

They obtain the leeches by wading in the pools and marshes of the country or district, the animals adhering to their limbs, and making their presence known by the sharp bite so familiar to those who have been subjected to the operation of blood-letting. But habit becomes a second nature, and the leech-gatherer does not mind the petty annoyance of his craft; and having obtained a sufficient number, he returns to land and, with a certain art acquired by long practice, detaches the leeches, and once more goes a-fishing.

The leech-catching community of Continental districts presents, as a whole, a peculiarly hectic or anæmic appearance. The people are pale and sallow—a condition probably determined by the nature of their avocation; and this appearance is said to be hereditary, and to be even witnessed in the descendants of the craft who do not pursue the trade of their fathers.

The after-treatment of the leeches is quite as important as their capture. When prepared for export, they are packed carefully in wooden tubs containing moist clay. Each tub contains about 2,000 leeches, and during the voyage or transit, the leeches are carefully watched and tended, the sick, dead, or dying being removed from the tubs, and the health of the community being thus insured.

Statistics of the leech-traffic give us enormous quantities as the consumption in the various cities of Europe and America. Thus Paris alone is said to use 3,000,000 leeches every year; whilst London imported, a few years ago, about 7,200,000 annually. Such quantities necessarily represent very large sums of money.

The chief sources of supply of these useful animals are the countries and districts of central Europe, which have Hamburg as an exporting town; but the midland and south of France, Spain and Portugal, and Russia also contribute to supply the demand.

In some of the Cumberland lakes official leeches are still to be found; but, as in other matters relating to animal economy, the cultivation of these forms has never been attended to, and the British species have nearly died out.

Wordsworth mentions this latter fact in his "Excursion," where he relates his meeting with the leech-gatherer, who said —"that gathering leeches far and wide

He travelled: stirring thus about his feet
The waters of the pools where they abide.
'Once I could meet with them on every side,
But they have dwindled long by slow decay,
Yet still I persevere and find them where I may.'"

ANDREW WILSON.

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—HOW HE GOT INTO DEBT.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART THE SECOND.

E are now in a position clearly to appreciate the distinction between Funded and Unfunded Debt—viz., that in the latter Government contracts to repay both principal and interest, in the former interest only is provided for.

Now this system of the non-payment of the principal, which constitutes the funding system, was not the result of any specific policy; it was no sudden financial discovery, but it grew up gradually out of the crude and primitive expedients we have already adverted to. And this is how the system was developed.

Our readers are well aware that now-a-days the revenue of the nation consists of certain customs and excise duties and other taxes. They know, too, that day by day these taxes are being collected all over the country. The proceeds of them, together with all other moneys which flow from a thousand sources into the Exchequer, form the Consolidated Fund, out of which fund are paid all claims whatever on the Government.

This very simple plan of uniting all kinds of revenue into one fund is of very modern adoption. In the reign of William the Third the sum realised by each tax formed a separate and distinct fund. Loans were raised on the security of each tax, the principal and interest of each loan being paid exclusively out of the fund specially appropriated thereto; the actual machinery for borrowing being the Exchequer Tally, as previously explained.

It was of course intended that no tax should be mortgaged for a larger amount than could be defrayed thereout. But the Exchequer of William the Third, starved by wars abroad and Jacobinism at home, was soon utterly unable to meet the demands upon it. But, to the honour of the Revolutionary Government be it said, dire as were the straits in which they found themselves, there was never any thought of repudiation. The infamous example of the Stuarts was never followed.

The Government of William the Third may have practically commenced the custom of incurring debts; they certainly originated the idea of paying them.

At first efforts were made to discharge both principal and interest of loans by consolidating a large number of taxes, continuing them for several years, and thus making the surplus of one available for the deficiency of another. Out of the fund thus formed, the interest of the loans was first to be paid, and then the principal "if there be any surplus." Once this postponement of the principal was accomplished, all hope of regaining lost ground was speedily abandoned. As the embarrassments of Government became more urgent, and the necessity for fresh loans more pressing, the impossibility of raising revenue sufficient for both interest and principal became manifest. Gradually but surely the character of the debt changed, and a system which involved payment of interest only, superseded that which guaranteed payment of principal as well. The State, in fact, no longer borrowed under a bond of repayment, but in reality sold the public creditor a perpetual annuity.

Of the many devices which were resorted to, there were two which have since occupied so prominent a position in our national finances as to demand a passing notice.

At this juncture the Bank of England started into existence. Its capital of £1,200,000 was lent to Government as consideration for the grant of a charter of incorporation, and on New Year's Day, 1695, it commenced business in the Poultry. We have no space to describe the growth of this, the most important banking corporation in the world. Suffice it to say its capital now amounts to seventeen millions and a half, the whole of which has, at different times, been advanced to Government. Upwards of eleven millions of this sum are still due to the Bank, who, in lieu of repayment, are permitted to issue notes against it, just as if it were actual gold in the Bank till. At this time, too, Exchequer Bills were originated. An Exchequer Bill is, in reality, nothing but a "promise to pay" a given sum of money by the Exchequer. The purchaser of an Exchequer Bill has the same claim on the Exchequer that the holder of a bank-note has on the Bank of England, with this exception, that the former is repayable only at a specified time, and bears interest from the date of its issue. But as the principal is repayable, the amount due by the nation on Exchequer Bills forms the Unfunded Debt.

And now, before proceeding to discuss the consequences of the various modes of raising money to which we have referred, let us advert to one addition to the debt, in 1706, an addition which reveals perhaps the only instance of repudiation and wrong that the financial annals of this country contain.

In olden times the goldsmiths were the only bankers, and what money they had was generally lodged for security's sake in the king's Exchequer at Westminster. Thus it came to pass that the goldsmiths were frequent lenders to the Crown, which, till the year 1672, honourably fulfilled the conditions of the loans. But in that year Charles the Second forcibly closed the Exchequer, and seized £1,300,000 of the goldsmiths' money. In those days such a sum was enormous, and the whole commerce of London was dislocated. The goldsmiths went to law, but not until they had carried on a litigation for thirty-four years, and had lost £3,000,000 in principal and interest, were they allowed to receive annuities at the rate of six per cent. on half the original loan.

From the time (A.D. 1706) when these six per cent. annuities appear in the national accounts, the story of the debt is the story of rapid and resistless growth. War has always been the parent of debt, and politically the history of the eighteenth century is mostly occupied with war—financially with the old old story of deficient revenue, of swollen expenditure, and of recourse to loans. And thus the debt grew with gigantic strides. In vain patriots lamented, and statesmen discussed. As million was added to million, prophets declared that the country would be ruined, while statisticians busied themselves with schemes for reduction of interest or repayment of principal. But neither the vaticinations of the one nor the suggestions of the other seemed to have any particular effect.

Curiously enough, however, the country did not succumb. On the contrary, with every fresh accumulation of debt, fresh resources seemed to be developed, and renewed confidence to be exhibited, until at length the country bore with ease a burden which a few years before had been declared to be simply unendurable.

At times the price of stock rose above par—that is to say, the holder of £100 Consols found he could sell his right to an annuity of so much per cent. for more than £100—and then of course Government could hope to reduce the interest without being called on to pay off any principal sums.

Taking advantage of one such opportunity in 1748, Pelham, then at the head of the Broad-bottom Administration, succeeded in diminishing the interest on the bulk of the debt to three per cent. At the same time a number of those three per cent. annuities were consolidated, and so formed the stocks known as the Reduced and Consolidated Annuities, the great divisions of the Funded Debt.

And now let us endeavour to ascertain whether this system of funding was conducted on an economical plan. Clearly this is the crucial point of the debt, and it is one not altogether easy to elucidate. The question stated simply, is this—When the Government inscribed the name of a man in their books as the holder of £100 stock with interest at three per cent., how much money had they actually received from him?

If we mistake not, this point of the relation between the nominal capital of the debt and the money actually advanced by the original owners of that capital, is one of the most startling phenomena of our financial history.

The taxpayer of the present day who contributes his share of the twenty-seven millions sterling, which has to be annually provided for interest to the public creditor, may contemplate the debt of £750,000,000 without chagrin—nay, even with composure—when he recalls most features of its history. For the story of our debt is, from a political point of view, the story of great national perils encountered without fear, and overcome without failure, and of a statesmanship which, though often mistaken, was never dishonourable. Above all, since the Revolution the annals of the debt are unstained by repudiation in any shape.

But from a financial point of view the process by which the debt was funded was prodigally wasteful. And this waste has arisen chiefly in two modes—first, in funding at a low rate of interest on a nominal capital; secondly, in establishing a Sinking Fund of a delusive character. The first of these we now proceed to elucidate.

In the infancy of the funding system, loans were negotiated at the market rate of the day, the capital assigned to the public creditor seldom exceeding the sum actually advanced by him. But in 1781 the practice was adopted of borrowing in a three per cent. stock, and then of apportioning to the contributor such an amount of that stock as would bring up his interest to the market rate.

Suppose, for example, Government borrowed in a three per cent. stock when the market rate was four and a half per cent., they gave the lender £150 three per cent. stock for every £100 advanced. That is to say, they bound the country to pay £4 10s. a year for ever for the £100 lent, or, should it be wished to pay off the debt, to liquidate it by the payment of £150—that is, half as much again as was originally lent. This system, once adopted, was adhered to with a fatal persistency. Nor was this extravagant assignment of capital the only boon granted to the fortunate contributor to a loan. He received an annuity of so much per cent. on the loan for a series of years, besides interest for the whole of the year in which the loan was contracted, although his instalments were paid at intervals during the year, or liberal discount on immediate payment of his contributions.

The aggregate loss to the country in consequence of the adoption of this system has been frequently and variously estimated. Dr. Price, the author of "Pitt's Sinking Fund," Dr. Hamilton, of Aberdeen, and other writers on the National Debt have exposed the wastefulness of the practice. But the publication in 1870 of the accounts relating to the Public Income Expenditure of Great Britain, with Mr. Chisholm's notes, enables us to present more exact calculations than were before procurable.

THE STORY OF A MINIATURE, AS TOLD BY A PIECE OF GOLDSMITH'S WORK
BY THOMAS ARCHER.

"RESTED HIS HAND UPON MY SHOULDER."

IN FIVE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

HE had scarcely done so when a man came from the upper warehouse, a room whence silk, both warp and woof, was given out to the workpeople to be wound on bobbins or spread into the web before it was fixed in the loom. After every such operation this silk was brought back to be re-weighed, and only when the piece was finished in a woven fabric did it find its way into the lower warehouse, there to be measured and inspected. Access was gained to this upper warehouse by a door in a back street, inscribed with the words "A. Dormeur. Weavers' Entrance." And thence the workpeople, of whom there were many each day waiting their turn, went across a paved yard and into a passage terminating in a kind of square lobby, at the bottom of the deep well which lighted the gloomy staircase by a glazed window from the roof of the house.

Close to this lobby was a sliding panel, opening on a counter where the great scales hung for weighing the silk; and here weavers and winders gave in or took out their work from the scale-foreman, whose name was Bashley—one of those ruffians who, with a bullying pretence of candour and honesty, contrive to impose even on the victims over whom they tyrannise, and at the same time, as it were, wrest from their superiors the acknowledgment that they are "rough diamonds." We have heard so much of slinking, smooth-tongued, oily villany, that we have scarcely yet learned the fact that the bullying, self-assertive, loud-voiced, defiant scoundrel is often the most artful thief and liar in the whole round of rascality.

By a horrible fiction it is often thought that such a man is "just fit to deal with workpeople." The same opinion prevailed then, and thus Nick Bashley was able to get a character which obtained for him a place in the warehouse of Anton Dormeur. He had been there for some twelve months, in place of old Pierre Dobree—a faithful fellow who had joined his old master in London after the calamities which drove them both from France. Pierre had been in Paris, and had escaped to bring to his master the awful intelligence that the daughter he had denounced was now beyond his relentless anger; but the old man, having grown old and feeble, had retired, with a pension, to that range of buildings which once stood in St. Luke's, and was called La Providence: a refuge founded to receive poor Protestant émigrés, mostly aged men and women, who had their little rooms quaintly furnished with their own poor household goods; and who walked daily in the quadrangle, laid out in beds and borders.

Dick Bashley had been only fifteen months in Dormeur's service, and yet he had come between the grandfather and Antoine, suggesting suspicions of the young man's probity, but so artfully that while he only seemed to hint at small blemishes, which he pointed out for the sake of the lad's future welfare, he left so much to be inferred that the old man had already a new trouble added to his load.

Bashley's insinuations, when analysed, came in effect to charging Antoine with small peculations in order to increase the amount of his allowance—to taking beforehand what he, of course, might consider would be his own some day, as the scoundrel would have put it. Not only this, but he hinted at low companions—at a secret love affair with a girl far beneath him in station—of this he would, if necessary, furnish proof.

It was with a troubled heart that Anton Dormeur, having at last escaped from a whispered conference with Bashley, locked up the warehouse, and went slowly out towards Shoreditch on his way to the "Providence." Old Pierre had been the early guide, philosopher, and friend of the little orphan boy; and the keen-faced, pippin-skinned old Frenchman had the courage of his convictions, and roundly swore many innocent French oaths that afternoon, when his old employer, and present patron and friend, paced with him along the path of the old quadrangle and told him his suspicions.

"So, that man of blague, that Bashley is at the bottom of this also," he said presently. "Why did you send me away, and take that liar, that—that—ventrebleu—that hyena?"

"But what should it be true, Pierre? My heart is very heavy."

"I tell you it is not true."

"But about the girl? He said he could prove it. And yet the boy came and rested his hand upon my shoulder to-day as if he were candour itself."

"Let him prove it."

"He swears he will."

"What then?"

"What then! Do you, too, think it is possible, Dobree?"

"I think it is quite possible that Antoine may be in love, and in love with one who is poor, but not ignoble—no, never—not ignoble."

There was a strange light in the old foreman's eyes, a strange look in his face, as he said this, so that Anton Dormeur stopped him suddenly.

"Pierre, you know something of this," he cried.

"You shall tell me—what does it mean?"

"I am not sure that I can tell you," replied the old man thoughtfully. "Still, you invite me to sup with you to-night. Antoine will be there?"

"Ah! there again. This man Bashley told me, as one proof of his knowledge, that even to-night—this night that I have bidden him to meet me—Antoine will not be at home; that he may stay away altogether to avoid my questioning; that he will certainly disappoint me for the sake of this girl with whom he has an engagement. How then?"

Pierre was silent for a moment; a troubled look puckered his face, then a keen sudden gleam of surprise and intelligence seemed to shoot across it. "You said supper at nine, did you not?" he said quietly.

"Yes—the nights are dark."

"Make it ten, nevertheless."

"Agreed, but why? and what is there working in your brain, Dobree?"

"Never mind, monsieur, but lend me one, two, three sovereigns."

"Pierre, you are extravagant. What can you want with them? There will be no company; your dress is good enough."

"There will be Master Antoine, perhaps a lady, but that I cannot tell; there may even be two ladies."

"Pierre, it is ill-jesting," said Dormeur, turning pale and with an angry glance; "do you remember what day it is?"

"Good Heaven! Master, forgive me. I had quite another thought than of the day; pardon me a thousand times—pardon me. I could cut out my thoughtless tongue; and yet, believe me, I meant—never mind what I meant."

They had reached the passage leading to Dobree's queer little oak-panelled room, and as the door was open, both the old men entered; Dormeur walking up to the mantelpiece, and fiddling about there with some old china cups, and other little ornaments with which it was adorned. Turned with its face to the wall was a little trumpery frame, containing as it seemed some common little picture; and quite absently, and as though he scarcely knew what he was doing, the old man placed his fingers on it to turn it face outwards. Dobree gave a low cry, and placed his hand upon his arm.

"Where did you get this?" he said slowly, looking his old foreman in the face. "It is not old, it cannot have been painted more than a year; and yet, as a mere likeness from memory, it is wonderful. Who could have done it?—not you, Pierre, that is impossible."

Dobree had recovered himself. "You know that I came from Paris," he said, with his eyes cast down; "you know, too, how a picture may be retouched and made to look like new."

"But you are deceiving me; this is no retouching; it is clumsy—coarse; and, except in the evidence that the face itself must have been beautiful, not a good likeness. You wonder I can talk so calmly of this, a poor resemblance of the bright fair girl—of my Sara—mine although—Dobree, tell me how you came by this."

"I will tell you to-night," muttered the old man; "I swear to you that I will tell you to-night."

"And to-night I will show you a portrait on ivory, one that will make you think you see her as you once knew her, Pierre: a picture I keep among some relics, and look at often—oftener than you think, or any one in the world could guess. Good-bye—or rather till nine—no, ten to-night, au revoir."

When his grandfather had left the house, Antoine, who was restless, unhappy, and full of vague surmises, sat for some time with his head in his hands, and at last only roused himself with an effort. It was growing dusk already, for autumn had given place to winter, and the days were short. There was still light enough, however, for him to see to write a letter, and in a few lines he told his grandfather that he should be with him at nine o'clock, and would then ask him to give him back the confidence that once existed between them, or to charge him with the fault that he had committed. He felt how vague this was, and almost hesitated; but he went to the room, nevertheless, and opening the door gently advanced towards the table.

It was a large barely furnished place, and yet not without evidence of luxury, or at all events, of ornament. The great carved chimney-piece was surmounted by a large mirror with sconces containing candles; a leathern chair was drawn up to the hearth; on the table itself was a silver standish with writing materials, and a great goblet of Venetian glass, while some rare china stood on a cabinet near the window.

Antoine so rarely entered this room except at night, and to bear his grandfather company for an hour or two before bed-time, that he involuntarily glanced round it now in the fast-fading twilight. In that moment he remarked that the door of the cabinet was unlocked—a circumstance so unusual, that he went towards it and looked inside to note what might be the reason of such carelessness. Then seeing me there on the shelf, he lifted me, and carrying me to the window looked curiously at my contents. There was some reason for his doing so. From the time that I had been an inmate of that dim silent room—where only its master came in daily, and the one domestic who, with an old housekeeper, attended to the wants of Dormeur and his grandson, and did a little dusting once a week—I had become the receptacle of family trinkets, of coins, and quaint pieces of old jewellery.

It was a common custom for the old man to take me out of the cabinet when his eyes were tired with reading, and to turn over these tarnished treasures, some of which were in small morocco cases. To one of the latter Antoine's attention was directed, for it lay open as though it had been hastily placed there, and covered with a piece of torn point-lace. Removing this, the young man saw a portrait, the picture of a face so sweet, and eyes penetrating, that he uttered an involuntary cry. It was a deeper feeling than mere surprise or admiration that prompted it however. For a moment he seemed ready to drop me from his encircling arm; his hand trembled as he replaced the miniature, after gazing at it with an expression of mingled wonder and terror. At that instant the watchman passed crying the first hour after dark; and, carefully replacing me, he turned the key in the cabinet door and hurried from the room.

Now all of my story that remains to tell took place in the next three hours, after Antoine left the house with a strange sense of wonder and confusion in his mind ; so I must explain a little the situation of the young man—the enmity of Bashley.

It had happened then, some months before, that Bashley being away for a day's holiday, Antoine took his place at the scale ; for it was a slack time, and few workpeople were there to be served. He believed he had given out the last skein of silk, and had weighed the last bobbin, so shutting the slide, and putting up the bar, he unlocked an inner door, and went into the house and up the stairs. Pausing on the first landing, as he frequently did, to look thoughtfully over the balustrade and down the well-staircase, he became aware that one person yet remained quietly seated on the bench below ; and, uttering some slight exclamation at his own negligence, a face was turned upward towards his own—a face of such sweet, pure, girlish beauty, that he held his breath lest it should be bent from his searching gaze—as indeed it was, but not before the plain straw bonnet had fallen backward, and left a wealth of sunny hair glowing beneath the light that shone down upon it. A confused sense of some picture of an angel upon Jacob's ladder, that he had seen in an old family Bible, came into Antoine's thoughts as he stood and looked ; but in another moment the girl had replaced her bonnet, and, with her face bent down, sat waiting as before.

In a minute he was beside her.

"Pardon me," he said, with an involuntary bow ; "I thought every one had gone. What is it that I can do for you?"

There was no embarrassment except that of modesty as she curtsied before him. She might have been a young duchess by the frankness with which she met his look.

"I come from Marie Rondeau," she said, "who has sprained her foot and cannot walk. Mr. Bashley said she might send for the money due to her, if she was still lame."

"Your name then is——" he inquired, pausing for her to fill up the question by her answer.

"Sara Rondeau," she said simply ; "it is for my aunt that I come. I live with my aunt."

"And Bashley, does he—did he—has he visited you to bring you money?" Already the lad felt a short jealous pang, but knew not what it was.

"He has been to measure our work, but not to bring money. My aunt comes here herself."

But Bashley had been there, and the image of this young girl had roused his sordid fancy to a fierce passion. Is it a wonder that he began to hate his young master?

Antoine felt the warm blood in his face, as he wrapped in a paper the few shillings that were due.

"Do not come again on such an errand," he said.

"I will call and see if your aunt is better, and will, if necessary, bring some more money myself."

There is little need to say that Antoine kept his promise ; that merry bustling little Marie Rondeau (how unlike her niece she was, to be sure!) was in a constant tremor when the little wicket-gate of her garden clicked, and she, looking through the leaden casement of the upper room, saw the young master coming along the little path, with its two rows of oyster-shells dividing it from the gay plots of gilliflowers, double stocks, and sweet Williams. She trembled too for the peace of the fair girl, who had too soon learnt to know his footstep, and to flush with pleasure at his approach.

Already trouble seemed to threaten them, for Bashley had warned her, and in a coarse insolent way had said he meant to be Sara's sweetheart himself—or they might seek work elsewhere.

One night, when Antoine entered the garden, he was surprised to find old Pierre Dobree there.

"You must come no more yet, if you would spare this child from sorrow," he said, after talking long and earnestly. "Your new foreman watches you, and already hints to your grandfather that you are engaged in some mean intrigue. You bring evil where I would have you do good, Master Antoine. Come no more, I entreat you."

"And Sara—does she wish that also?" said the young fellow, reddening. "I have never spoken a word to her that could not be said before her aunt. Why do you interpose, Peter Dobree?"

"Excuse me, the aunt is my cousin, the child my ward, and I know your grandfather too well. For a month you must not come, but trust me and give me your word, and all may yet go well."

So it was a month since Antoine had been to the little house in Bethnal Green—and in all that slack time, neither Sara nor her aunt had been to the warehouse for work or money.

But on that night, when Antoine was to sup with his grandfather, the month's probation was at an end. Even had it not been, he would have felt that he must break his promise, for on that very morning as he stood at the door, after the warehouse had been opened, a boy ran up and placed a note in his hand—a mere slip of paper on which was scrawled—

"Will you never come again?—S. R."

His sensitive nature was shocked at such a summons, and, for the first time, he had a sharp pang of doubt whether he was not to be awakened from a foolish dream. It was with a heavy heart that he bent his steps along the narrow tangle of streets that lay between his house and the edge of a great piece of waste ground known as Hare Street Fields, and even had he been less preoccupied he might not have noticed that he was followed by two men, who kept close to him in the shadows of the houses, and walked as noiselessly as cats, and with the same stealthy tread.

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—HOW HE GOT INTO DEBT.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART THE THIRD.

CAREFUL analysis of each of the loans, and each operation of funding Exchequer Bills between the commencement of the funding system and 1869, shows that the net value received for £740,418,032 Capital of Unredeemed Funded Debt remaining on March 31st, 1869, was £510,370,458.

To put the matter in the simplest manner—for every £100 stock of the Funded Debt, the country has received on the average only £68 18s. 7d.

It is true that the public creditor cannot demand repayment of his nominal capital, and the State can generally redeem the debts considerably below par. But even with these qualifications the extravagance of the system is lamentable.

Supposing the debt, as above quoted, were redeemed at £90 per cent., the nation would still pay upwards of £156,000,000 more than it ever received. "Were a person in private life," says Dr. Price, "to borrow £100 on condition that it should be reckoned £200 borrowed at two and a half per cent., he would, by subjecting himself to the necessity—if he ever discharged the debt—of paying double the amount he received, gain somewhat of the air of borrowing at two and a half per cent., though he really borrowed at five. But would such a person be thought in his senses?"

It seems to us impossible to discover any adequate explanation of the motives which led ministers to practise such a system. Had the debt been funded in a five or six per cent. stock, experience shows that a reduction in the rate of interest would have been practicable from time to time, until at length three per cent. would have been reached, but payable, be it observed, on a capital sum less by £200,000,000 than that on which interest is at present computed.

The Government in fact, like a reckless spendthrift, burdened its successors without benefiting itself. It boasted of borrowing at a low rate of interest, but really paid a high rate on the actual loan, because of the excessive capital on which the low rate was calculated. Its posterity, on the other hand, entrusted with the liquidation of the debt, is embarrassed with an enormous surplus of nominal capital, which must be repaid to the uttermost farthing, though it has never represented real subscriptions.

The consideration of the fatal waste which characterised the conditions under which the debt was developed, leads naturally to the investigation of other features of the debt, in which even a more culpable extravagance may be traced.

It is not a little curious that the most signal instance of mismanagement afforded by the history of the debt, should have occurred in that department of it in which economy was actually the aim and object—viz., in the efforts made to pay it off. For, from the time when the debt first attained any considerable magnitude, its diminution was the cherished desire of statesmen, as its growth was the bugbear of political prophets. But the vaticinations of the latter proved simply false, the exertions of the former resulted, as we shall show, in the increase of the very liability they intended to reduce.

The earliest idea of a Sinking Fund is undoubtedly to be found in those aggregations of taxes into one fund, to which we have already referred.

In 1716, Sir Robert Walpole introduced the first Sinking Fund as a regular system, and for a time the proceeds of the fund were applied to the discharge of debt with tolerable firmness. Soon, however, the temptation to apply the fund towards current expenses proved too strong to be resisted, and the diversion once commenced, was adhered to constantly until at length, as a means of reducing the debt, the fund was simply useless.

In 1786, Pitt's Sinking Fund was originated. The state of politics was, at that time, eminently favourable to the introduction of any scheme which promised to liberate the nation somewhat from the weight of the debt; for the disastrous conclusion of the American war, the loss of the colonies, the deficient revenue, and the general distress had made statesmen seriously uneasy at the growth of the national liability. Moreover, the champion of the Sinking Fund had appeared in the person of Dr. Price, a nonconformist divine of no mean mathematical ability. He declared that nothing could save the country but a Sinking Fund which should never be diverted. Then the fund, he said, would act at compound interest, and the results would be as marvellous as that of the penny invested at compound interest at our Saviour's birth, which would by 1781 have reached a sum equal to two hundred millions of globes of solid gold, each one as large as the earth! His reasoning persuaded Pitt, and the New Sinking Fund was established in 1786.

By the Act 26 Geo. III., c. 31, a million a year was to be provided and paid over to certain Commissioners, to form the fund, which was to be still further increased by the addition of life and terminable annuities as they expired. With the money thus provided, the Commissioners were to purchase stock, which however was not cancelled, but stood in their names, the dividends being received by them and thus yet further enlarging the fund.

For forty-three years the operations of the fund were carried on, many modifications of the original plan being from time to time introduced, some of which tended to enlarge its scope. The final result of these operations is very succinctly given in the Accounts of National Income and Expenditure, to which we have already referred, and is not a little remarkable.

Between 1786 and 1829 the Commissioners applied to the reduction of Funded Debt £330,000,000 sterling, with which they purchased £483,183,803 stock, the average price per £100 stock being £68 6s. 2d. The total annual interest of this redeemed stock was £14,795,651, being equivalent to an average rate of interest on the sum paid of £4 10s. per cent., besides expenses of management. Now, be it observed, during the whole of this period (1786—1829) the revenue was deficient, and the Government had to resort to loans. These loans were raised on the principles already described, at a mean rate of £5 os. 6d. per cent. But the debt paid off bore only £4 10s. per cent., so that the actual result is that the above sum of £330,000,000 was raised at £5 per cent., in order to liquidate debt costing £4 10s. per cent. This difference of 10s. 6d. per cent. on £330,000,000 amounts to over £1,600,000 a year, which represents the loss incurred to the country by the Sinking Fund, without, of course, reckoning the management expenses of the fund itself, or the increased amount of capital of debt.

Our readers will cordially agree that Pitt's Sinking Fund was the greatest financial delusion ever known. To us at the present day it seems incredible that such a juggle could have been permitted to continue so long. It must be remembered, however, that in Pitt's time the details of administration were not exposed to the healthy publicity which is so marked a characteristic of the present day; that, from this cause, competent criticism was always difficult and often impossible. To many statesmen the debt was, doubtless, such an object of apprehension that, in dealing with it, their ordinary sagacity seems to have deserted them; others clearly grasped the folly of the system, but found it no easy task to disenchant the public mind of the glittering attractions of compound interest and wholesale reduction, and lead it back to humbler aims and slower processes. To Dr. Hamilton and Lord Grenville belongs the merit of having demonstrated the futility of the Sinking Fund, and of having laid down the true principles on which all operations for the extinction of debt should be conducted. Those principles, as since expanded by the great masters of English finance down to Mr. Gladstone, may be thus stated:

I. That the only real Sinking Fund is that derived from the surplus of revenue over expenditure.

II. That it is often wiser statesmanship to abolish taxes, than to continue them expressly for the purpose of obtaining a surplus of revenue for the extinction of debt.

III. That, in estimating the year's expenditure, special provision should not be made for the redemption of debt, but that the surplus of revenue should be that naturally arising from the growth of taxes, or from sterner economy in expenditure.

IV. That the mode of reducing debt by substituting life and terminable annuities for the interminable annuities, of which the debt consists, is on the whole the most satisfactory that can be devised.

It was on these principles that the Sinking Fund at present in operation was started in 1829. The actual modus operandi is as follows:—Within thirty days of every quarter-day the Treasury make up an account of income and expenditure, according to the actual receipt and issue of money at the Exchequer, for the year then completed, and one-fourth of the surplus of annual income is issued to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt out of the Consolidated Fund. With this money the Commissioners purchase Consols or other stock in the open market—such stock being then cancelled. The Commissioners also receive all donations and bequests towards reducing the debt—a channel of income which includes a large variety of sums, from the humble 6s. 6d. of W. P. Booth in 1857, to the ambitious £180,000 of John Ashton of Newton Bank, near Hyde. The stock purchased with the money arising from these bequests is not cancelled, but the dividends are received and re-invested.

On the whole, from 1829 to 1869, the receipts of the Sinking Fund amounted to £49,368,916, and upwards of fifty and a half millions of debt have been extinguished. Meanwhile, the system of granting life and terminable annuities has been in operation since 1808. By means of these the interminable annuity of which the Funded Debt consists is exchanged for a larger annuity, terminating at a given period, or with the death of the purchaser. It follows that, whilst the terminable annuities continue, the annual charge for the debt is increased. Moreover, the amount of revenue actually applied at any given time towards the reduction of debt consists of the excess of the annual charge for terminable annuities over and above that of Funded Debt cancelled. Since 1863 a considerable extension of these terminable annuities has been made by the conversion into them of the stock held by the National Debt Commissioners, on account of the money deposited in savings-banks all over the country. The great bulk of these annuities will cease in 1885, at which date upwards of a hundred millions of debt and three millions interest will have been cancelled.

If now we attempt to answer the question, How John Bull got into debt? we shall find no great difficulty. Mismanagement and extravagance undoubtedly helped to swell the debt, but they did not cause it. It was War which originated the debt, far back in the days of the Tudor and Stuart kings, and it is War which has fostered it ever since. This is not the place to deliver a homily against the military spirit. Now-a-days we are told "The jingling of the guinea helps the hurt which honour feels,

And the nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels."

Well, in the good old days when George the Third was king, the nations did something besides murmur. They fought, and left their posterity to pay the bill. And the bill is large enough to satisfy even the most ardent admirer of bloated armaments, and the most cynical critic of peace policy. The outcome of the wars which we have waged since the Revolution down to the Abyssinian Expedition is, financially, this. These wars have cost, in the aggregate, £1,236,000,000 sterling, and have left us now, after years of peace and surplus revenue, with a debt of £730,000,000, costing £27,000,000 a year. These are not the estimates of excited partizanship, but the accurate calculations of sober statisticians. Well might Hume remark that "princes and states, fighting and quarrelling amidst their debts, funds, and public mortgages, reminded him of nothing but a match of cudgel-playing fought in a china-shop."

It would be needless to dilate upon the estimation in which the National Debt is held as an investment. It would, indeed, be simply impossible to exaggerate the importance of the Funds as a factor in the financial life of the nation. Influenced as they are by the foreign relations of the country, by the condition of the revenue and of the money-market, by harvests, commerce, and manufactures, their price affords an unmistakable gauge of the prosperity of the nation. It is worth while, however, briefly to point out the arrangement by which the public Funds are bought and sold.

All purchases of stocks are made through brokers, who are members of the Stock Exchange, and may either be made for cash or for one of the periodical account-days, which occur once a month, and are settled by the Committee of the Stock Exchange. The broker, however, is only an agent, who buys and sells for his customers out of the Exchange, and charges a commission on the transaction. He does not deal in stocks, does not necessarily possess himself any of the commodity for which he is agent. That position is held by the stock-jobber, who is in reality a stock-merchant. Were there no jobbers, purchases could only be made when the broker who wished to buy happened to find another broker desirous of selling exactly the needed amount and kind of stock; but the jobber, who is a large holder of stock, is always ready to buy or sell. But he deals only with the broker. The price at which he sells is one-eighth per cent. more than that at which he buys. Hence the difference between the buying and selling price of Consols is always one-eighth per cent.; and in the newspapers the price for £100 stock is quoted thus—£90 to £90½.

It is easy to see how the fact that purchases may either be made for cash, or on credit for the next account-day, affords ample facilities for an active trade in stocks, and not unfrequently for the most reckless speculation. The price "for time," as it is called—that is, for the account-day—is generally higher than for cash, and the difference between the two is called the "continuation." Continuation varies according to the proximity of the settling-day, to the abundance or scarcity of money and of stock, and to the market rate of interest. If, for example, a banker wants a sum of money for a short time, he will direct his broker to sell Consols for money and buy them for time. If, on the other hand, he has money he wishes to invest for a short period, he will buy stock for money and sell for time. He thus gets interest according to the rate of continuation. Again, a jobber often agrees to sell at the next settling-day a larger amount of stock than he holds, his expectation being that, in the meantime, a fall in the market quotations will enable him to buy at a lower rate than he has contracted to sell, and so realise a profit. A jobber in this position is really speculating for a "fall," and is known as a "bear." Sometimes he cannot get the stock without paying a premium for it; or, to put the case more clearly, he buys the required stock now at a larger price than he will part with it for on settling-day. This premium is called "back—" and is the reverse of continuation, because it indicates that the price of stock for time is less than for cash. The converse of the "bear" is the "bull," who speculates for a rise, or contracts to take stock which he has no intention of paying for, at a certain price, his expectation being that a rise in the quotations will enable him to sell at a higher rate previously to settling-day.

It is easy to see what a temptation is presented by these "time-bargains," as they are called, for the recourse to all sorts of manœuvres and combinations artificially to over-value or depreciate the prices of stocks.

One word, in conclusion, as to the duty of the nation with regard to the debt. We have already adverted to the practical rules which English statesmen may be said to have adopted as to the policy of diminishing it. The gist of those rules is that no surplus of revenue should be maintained expressly for the purpose of reduction, but that unnecessary taxes should be remitted. And if the taxes which could be spared are of a kind to shackle commerce, there is, doubtless, wisdom in the suggestion. But, in a country where party government exists, there will always be a strong temptation to magnify the evils of any tax, in order that popularity may be gained by its abolition. In such a matter the wish is peculiarly likely to be father to the thought. For our own part, we are impressed with the belief that the nation has by no means risen to its responsibility on this subject. Few people realise that every year, before one halfpenny of accruing revenue can be applied to the support of the Crown, to the maintenance of the army and navy, or to the administration of justice, £27,000,000 sterling must be set aside for the public creditor. Further, owing to the enormous increase of eligible channels of investment, the debt has not for years been quoted at par. Now, anything like a large reduction would, by enhancing the value of what was left, probably so increase the quotation as to make a reduction of the rate of interest practicable. For, be it observed, although the grand total of the debt is so enormous, yet, owing to the fact that large sums are permanently locked up under trust deeds, etc., the amount actually in the market is comparatively small. Now it is the competition between buyer and seller of this smaller quantity which determines the price of the day; and it is this smaller quantity, also, which is affected by any purchases by the Government for purposes of reduction. The effect, therefore, of any considerable diminution of this amount would be more rapid than is commonly supposed. The taxpayer of to-day would not find that he was contributing for the benefit only of a remote posterity. In all probability he would himself reap the benefits of his own self-denial in maintaining an adequate surplus of revenue over expenditure.

Nor do we think this self-denial is more than can fairly be demanded, considering the present condition of the national wealth, and the slender burden of the taxes now in existence. Constant prosperity cannot be insured, and it is not the characteristic of wise statesmanship to act as if the tide of national fortune would never ebb, or the glory of noon not be succeeded by the gloom of night. The life of a nation is not as that of the individual. The individual may isolate himself from his fellows, devote himself to luxury and self, and yet do no great harm to any one but himself. But the life of the nation is continuous. The nation of to-day is trustee for the future as well as heir of the past. To each generation comes its own responsibilities. Seventy years ago, the preservation of national existence against the attacks of a foe whose capacity was almost as boundless as his ambition, entailed on our forefathers a vast expenditure of money and blood. The mode in which they discharged their duty commands, on the whole, the admiration of their children. Our duty, if less perilous, is not the less clear, and should be observed with none the less fidelity. It is to do all we can, by the combined exertion of self-denial and thrift, to liberate the State from that incumbrance which is in peace her greatest source of expense, and would be in war her greatest embarrassment.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

HIS STORY.

HE began, looking at her with the quiet smile of assurance which brightens the face of a lover who is certain of acceptance—

"Once upon a time——"

"Is it a fairy story?" she interrupted, whilst she proceeded to plait long strips of seaweed into true lover's knots.

"It will be just what you like to make it."

"What I like to make it?" Her busy fingers paused, and she looked up at him with a curious expression of wonder and doubt. She was thinking of the Book of Fate, and speculating in what fashion its contradictory predictions were to be fulfilled. She resumed her work with the brown wet weeds, singing low, as if to herself, a snatch from an old ballad—

"Syne she's gar'd build a bonnie boat,
To sail the salt salt sea;
The sails were of the light green silk,
The tows [ropes] of taffety."

"You're a droll lass. What put that song in your head just now?"

"Thinking about your story, I suppose, and how I'm to make it what I like."

"You'll see. Well, once upon a time there was a loon—suppose we give him my name, just for fun—and there was a lass——"

The plaiting of the seaweed ceased again, but she did not look up.

"Suppose we give the lass my cousin's name—Grace."

Teenie's fingers worked more rapidly than ever; one might have fancied there was even a degree of spite in their energy.

"The loon was very fond of Grace," he went on,

"and she liked him ; at any rate, she often helped him out of the scrapes he blundered into. So one day Wat's father says to him, ' There, sir, when you are old enough you shall marry her. She is a fine lass, and she has a fine bit of land that will be worth a ransom when the coal and iron are worked, but keep your thumb on that. Be kind to her, and see that she does not slip through your fingers ; for let me tell you that beyond your education you have nothing to get from me.' "

" And what did the loon say to that ? "

He rested his elbow on his knee, and his chin on his hand, thus bringing his face down close to hers.

" What was he to do then ? " he said earnestly. " He was, in a way, bound to Grace, and yet he could not marry her without doing her a grievous wrong, besides laying up for himself a future of discontent and regret ; and maybe the woman he loved would also be a sufferer. He would have done a great deal to save either of those lassies from pain ; but it seemed as if injury to one or both must follow, whichever way he turned. "

" WILL YOU SAY YES ? "

" Nothing. He did not know what he could say ; but he laughed to himself at the notion of his own marriage ; for then it seemed to be only a funny notion. So the affair came to be looked upon by all his friends as quite settled, and they thought the arrangement a lucky one for him. But by-and-by Wat began to feel that he had got into another scrape ; for one fine morning he came to look seriously into himself, and he discovered that if ever he married the woman who had all his heart, Grace would not be his wife. "

Teenie plaited and sang another snatch of the ballad—

" She sailed it round, and sailed it round,
And loud, loud cried she—
' Now break, now break, ye fairy charms,
And set my true love free. ' "

" Was he no himself to blame for it all ? " she said, almost wickedly.

" He was, and he did not spare himself. The circumstances caused him many weary nights and troubled days. What made his position the more painful was, that he had quite recently undertaken the solemn responsibilities of a minister—undertaken to teach duty to others—and here he was doubting about his own on the very threshold of his work. What was he to do ? "

" Maybe he went to Grace and asked her, " she said, so quietly that the gentle plash of the water on the sand at their feet almost drowned her voice.

But Walter heard, and he was glad to hear.

" He did so ; and he went to her, determined to submit to her decision, whatever it might be. She had helped him in many difficulties before, and he knew that she would help him to do what was right in this one."

"She must be very good. I would not like a man to come to me on such an errand."

"Aye, Teenie, she is good." His hand dropped on hers, his eyes glowing with enthusiasm, and he forgot the imaginary character in whose name he had thus far spoken. "On my way to her house I formed all sorts of plans for telling her my purpose gently. In this way I would ask her forgiveness, in that way I would try to explain how bitter had been the struggle with myself before I had dared to take this step. But my plans were useless. After the first bungling word she seemed to understand everything. 'Don't speak, Walter. Wait,' she said; and I stood there, dumb. I felt so contemptible in my own eyes, as well as in hers."

Teenie began to tear her true lover's knots of seaweed into shreds, and to drop them on the sand.

His face looked cold and white; he went on, with a kind of subdued pain in his voice and manner—

"She turned away from me, but I knew the beauty of the face which was hidden from me, or rather the beauty of the soul which it reflects, and I remembered her affliction. It seemed as if my duty only became clear to me at that moment; it was to be faithful and helpful to her—to put away as best I could the cravings of my own heart, and to try to make her life happy. Was not that right?"

"I dare say" (slowly, and as if she were speaking whilst her thoughts were occupied with other matters).

"I am glad you think so," he said eagerly, as if she had given the fullest assent to his question, "and I tried to tell Grace that. But she came quietly up to me and put her hands on my shoulders, just as she used to do when I had made some blunder at home, and she persuaded me to acknowledge my fault and promise to be good.

"Thank you, Walter," she said; "I am very happy in feeling that you love me well enough to think of making the sacrifice you propose. But you would be foolish and wrong to make it; I would be still more foolish to accept it. You have been brave and right to come and tell me this, and I thank you for that too. But I have long expected it. Don't trouble yourself about me. I am glad that this happens before our marriage instead of after. Oh, I have often thought of the possibility of your meeting somebody younger, brighter than myself, and I am glad that it happens now. Go to her; tell her that she shall have no truer or fonder friend than me. And, to relieve you from all doubt in the matter, let me tell you as I shall tell the Laird to-morrow—I will

"I argued very earnestly that it was my wish to do whatever would make her happy. Then she bade me go and do as she had told me. I left her, not satisfied with myself, you may be sure, but feeling that she was right, as she always is, and that if she had yielded to my entreaties we would have both repented when too late.—What is the matter, Teenie?"

Teenie was bending forward, dropping the last fragments of seaweed on the sand, and apparently listening to the melancholy murmur of the water. She looked as if she would cry, but there were no tears in her eyes.

"What is the matter?" he repeated, resting his hand tenderly on her shoulder. "Do you not understand the story?"

"Oh, aye, I know very well. I wish I could be like Grace Wishart, but I cannot. She is good—you should have her."

"No, I want you to be my wife, Teenie, and I came to ask you. Will you say yes?"

She was looking anxiously seaward, as if seeking something she could not find. She answered in the same disjointed manner as before—

"I cannot tell what to say—there is nobody I ever thought about that way but you; there is nobody but you I would ever have, and I would like to say yes, but—"

"But what?" (very much surprised at the pause after such frank admissions).

"Ailie and me were reading my fortune to-day—that was the ploy I was to tell you about—and the bookie said that there would be troubles in our marriage. That's the 'but.'"

He was vexed, but the vexation gave way to laughter when she turned her bonnie face up to him, and he saw that she was seriously disturbed.

"What nonsense! and what a silly little lady you are sometimes! You shall say yes!"

"Aye, if—"

He stopped the objection with a kiss, and then he glanced hurriedly upward and round to see if they were observed. Feeling satisfied that they were safe, he seized both her hands, lifted her up, and they began to walk along the sand.

"'If' is a detestable word, Teenie, and you must not use it again. 'If' is a will o' the wisp, deceitful, misleading, and destructive of all moral courage and all hope. The man who fails cries, if so-and-so had happened he would have been all right. But the brave man and the brave woman cast the word from them, set teeth hard, and try again. You must give up 'if's,' Teenie, as well as fortune-telling."

It was to him the moment of supreme bliss which comes only once in a life-time—the moment in which the first enthusiastic love of a young heart is declared and accepted. He was ready to prattle about anything, and to laugh at anything—great joy is a brief relapse into childhood. And how beautiful all the world appeared to him then! There was not an ugly thing on the earth. The brown rocks, here darkening and there glowing in the afternoon light, the great sea with its many shades and restless spirit, had never seemed so glorious to him before. He had forgotten all about the storms and shipwrecks: he felt only the sunshine.

She was very quiet; indeed she was a good deal bewildered. She could not realise her own position or his: she submitted to him rather than joined in his ecstasies. She wanted to be his wife; and yet, now that the matter was settled, she did not experience the wild delight she had felt in the anticipation of that event. Perhaps it was the story about Grace Wishart which combined with her fortune-telling exploit to cast a shadow on her pleasure. She did not know, and she could not, even if she had been so minded, seek far for the reason just then, whilst he, with his grand enthusiasm, was speaking to her. She just knew that she somehow shrank under the great love that he seemed to give her, feeling herself to be unworthy of such a passion.

She did not think of trying to tell him that; she only felt that she loved him more and more, as she became conscious of her own unworthiness.

He was talking to her about their future. It was not to be a grand one; they were to begin with very humble means, and he was anxious to explain everything to her, so that there might be no misunderstanding afterwards.

Although he was the Laird's son, he would have nothing but his own efforts to depend upon; for the Laird's family was large, and his estate now small. Walter had been provided for by an education to his own mind, and a rich wife if he had been willing to accept her. He had rejected the fortune, and all that he could hope for from his father, now, was his consent to a marriage which—it must not be concealed—a second time frustrated his plans for Walter.

But Walter was more than content that everything should go to his brothers and sisters; he was happy so long as he had Teenie. (Teenie just pressed his hand at that, and looked up at him, smiling. He was rewarded.) He desired nothing, and he needed nothing, but her love; and since he had that, all the world might go "tapsalteerie" for him. But he had not been rash; he had thought of her comfort; and, before speaking, he had obtained the appointment of assistant and successor—if he chose to remain long enough—to the old minister of Drumhemount, at the annual stipend of one hundred pounds! They could manage with that—could they not? (Oh, yes, she supposed so.) Other folk managed with less, and he meant to set an example of thrift, and simple life, as one of the lessons his office called upon him to teach. But, besides that income, he intended to write for the magazines, and in many ways he hoped—mind you, he only hoped—to make perhaps another hundred a year, upon which they could live comfortably in that out-of-the-way place, and help their neighbours.

And that was the great point: he had adopted his profession because he felt the possibility of helping others in it. He had seen in cities, and in country places, much sin and suffering, and he believed they could be greatly softened by active religion—he did not attempt to explain what he meant by active religion—and he expected Teenie to second him in all his efforts to accomplish the great work that he saw before him.

Teenie did not understand a word of his enthusiastic aspirations, and she was wondering what it was all about, whilst she promised to help him with all her might—and meant what she said.

"But there's the boat," she added hastily, withdrawing her hand from his; for so, hand-in-hand, they had paced the narrow beach, whilst he had poured out his hopes.

Walter looked up as if awakened from a dream; he had been so much absorbed in talking to Teenie, that the whole fleet of England might have passed him unobserved.

The boat, with its brown sail full, had quietly rounded the headland, and, guided by the cunning hand of Dan Thorston, it slipped into the bay, the slanting rays of the sun giving it light and shade, and life. The sail flapped—dropped; the boat grated on the sand—rolled to one side; Thorston and one of his two men leapt into the water, caught the impetus of the boat, and lugged it higher up on the beach. Then there was bustle, and many orders to give about the sails, the nets, the landing of the fish, and the securing of the boat, all which Thorston gave in a quiet, hard voice, before he condescended to observe the presence of his daughter and young Dalmahoy. But he had seen her as soon as the boat turned the point; and so had Ellick Limpitlaw—his chief assistant, and one of the many young fishers who had cast longing eyes at Dan Thorston's daughter.

As soon as the boat touched the sand, Teenie ran to it, and gave her help in all the work that was going forward, with a glee that was a curious contrast to her passiveness under the enthusiastic outpourings of the man she loved.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

SKIPPER DAN.

"HAD a good shot?" said Walter, pretending to be quite at his ease, and to be deeply interested in the skipper's excursion.

"There's nae mair fish in the sea, I think," answered Dan, but the complaint was made in such a quiet way that you could not discover the least spleen. "We might almost as well draw our nets through the sheughs [gutters] of Kingshaven, and we'd be mair like to get profit there. I'm thinking Peter's ships maun ha'e been less nor ordinar, or his fish maun ha'e been young whales to sink them wi' what his nets could hold. My boat would na sink if the fishes was sliding ower the gunwale, and it's no bigger than its neighbours."

Thorston was never known to admit that he had made a good haul or "shot."

"Better luck next time, skipper."

"Ou aye, that's fine consolation for them that doesna need to care about succeeding this time. But it's poor kitchen [sauce] to a man's porridge to tell him he'll ha'e milk next week. Hows'ever, we maunna complain; and let them grumble who likes 't."

And Dan set himself to direct the disposition of his cargo, as if he had been the most contented man in the world. In all that he did Teenie not only helped him with willing and skilful hands, but sometimes guided his arrangements; and he, when unobserved, submitted to her dictation in the humblest way, and with the most implicit obedience; but if he fancied anybody saw them, he acted in direct opposition to her advice, even when that advice suggested the very thing he had been intending to do.

It was observable, on the present occasion, that a frown remained on his brow, as if something had gone wrong about which he was not willing to speak; and he seemed shy of coming near Walter, adopting all sorts of petty subterfuges to get out of his way.

The fact was that, as they turned the point, Limpitlaw had said to him—

"Do you see yon?"

"See what?" said Thorston, seeing all the time to what his comrade referred, and not liking it, although he did not know why.

"Your daughter and young Dalmahoy. If you dinna see, other folk speak, and it's no for her good that they should be so muckle thegither."

"Hold your tongue—confound you, if you speak another word like that I'll put your head aneath the water!"

Limpitlaw grumbled to himself, but did not attempt to interfere further.

Whether it was due to the man's suggestion, or to the appearance of Teenie and her lover in such a solitary place, Dan Thorston was troubled. He had been so much accustomed to look upon his daughter and Walter as mere bairns, that he had never, until this moment, suspected danger to either from their intimacy. He did not see even now that there was anything to make a fuss about; and he did not know why folk should talk about his lass, except that they were idle de'ils amusing themselves by casting hot cinders into honest neighbours' porridge.

Yet he was troubled; a word and a glance seemed to have roused him to a sense of quicksands and whirlpools under his feet, where hitherto he had been most unsuspecting of peril. He felt discontented with the land, and everything upon it.

There was a general sense of thunder in the air. Teenie was bright and active as ever, speaking to the men with a familiarity that annoyed Walter, laughing at their jokes, and apparently taking the liveliest interest in all their movements; but there was an element of defiance in her activity. Limpitlaw was dour and slow. Walter spoke a kindly word to him, and received a sullen "thank ye" for his pains, which was more like a sign of wrath than of gratitude.

Walter felt that he had suddenly dropped from the clouds of joy down to a state of awkwardness and shyness which were almost unbearable. He found himself continually in the way of everybody, and once when he tried to give a helping hand, the result seemed to be more trouble than assistance to the others. When he tried to lift, unaided, a creel full of fish, he staggered, the basket capsized, and the slippery freight rolled out upon the sand. Teenie actually laughed at him, and Limpitlaw, as he slowly set about repairing the disaster, grinned in such a way that Walter thought it would have been a relief to kick him.

They straggled up the path, Teenie first, then Limpitlaw carrying the creel upon his shoulders. Thorston followed with a bundle of nets he purposed mending. To him young Dalmahoy kept close, trying to maintain a conversation, which he found unusually difficult—partly, as he thought, owing to the dry answers of Dan. On the headland Teenie darted into the house, followed slowly by Limpitlaw with his creel.

Thorston halted, looking down the abyss, and Walter stood beside him. The latter spoke, wondering all the time how he was to approach the subject which was uppermost in his thoughts.

"It's an ugly place for a fall."

"Aye, I'm thinking there wouldna be many whole bones left if you had a coup down yonder."

"It's a wonder to me how Teenie and I managed to escape tumbling over these cliffs, when we used to be romping about here as if there was no danger and nothing to fear. You should have put up a fence, skipper."

There was a symbolical meaning in his words of which he was quite unconscious.

"What good would that have done, think ye?" said Dan drily. "Fences are just made to be broken, in my opinion. When there's nae fence you take care of yourself; but when there is a fence, folk and bairns are just tempted to try the strength of it, and so bring about the mischief the fences was intended to prevent."

Walter again found himself wondering what he should say next, because he wanted to say one thing and was trying to say another. Sensibly, he determined to say the one thing.

"Thorston, I want to speak to you upon a subject which may surprise you, and somehow I can't get the words out."

"Say awa."

"I want to marry Teenie."

Walter felt as though he could breathe now. But Dan did not look in the least surprised; he began quietly to deposit his nets on the ground, and only said—

"Do you?"

"Yes."

"And what does she say?"

"She agrees."

"Aye, and how long is it since you thought about this?"

"I cannot tell, but it's a good while; and I only waited till I should be placed somewhere, to speak. You'll not stand in the way of what will bring happiness to us both?"

Dan looked very sternly at the nets, as if they had been doing something wrong; he slowly passed one through his hands, searching for holes. That done, he dropped the net on the pile at his feet. All the time Walter was in suspense to learn his decision. But instead of declaring for or against the proposal, he wheeled about to the road, saying—

"Come on."

"Come where?" exclaimed Walter, observing that Dan's steps were not directed towards the cottage.

"To Dalnahoy; I want to hear what the Laird has to say on the matter."

Walter was disturbed by this abrupt manner of dealing with his question, particularly as he was anxious that his father should hear Grace Wishart before his desire to marry Teenie should be made known to him. Besides he would have liked an opportunity to speak himself to the Laird.

"Stop a minute," he said hurriedly, "I have not yet told anything of this to my father."

"All the better," interrupted Dan, "I'll tell him. Come on."

And the skipper looked hard at him, as if he were saying, "If you are honest, what do you fear?"

"I fear nothing more than that you may stir up unnecessary disagreement," would have been Walter's answer to the look, but he replied only to the words, "As you please," and walked on beside him.

Young Dalnahoy had this peculiarity, that whenever he had anything disagreeable to communicate to any one, he liked to do it himself, and face to face. He knew that it would be very unpleasant to his father to learn that he had again determined to alter the plans which had been laid down for his future. He expected there would be a very sharp discussion, if not a decided quarrel; and the presence of Dan Thorston would add considerably to the difficulty he would have in explaining everything to his father—for the latter was very likely to speak words which would be offensive to the skipper. What might be the consequences, formed a most uncomfortable speculation.

As for Dan, he marched along with features as grimly set as if he had been on the deck of a vessel in the midst of a wild storm. The whole event had come upon him somewhat suddenly, and he was not yet certain how he ought to act, further than that the first thing to be done was to learn what the Laird's views were upon the subject. It never occurred to him to question Teenie's fitness to become the wife of the Laird's son; in his eyes Teenie was fit to command the Channel fleet. But he had a shrewd notion that other people might not be quite so well satisfied on that point. That rather confused him.

Teenie had been to him, from babyhood almost, a companion, which was an unusual position for the child of a Scotch parent to occupy. She had never known what it was to stand in awe of him, or to wish to get out of the way on seeing him approach. She had been much with him, in the bay, in the boats, and at sea. He was a man of great muscle, and yet the child could lead him in whatever direction she pleased—always provided no third person observed them. He was never known to yield in the least to the counsels or prayers of anybody he had dealings with. He was called "thwart" (stubborn) at first, but by-and-by, as success attended him, he was called a man of firm will. Teenie only laughed, or moved her little finger, and he submitted, and in that submission he seemed to find his greatest happiness.

"She's a witch," he would mutter, watching her bright movements, and wondering at himself, while he chuckled over some new weakness of which he had just been guilty, "and can do what she likes with me. But it pleases her and does me nae harm," he would add for his own consolation.

Suddenly there comes a man and requires him to surrender his treasure, telling him that she too wishes it! It was not easy for him to decide how to act. The narrow life he had lived had been brightened by few pleasures; work had been everything to him; but he remembered now—looking back through mists and stormy waters, through the good and bad fortune of the sea—how the work had seemed easy to him, thinking of her, and how, in rough winds and darkness, the thought of her had been a light, cheering and comforting him—aye, and giving him courage. It was not easy to think of giving her to somebody else, and of acknowledging that he had no longer the first place in her thoughts.

But she wished it!—the old, gruff, weatherbeaten man felt something akin to jealousy of Burnett, who was beautiful in the mere possession of youth, and who had thus displaced him in Teenie's heart.

So he was silent and grim as he marched along, and Walter did not attempt to disturb him.

They had turned their backs upon Rowanden and the sea. Taking a short cut they passed through a plantation of tall firs. The clear soft light of the afternoon formed brilliant patches of silver beneath the trees, checkered by black shadows. Here the bole of a tree showed white like a woodland nymph laughing as they passed; close by, another, black and gloomy, as it might be the evil genius of the wood. Hurrying along, it was like flashing glimpses of night and morning. The brown boggy earth yielded to their feet; rabbits scampered right and left at their approach; the birds were in full chorus, filling the wood with pleasant sounds, and occasionally a ferret spanned a branch like a streak of light.

They passed out upon the moor; the sunlight on the heather presented a waste of bright purple, interspersed with clumps of green fern, silver gleams of water, and black patches where the heather had been burnt. Two sportsmen were at work, and the report of their guns sounded in the distance like the crack of a popgun, whilst thin wreaths of blue smoke curled slowly upwards. They were having good sport evidently, for the dogs were busy leaping through the heather, with an occasional yelp; then back again to the master's side, silent, watchful of his eyes, and ready to spring forward at the least sign.

Thorston and Walter reached a road which crossed the moor to the hills, and by-and-by they entered the gate of Dalmahoy. The grounds were not very extensive, but they were sufficiently so to make Dan thoughtful; and when he found himself in front of the big heavy house, with its many windows and pepperpot turrets, he had come to the consideration that it might be worth while parting with Teenie if, some day, she was to become the mistress of all this property. He did not understand how anybody owning all this could be poor.

They entered the house, and Walter led the way to a parlour. He inquired for his father. The Laird was in the drawing-room, engaged with some visitors. Walter told the servant to ask when Skipper Thorston could see him.

An old man, with a clean-shaven face wearing a mildly depressed expression—as if he had been suffering martyrdom of some kind so long that he had got used to it—returned with the answer. This was Peter Drysdale, butler and general-in-chief under the Laird of Dalmahoy. He paid no attention to Walter, but addressed Dan as an old friend.

"How are you, skipper? The Laird's thrang—'deed, I think a' our relations from far and near have come to see us the-day. What for there's nae telling; I'm sure they werena wanted, for the Laird was as muckle put out as mysel', when he saw them coming that thick you could hardly count them. But the Laird, as soon as he kenned you was here, loupit up and said he would be wi' you immediately. He was just glad o' any excuse to get awa from our friends."

And apparently Drysdale's surmise was correct, for presently the Laird walked into the room.

END OF CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

SPRING VISITORS.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.

THE most natural employment of the mind during country walks, in the early months of the year, is to seize on the first indications of reviving life in Nature. Sanguine spirits begin to see a slight difference in the length of the days as soon as the shortest one is past. Still more hopeful persons are confident that the sunshine is a trifle warmer, during the fitful moments of a January noonday, than it was in Christmas week. Alas! that snow, frost, and bad weather should ever rudely dispel these pleasing meteorological speculations! In truth they are utterly baseless; all such indications of spring are to be trusted in an English climate about as much as the predictions of Zadkiel.

Far more certain signs of returning warmth and sunshine are to be found in the growth and blossoming of our early spring plants; and there are few more congenial occupations for the reflective than the discovery of these, during a time when Nature offers so little else that is cheering.

The very earliest sign of spring, in the vegetable life of copse and hedgerow, is the putting forth of tender green buds along the clasping arms of the honeysuckle. These may be descried with the turn of the year if the weather be at all favourable. White of Selborne estimates the 25th of January as the date for the honeysuckle's budding. Markwick

(who lived some twenty years later) puts it between January 1st and April 9th; and certainly the earlier date is now the more correct one, the climate of England having been much altered for the better by drainage, etc., since White's time. In the year 1872 we noticed honeysuckle buds on January 13th, and doubtless they might have been found a week earlier; while they appeared throughout the whole winters of 1872-73 and 1873-74, so mild were they.

The flowering of those common garden-weeds, the white and red dead-nettles, are two more very early indications of spring. Passing, however, to a still more interesting branch of studies in country life, and one which almost obtrusively thrusts itself upon ear and eye alike, there can be no more charming occupation during those walks in the country which are so often perfunctorily endured, because it is supposed there can be no objects of interest connected with them, than noting the appearance and song of our spring migratory birds—the return of our emigrants, to use a more comprehensive phrase. Perhaps it is worth while reminding the reader of the most common of these country visitors, and the hint may prove acceptable to those persons who are wont to deem “duty-walks” in the country aimless, and therefore disagreeable.

One of the earliest of our familiar birds to return to its usual haunts round pools and ditches, is the common grey wag-tail. From the first or second week in January (according to the season) till the end of March, he and his brethren, the white and yellow wag-tails, come back, many of them from the south of England, but more perhaps from the Continent, whither they departed in October. The pretty yellow wag-tail, so often seen by the side of small rivers, occasionally delays its migration till the middle of April; but as a rule the wag-tails are the first of the birds of spring that catch our eye.

Before the main body of these visit our shores, a large exodus of winter birds generally takes place; the field-fares, red-wings, royston-crows, etc., desert the meadows and sheep-folds, while numbers of waders, ducks, and water-fowl retire northwards to breed. The naturalist is guided as unerringly by their departure, in his judgment concerning fine weather, as the gardener when he sees the walnut or mulberry trees budding.

Another striking visitor on our downs and upland pastures is the wheat-ear. His appearance is well-marked, between March 13th and 30th, so much so that the Laureate ventures to call him par excellence “the sea-blue bird of March.”

The white patch over this bird's tail is very conspicuous, as it flits before the pedestrian from stone to mound, as though inviting thoughts of spring.

Somewhere between March 19th and April 13th, earlier or later according to weather, the willow-wren (Sylvia trochilus) may be first heard, as it busily flutters through the tops of willows, or indeed any bushy trees, in search of food and a convenient place for its nest. About this time, too, comes a large influx of migratory birds ———“that change their sky

To build and brood; that live their lives
From land to land.”

That mountain-loving bird, the ring-ousel, returns to his favourite haunts. In such spots as Dartmoor and the Lake Country, his appearance must form one of the earliest signs of spring.

Three well-known and much-loved members of the swallow family close, by their arrival amongst us, what may be regarded as the first half of spring. Of these the sand-martin, with his glittering eye and russet plumage, is first to revisit his old domains in the chalk cliff or high gravel bluff. Many a time does the angler in the western counties hail his flashing wing with delight, and then sadly remembers that one swallow does not necessarily make a summer. The dates given for the appearance of the sand-martin are between March 21st and April 12th. In 1871 we first noticed them on March 23rd.

The chimney-swallow is generally a few days later, between March 26th and April 20th. In two recent years we noted their coming on April 11th and 14th. The martin, later again, brings spring in earnest between March 28th and May 1st. In 1873 we first noticed it on the last day of March.

The second division of migratory birds that visit our shores in spring may, conveniently for the memory, be headed by the nightingale. In the localities which it favours, it is heard for the first time between April 1st and May 1st. But these localities are very circumscribed, though of late years the bird seems to have been ranging more north—as, for instance, to Lincolnshire and Yorkshire. It is supposed that it crosses the Channel at the narrowest point, and but slightly diverges on reaching England to the right and left of the district which that implies. Thus it is a great curiosity in Devon, whither it might be supposed that a genial climate and plenty of myrtles would have irresistibly attracted it.

The red-start is, one may say, the next of our familiar garden visitors to arrive, say between April 8th and 28th. It is not every one, however, who has heard its song, although its peculiar chatter may frequently be detected at the margin of copses.

The white-throat, chiff-chaff, and garden-warbler are three more welcome songsters which arrive in April. Spring would hardly seem spring to those who are fond of a garden, did they not hail the presence in that month or in May of these birds amongst their shrubs. The other willow-wrens, too, may in April be observed—the middle willow-wren and second willow-wren—but it is not every one who is ornithologist enough to discriminate between them and their earlier relative. With regard to the grasshopper-warbler, however, no mistake need be feared. Between April 16th and 30th is his time for returning to his old haunts—woods, coppices, etc.; and if any one rambles there after dusk in May, the indefatigable little fellow soon announces himself. His strain is monotonous enough, and does not seem to possess more compass than the chirping of his namesakes; but it is singularly captivating, and associates itself with spring sounds more, perhaps, than any other bird's song, with the solitary exception of the thrush. It may be described as being a gentle imitation of the night-jar's creaking sameness, much lower, and proportionately sweeter.

Three more birds may complete our list of spring immigrants more familiarly known to lovers of the country.

With the swift's arrival, the last of the swallow family that visits us, summer may speedily be expected. It is a bird intolerant of cold, the last of the Hirundinæ to come and the first to depart. From April 13th to May 7th it may be expected, and it leaves again by the 10th of August, whereas its congeners stay till October. No sound is more intimately connected with a fine evening in June than the hideous scream of these birds, as they chase one another in swiftly-cut circles at an immense height in the air, or swoop down with lightning quickness to some old ruin.

They are exceedingly curious birds, and were peculiarly honoured in being studied by White of Selborne as even he studied but few other birds, and seem very capricious in their choice of a locality. Some years they abound at one place, whereas in other years very few are to be seen. Their sweep of wing and powers of endurance, however, are so vast, that they are probably looked for very often at a time when they may be hawking for food many miles away.

Of the cuckoo, whose appearance may be expected in the middle of April, nothing need be said. He "tells his name to all the hills," and announces his approach to every child.

In some parts of the country the wry-neck is commonly called the "cuckoo's mate," from being associated in the rustic mind with that bird. It generally comes over some little time before the cuckoo; and, considering that almost all small birds mob the cuckoo when it approaches them, country folk appear to have exercised less than their usual discrimination in natural history when they termed it "cuckoo's mate."

The latest of our spring birds, whose approach is perhaps more expected in a garden than any other, is the fly-catcher. He cannot appear until there are flies, so it is not till between May 10th and 30th that he is to be looked for. All of a sudden, some fine sunny morning, he may then be descried on his accustomed post, busily dashing off it to make a raid on his prey, and as quickly returning, just as much at home as though he had not been a day absent. And then in a few days more the old nest in the trellis-work or under the ivy near the window will be repaired, and nestling cares commence anew.

Fly-catchers are particularly obliged and grateful to those who leave croquet-hoops permanently on the lawn. Nothing suits them so well for a series of hunting lodges, from which they can sally and vary their position at will. These also serve to bring them to a nearer level with those numberless insects which sport on grass. Any one may win a fly-catcher's confidence by the simple means of placing a stick across two erect ones driven into the lawn near the little bird's nest. They will regularly use it, and thus become gradually very tame.

How dull would spring be, with all its wonderful flush of beauty, were it not for these melodious guests of our gardens and groves! It is the greatest of delights to live in that season, as it were, by a floral and ornithological clock, to know precisely when each flower and bird may be expected.

We in England, with all our enthusiasm for natural history, have never been able to boast of a man who in this sense was so thoroughly a son of Nature as was the American poet-naturalist, Thoreau. Emerson, after a walk with him, wrote: "On the day I speak of he looked for the menyanthes (bog-bean), detected it across the wide pool, and on examination of its florets decided that it had been in flower five days. He drew out of his pocket his diary, and read the names of all the plants that should bloom on this day, whereof he kept account, as a banker when his notes fall due. The cypripedium was not due until to-morrow. He thought, if he waked up from a trance in this swamp, that he could tell, by the plants what time of the year it was within two days." Spring gives us the best chance during our year of emulating this skill in plant and bird lore; and even now this wonderful winter of 1874 has passed away. Spring "is come,

Shaking a shower of blossoms from the shrubs,
And bearing on their fragrance; and he brings
Music of birds and rustling of green boughs
And sound of swaying branches, and the voice Of distant waterfalls." (W. C. BRYANT.)

Happy they who are able to lengthen each spring by anticipation as well as by pleasing reminiscences of its beauty.

A FOREST FANCY.

"WITH DAYLIGHT COMETH A FAIR YOUNG MAID."

FAREBELLS and fern from a forest nook!
 Oh! leave them with me and let me dream!—
 I see them growing beside a brook,
 And hear the wimpling trill of the stream.

I watch from a round, red knob uprise,
 Crosier-headed, the feathery fronds,
 Till graceful plumes, under summer skies,
 Wave as rejoicing o'er broken bonds;

And close by the green umbrageous fern,
Which arches over a fairy bower,
A pendulous blue inverted urn,
Where goblins shelter from sun and shower—
The harebell, on its delicate stem
So daintily poised, so lightly swung,
Whence music audible unto them
Floats on the air as by zephyrs rung.
The fiery sun goes down to his bath,
Moonbright lances are shot through the trees,
Wee elves come trooping by many a path,
As harebell chimes swell out on the breeze.
The cricket answers with shrill delight
That harebell summons still pealing out,

The glow-worm lamps are lit for the night,
And echo thrills with a fairy shout.
For, guarded by fays with spears of grass,
To mossy dais, and acorn throne,
The elfin queen and her courtiers pass
To the palace of fern—she calls her own.
In feast and frolic they wile the time,
With feats too deft for a form of clay,
Dancing while pensile harebells chime—
Dawn break! the faeries are fled away!
With daylight cometh a fair young maid—
Her touch as light as an elf's might be Beguiles the harebell and fern from the glade,
And—brings the forest and fays to me.
MRS. G. LINNÆUS DANKE.

THE STORY OF A MINIATURE, AS TOLD BY A PIECE OF GOLDSMITH'S WORK.

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

IN FIVE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE THIRD.

MRS. RONDEAU was sitting in her lower room, sewing by the light of a weaver's oil-lamp which hung from a string fastened to the mantelpiece. The place was very bare. Few of the little ornaments that usually decorate even a poor home remained, and the good woman's eyes were red with recent crying. The loom in the upper part of the house was empty, and so was the cupboard, or very nearly so.

"There goes the quarter," she said, as she heard the chiming of a distant clock. "I wish I'd gone myself instead of sending the poor child. What would Peter say if he knew—ah! and what would that old flinty-hearted wretch say if he knew! How I wish she would come, even if she came back without the money!"

The night had set in gloomily enough, as Sara Rondeau went quickly through the now almost deserted streets on her way to a dim shop, where three golden balls hung to an iron bracket at the door, to show the sort of business that was carried on within. It was not the first visit she had made to this establishment, for the poor little household ornaments, the loss of which had left her home so bleak and bare, were now in the safe-keeping of the proprietor; but still she shrank back as she approached a dim side entrance in a narrow street, and drawing her bonnet closer over her face, pushed open a baize door, and entered a dark passage divided on one side into a row of narrow cells, separated from each other by wooden partitions.

She made so little noise, and still kept so far back in the pervading gloom, that her presence was unnoticed by a shabby-looking man, who was just then engaged in earnest conversation with somebody in the next box. Before she had spoken, and while she was yet in the shadow of the partition, she thought she recognised the voice of the person who was speaking as that of Bashley, and held her breath to listen, for a name was mentioned which sent the blood back to her heart and made her feel sick and faint.

"Well, as long as everything's safe," said the pawnbroker's assistant, who leaned his elbows on the counter, so that his head was close to the partition; "but we've got a good deal here now, you know, and if the thing should be blown——"

"Yah, who's to blow it?" retorted Bashley, with an oath; "I tell you everything's ready, and the risk's mine. Old Dormeur's half childish, and as to the young one, I tell you he's safe enough for a week, if I like to keep him so. He'd an appointment to supper with the old man to-night, and he won't keep it. If he's not on his way now to see the girl Rondeau, he's tied up neck and heels, by this time, and in a safe place out of harm's way. I tell you I can be back here in an hour or two. You're too deep in now to draw back, Ben; and besides, who can swear to raw silk? I shall go first, and look after the girl; then I mean to call on the old man, and send him out on a wild goose chase. The rest's easy, for I've a key, and a light cart at the back can whip the stuff down here in a jiffey. The game's in my hands now, and I shall play to win."

"But when the young un tells his version of the story?"

"How can he? He comes out without knowing where from; and if ever he did, he's been in an empty house. A pretty cock-and-bull story! No, no; if the old man believes it, he won't face the disgrace, for he more than half suspects his grandson as it is. Come now, will you or won't you?"

Sarah Rondeau, crouching by the door, hears this with an undefined fear which paralyses her for a moment, but leaves one thought in her troubled mind.

Some foul plot is hatching against Antoine, and she is powerless to hinder it. No—one thing she can do, if only she can creep back unnoticed. She will use all her strength to reach Mr. Dormeur's house, and tell him what she has heard. It is a question of minutes. Walking backward and pressing slowly against the noiseless door, she slips out again, and, like one pursued, begins to run at her utmost speed through the darkened streets.

Anton Dormeur sits alone in the grim old house. Cook and housekeeper have gone to market for the means of providing supper. Not a footfall sounds in the street; only the wailing voice of the watchman calling the hour at a distance breaks the dead silence, amidst which the old man can hear the ticking of the gold repeater in his pocket, the tinkle of the ashes that stir in the old wide grate, where a fire has been lighted, and the gnawing of a mouse behind the wainscot. He sits with me beside him on the table, his knees towards the fire, his furrowed face quivering as he bends it down over the miniature he has taken from its case, the miniature of his younger daughter, dead and—no, not unforgotten—dead and mourned for now with a silent grief that speaks of years of desolation and remorse.

The light of the shaded lamp falling on the picture in his hands seems to expand its lineaments; the tears that gather in his eyes almost give quivering motion to the face before him. A strange emotion masters him. His temples seem to throb, his hands to shake. The sudden sound of a light single knock at the street-door sets his nerves ajar; the quiet click of the lock—a pause of dearest silence—and then the light tread of an uncertain foot upon the stairs make him tremble; yet he knows not why—does not even ask himself the reason. There is a lamp outside upon the landing, he knows—a light hat shines down into the hall—and yet he cannot stir towards it. What superstition holds him? Even at the moment that he starts up from his chair, the portrait still in his hand, his highly-strung senses enable him to hear a rustle that sounds quite close, and is followed by a low knocking at the door of the room itself.

In a voice of hope, of dread, of fear, he knows not what or which, he hoarsely cries, "Come in."

In the mirror above his head he sees the room-door partly open, and then—yes, then—either to his waking vision or in disordered fancy, the living original of the picture stands with pale and earnest face in the upright bar of light that streams in from the landing.

His daughter—not as he had last seen her, but with a difference unaccountable if he had had time to think or strength to reason. His daughter, with the past years rolled back to show her in her youth, and yet with poor and scanty dress, and long fair hair tossed in confusion on her shoulders, whence a battered bonnet hung.

He had no time to note all this at first. He only knew that his heart seemed to be going out in some dumb movement towards this apparition—that he sank again into his chair—that he felt a living hand upon his shoulder—saw a frightened face looking into his. Then his senses came back, and he heard the voice speak rapidly, and in French.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

WITH swift steps, but without picking his way, taking the nearest road rather by habit than with any observation, Antoine Dormeur traversed the narrow streets leading to his destination. There were so few people abroad that the way was clear enough, and yet there were some apprentices or worklads on their way home; while, in that neighbourhood just on the edge of Spitalfields, a lower colony of petty thieves and receivers kept up the trade of two or three disreputable taverns, where dogs, birds, and pigeons were exchanged or betted on. It may have been in consequence of this taste for pigeon-flying that the whole neighbourhood resounded with whistles and bird-calls. Men and boys gave each other this shrill greeting as they passed, or warned each other by it, or used it to express reproach or pleasure, hilarity or dismay, varying its peculiar note to suit each emotion. The Hare Street whistle was as well-known an institution there as the jodel is to the Tyrolese peasant.

It scarcely surprised Antoine, therefore, when, as he reached a beer-shop (the last lighted house before the straggling street opened into a dirty lane leading to the open fields), a man who was just emerging from the place gave a low whistle as he turned in the opposite direction, and crossed the road. Had he given the matter a thought, he might have hesitated for a moment before plunging into the gloom of the muddy lane, or at least might have grasped his walking-cane more firmly, and looked about him, in which case it is just possible he would have seen two shadows that moved in the darkness of the wall some fifty yards behind. As it was, he did neither. The course of his gloomy thoughts was unbroken by so trivial an interruption, and continued to be so till he approached a corner where a high ragged fence turned off on the edge of a foot-path.

Only a sudden scuffle, a muttered oath, and the grasp of two powerful arms, that pinioned his elbows to his side, awakened him.

Three men had leaped out from the projecting corner of the fence, where a light cart was drawn up, and were upon him before he could raise a hand; but he was quick and active, so that by a sudden turn and trip he bore to the ground the fellow who held him, and fell upon him heavily.

"Give it him, and quick there with the sack!" cried this worthy, as they rolled on the path together. Another ruffian seized Antoine by the throat. A weapon gleamed before his eyes; but in that moment a quick patter of feet sounded in the roadway, followed by two reports like the sudden breaking of a cocoa-nut. Crack! crack! and the ruffian's body fell heavily against the fence as two shadows—the two shadows that had been following Antoine so long—danced in the footway, whence they had just struck a second of the ruffians through a jagged hole in the fence, and left him sticking there till he recovered his senses. In a moment the young man felt his arms released, and struggled to his feet, his late antagonist escaping by a plunge through the fence, and a desperate run across the fields, where he was followed by a flash and the report of a pistol, which failed to stop him.

"Who fired?" said one of the shadows, now visible—a light active fellow, armed with a knotted cudgel.

"I did, Mat," replied a voice that Antoine knew, as a thin spare old man came from the open space beyond.

"Are you hurt, my boy?" he asked tenderly, approaching Antoine, who stared from one to another in amazement.

"Pierre—Pierre Dobree!" exclaimed the young man; "you here—and these—how is all this?"

"I will tell you presently," said the old pensioner, for it was he indeed. "I expected a trap, and had you followed by two lads that I could trust.—Gave him a body-guard of a couple of weaver-lads, eh?" he said, turning to the rescuers. "You've done your work well, boys."

"Why, we haven't been three years at sea and learnt the knack of the press-gang for nothing, daddy," replied one of them grinning; "but we must be off; we ain't constables, you know, and there may be trouble about."

"Antoine, you shan't be disappointed of your ride in the cart," said Peter; "we must hasten, or your grandfather will be waiting supper. He will have to excuse me, though. Come, in with you."

The two shadows leaped lightly up, and one of them took the reins.

"Stop, though," he said suddenly; "this isn't our cart. This will be brought in stealing. It might be a hanging matter, daddy."

"I'm going to take it to the owner if I'm not much mistaken," said Peter, as he and Antoine scrambled in at the back.

"But, Pierre Dobree, what of Sara? what of your niece? I must know. If she is in danger, and through me, I will brave my grandfather's displeasure, lose my hope of the fortune for which I care so little. I will, I must find her!"

"You can no more find her than I," said the old man. "One word with your grandfather, and then I go to seek her."

"What! She has left home then?"

"Only this evening, and for an hour or two; but if my hopes do not play me false, we shall overtake the scoundrel who detains her, and he shall answer for it with my hand at his throat but I will have her back."

Pierre Dobree was ordinarily a calm, rather rosy, cheerful, high-dried old Frenchman, quite small and thin, and with a very perceptible stoop; but Antoine said afterwards that there was a very terrible look in his face just then—such a look as may have been born, perhaps, in the days of Terror, when he stood in the crowd beneath the guillotine and saw the head of Achilles Dufarge fall into the sack.

END OF CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

A MODEL BOARD.

BOARDS of Guardians are usually dogs with bad names, and, as a rule, their ill repute is fully justified.

Parochial Guardians of the poor consider it their duty to guard their own pockets and those of the ratepayers, rather than to guard over the interests of the poor. A pauper is an unnecessary evil; and the sooner the better he rids of his presence the world in general, and the parish in particular. These are the propositions that frame themselves in ordinary minds of the vestry order, and their practical consequences have too often become apparent through workhouse exposures. Far otherwise think the Board of Guardians for the Relief of the Jewish Poor. "Our brother is in distress," says this body, "let us satisfy his immediate wants, and stretch out to him a friendly hand, to save him from falling into the Slough of Despond."

Let us here speak a few words on the lower class of Jews. The Jews are essentially a charitable race. They help, from the cradle to the grave, those of their people who need support. There are a number of beneficent institutions among them, forming a series of links, and covering the whole existence of a struggling honest man. There can be no "Ginx's Baby" among the Jews. Charity accompanies into this world the child of lowly life. The mother receives medical advice, and material comforts; the father obtains a gratuity; the child, if a boy, is educated, apprenticed to a trade, started in life. He is tended when sick, pensioned when old, buried when dead; and his family are provided for, during the week of confined mourning when Jews do not work.

Girls also enjoy similar advantages; they have a considerable chance of securing a marriage portion from various societies, and they are cared for if they become widows.

Notwithstanding all this kindness and charity, a vast amount of poverty undoubtedly prevails among the Jews. This may, to a partial extent, be attributed to the especial difficulties under which labour their working classes. The occupations followed by Jewish working men have been restricted by habit, and by peculiar surrounding circumstances. The Jew is not rough enough to seek work in the docks or on railways; and he would be unable to hold his own against English or Irish labourers, or navvies. He is excluded from seeking employment in Christian workshops, by the precepts of his faith. The observing Jew must rest on Sabbaths and festival days, and must not taste forbidden food. So it happens that we seldom meet with Jewish carpenters, cabinet-makers, masons, or iron-founders. The Jew is constrained to earn his living by barter, or by following such trades as he may carry on at home, or under the auspices of his own co-religionists. The traffic in second-hand clothing appears to be diminishing so far as the Jews are concerned, and blue-eyed natives of Erin compete freely with swarthy Israelites for "ogh clo." The occupations principally pursued by Jews are those of tailors, cigar-makers, boot, shoe, and slipper-makers, glaziers, general dealers, and "travellers" or hawkers. A gentleman in that community, who wields the pen as skilfully as the pencil, proposes a scheme for the establishment of workshops, where persons of his race could be instructed in handicrafts not at present practised by them, and where they could follow their art in accordance with their usages; and we sincerely hope that he may be enabled soon to see his philanthropic plan effectively carried out. But the greatest cause of the distress reigning among the Jews is unquestionably the unceasing immigration of pauperism from Germany, from Holland, from Poland; and it is that which strains the resources of that community to the utmost.

While Jewish artisans are placed at great disadvantage as regards their Christian fellow-workmen, Providence has endowed the former with certain qualities, that explain how it is that more Jews than Gentiles rise from the humblest ranks to positions of comparative affluence. The Israelite is a staunch believer in the maxim that "honesty is the best policy," however this statement may be in conflict with the assertions of some writers. Then the Jew is persevering and industrious, and ready to endure an amount of privation that no English workman would consent to undergo. He is domesticated, and affectionate to his wife and family. He does not, in moments of playfulness, dash out, with the poker, the brains of the woman he has undertaken to love and protect; and neither does he kick her to death. There are no "friendly leads" among his people to help "a pal" in trouble, for Jews are seldom convicted of stealing; and yet he is always ready to share his crust of bread with one poorer than himself. Finally, he is singularly abstemious and he does not squander his earnings in, and muddle his head with, doctored beer, or burn his interior with adulterated gin. The sobriety of the Jews is proverbial, and it is reflected in the superior cleanliness and neatness of their dwellings as compared with the dwellings of the Gentile indigent. Extreme squalor is seldom apparent in Jewish homes; scrofula and intemperance are very rarely to be met with, and miserable humanity is never seen so utterly fallen and degraded among them as among their neighbours.

The question of the foreign poor became one of paramount importance among the Jews. The shoals of destitute Jews flocking over to this country from the Ghettos of Germany, and the bleak plains of Poland, caused serious anxiety to the Synagogue authorities. The want of organised relief increased the suffering of the English poor, and entailed aggravated hardships on the foreigners who arrived from abroad without means, ignorant of the English tongue, and not knowing whither to turn for aid.

In 1859 it was resolved to establish an organisation to meet these requirements. The Jewish Board of Guardians, then called into existence, at first dealt only with a limited part of the poor of their faith. In 1871 the United Synagogue, a corporation composed of the principal congregations of German Jews, and including the majority of the Jews of London, resolved to entrust to their Board of Guardians the relief of nearly all casual cases. This body has proved itself a most valuable institution, fully deserving the support of Jew and Christian. It effects a vast amount of good. It aims not at merely repressing pauperism, but at circumscribing its existence, and diminishing its pressure. It prefers, when practicable, to assist a man to gain his own living, rather than to bestow upon him temporary relief. And instead of pursuing the ordinary system practised in English workhouses, of considering every man a rogue until proved to be honest, it follows the more merciful dictates of English law, which believes every man innocent until proved to be guilty.

The objects of the Jewish Board of Guardians are multifarious, and its operations are assisted by no fewer than eight or nine committees. The "Loan Committee" advances sums from one to ten pounds, on the security of from one to three persons; the amounts so lent to be returned by weekly instalments, which are usually punctually paid. The "Investigating Committee" selects the worthy from the unworthy, and forms and revises the list of those deserving poor who receive fixed periodical allowances. The "Medical Committee" provides medical advice and drugs for the sick, supplies surgical appliances, and sends to the hospitals of the country fever and other cases requiring special treatment. The "Work Committee" disposes of a number of sewing machines to tailors and others, who, by a small weekly disbursement, may in time become the owners of the bread-winning machines, just as pianos are sold on what is called the "three years' system."

Another committee conducts the work-rooms in Bishopsgate Street, where young women of the humbler classes among the Jews learn various kinds of needle-work—dress-making, etc. Then lately an "Industrial Committee" has been formed, to promote the cultivation among the Jewish lads of those handicrafts which have hitherto been neglected in that community. We may truly say that human ingenuity has been exercised to the utmost in endeavouring to solve satisfactorily one of the most difficult and most important of problems.

It would be impossible, on this occasion, to render an intelligible account of the constitution of the Jewish Board of Guardians, or even to describe its working. We shall, therefore, limit ourselves to affording our readers a glance at the manner in which the Jews treat their casual poor. By the kindness of the President of the Board, we were permitted to be present at a distribution of relief. Such distributions are usually effected by two or three members of the Board, who sit in rotation for the purpose, twice a week. Applications for relief are received at the office on three mornings every week, and they are at once referred to the investigating officer, who, between the time of application and the time of relief, thoroughly inquires into the circumstances of each case. Persons of immoral conduct, or of bad character, are summarily dismissed, and professional beggars are very coldly looked upon.

During 1872 no fewer than 2,137 individuals solicited aid from the Board; of these 784 were new applicants, and principally consisted of Polish Jews. There is a regulation, to the effect that no relief shall be granted except in cases of great emergency to any foreigner, unless he or she shall have been domiciled in this country for at least six months before the date of application. But the Jewish Guardians have a soft corner in their heart, and cases of great emergency are remarkably frequent.

We are in the offices of this corporation, which are situated in a large house in Devonshire Square. The ground-floor of the house, probably once the residence of some wealthy City magnate, is divided into several apartments. In a spacious chamber the applicants await anxiously, until the striking of a bell shall summon them in turns before those who practically dispose of their fate. Two other rooms are substantially furnished as offices, and in the larger of the two the awards of relief are made. One member only of the Board attends on this occasion. This gentleman briskly takes a seat before a table: at his side sits the investigating officer, who presents him with the history of each case on printed forms, while the zealous secretary faces the Guardian with a pile of papers before him. Each applicant as he comes forward stands within a bar close to the door. The Guardian has already mastered the features of the case from the slips handed to him, and a few well-judged questions lay before him the past condition of the man and his present wants. The countenances of the applicants, it must be owned, are not promising as a rule. They are mostly Poles; and their under-sized frames, shaggy beetle-brows, prominent cheek-bones, and sallow unwholesome skin show too truly that centuries of misery, of oppression, and of hardships have marked their effect on their moral and physical development.

We perceive principally husbands, for the presence of wives is discouraged: the Guardians desire to see the bread-winners, who seem to be all in a state of abject poverty. Some are out of work; others are in work, but their earnings are insufficient; the shadow of sickness haunts the home of this one, and the partner of that other is about to present him with an eighth child. To each of these are allotted a few shillings, and so many tickets representing bread, grocery, and coals. Some more are prevented from obtaining employment by the lack of clothes or of implements, or need a little cash to start them in a humble business. Those are sent away happy, for their prayer is granted. One man obtains funds to buy a new diamond for his glazier's tool; a second is enabled to purchase a barrel of olives; a third is put in the way of selling lemons. All of them, it is hoped, may earn their living at least for some time to come, and care is taken to avoid pauperising them entirely. A fourth asks for some hosiery to retail, and he strenuously denies having been helped before by the Board. The indefatigable secretary produces a huge volume, which must contain a singular epitome of human wretchedness. Then the fact that once money had been granted to him, for the same purpose, stares the applicant in the face. But that was two years ago, and the man is poor, honest, and industrious. His white lie is looked over; he gets some money, and tickets for bread and grocery, and some pieces of bright silver from the private purse of the Guardian are slipped into his hand.

The most singular case that we meet with is that of a young Prussian, who speaks English fairly, having visited the United States. He had recently served as a soldier in the Prussian army, when one day he had a "difficulty" with a superior officer, whom he struck on the head. How he managed to break through the rigorous discipline of the Prussian army, it is not easy to understand. He states that he contrived to desert, and that a friendly rabbi helped him to cross the Prussian frontier.

The fellow's face wears a dogged sullen look, arguing certainly no sweetness of temper. The dispensers of charity place the most favourable construction on the deserter's story. He has a brother at Plymouth, whom he wishes to rejoin; a passage to that port by steamer is promised him for the morrow, and a trifle is given him to procure himself a meal and a night's lodging. Afterwards are ushered in some members of that sex which, in the present instance, by no stretch of courtesy can be called fair. They are widows, or women whose husbands are abroad; and all of them receive some assistance.

In less than two hours upwards of thirty cases are relieved. The Jewish Board of Guardians take effective measures to prevent imposition, and the objects they succour all represent unfeigned and more or less severe distress. Not one applicant is on this occasion dismissed entirely empty-handed. In the two or three instances where no grant is made by the Board, the Guardian privately bestows upon the applicants small gratuities, and the same kind-hearted gentleman frequently supplements the relief of the Board with slight donations of his own.

Who shall say what amount of suffering was allayed on that short afternoon? The persons assisted, with those who depended from them, probably amounted to one hundred human beings! And we rejoice to think that most of them, on that bitter cold night, enjoyed substantial fare, basked in the grateful warmth of a blazing fire, or prepared themselves with revived hopes to renew once more the battle of life!

MEN WHO FACE DEATH.

THE ENGINEER.

THE weather had been dirty for several days. As the heavens were obscured no observation could be taken, and we had been obliged to sail by "dead reckoning"—that is, we guessed our position from the log. Dead reckoning is not a very satisfactory mode of ascertaining a vessel's position, and as the navigation of this part of our voyage was rather difficult, the poor captain was very anxious. He and the officers were continually glancing heavenward to try to get a peep at the sun; but, as I have said, for days together there was nothing to be seen but heavy masses of clouds or banks of foggy drizzle. We steamed along, half-speed, a very strict look-out being kept. There was one wild rocky point which the skipper was very anxious to give as wide a berth as possible, and to make sure of this, as he thought, he instructed the officers to make a great allowance in the steering. We should have made land by this time, but hitherto none had been sighted.

When I turned in for my watch below, the sea was getting up, and I noticed the captain and chief officer on the bridge in very earnest consultation.

"There will be a gale blowing shortly," thought

I, as I turned into my bunk in order to snatch four hours' sleep if possible.

I fell into a profound slumber as soon as I had put my head down. Just as four bells (2 a.m.) were being struck, I was hurriedly roused by the entrance of the chief engineer. His face was blanched with horror, and his tongue fastened, as he roused me up—

"Get up, Thomson—get up for God's sake! We are going ashore, man, and there's an awful gale blowing, and the cursed thing is that there is something got loose in the engine—something down below out of sight—and if it is not tightened up at once, she will tear herself to bits."

"Why don't you stop her then and see what is wrong?" I asked half angrily; "I have only had two hours below—that's four bells just gone."

"Stop her?" said the chief; "we can't! The engine must be kept going to hold her head to the sea, and keep way on her. We are drifting on a lee shore, in a gale, and if we turn broadside to the sea, or if the engine breaks down altogether, we'll be among the rocks and the foam in ten minutes."

I now sprang out of my bunk, and hastily dressed. While I was doing so, the chief explained the situation more fully. Some one must go down and put things to rights, or all would perish. The difficulties and dangers of the task consisted in the fact that it must be accomplished while the engine was going, and all the while the ship was tumbling and kicking about in a most desperate fashion. Then again the engines were "racing" every few minutes—i.e., when the propeller was raised out of the water the engine went at a terrific pace, owing to the resistance being removed. It was not pleasant to dive down into that hot hole among frantic machinery—the ship's jumping and tumbling about—and nothing to grasp but hot, slippery, oily iron, or steel bars—nothing to tread on but slippery iron gratings.

The chief was too old and stiff to go down—besides, as he remarked, he had a wife and children, etc. etc. He also remarked that I was not in that position. Further, he stated that I knew well enough that the third engineer had been ill for days, and now the fourth (who was a new hand) was either afraid or sea-sick—he said the latter.

Would I go down?

That was the question.

I thought of the bonnie lassie who had put her arms tenderly round my neck and kissed me when I said good-bye—I recalled the tearful tender glance of her loving blue eyes, and the tone of her sweet thrilling voice as she said, "Oh, Willie, take good care of yourself for my sake!"

Then I thought of my being hashed and mangled among the machinery below.

That girl was my betrothed wife, and her father had promised to bless our union when I was a chief engineer—but not till then. Jeanie and I knew him to be a man of his word, and Jeanie was a dutiful and obedient daughter, and so we waited and hoped. The chief seemed to guess what was passing in my mind, for he held out his hand, and said, "If you manage this job, Willie, I'll back out—I've saved enough now—I'm tired of going to sea—and you'll be chief engineer next voyage. There is my hand on it."

I grasped his hand—I knew that I was sure of the first vacancy that occurred, and I knew also that old Craigton would keep his promise.

I braced myself up, but still I felt a chill run through me, and my heart throbbed in my throat for a minute.

But I felt as if this were my chance to obtain possession of Jeanie. It was the old feeling of chivalry—doing a daring deed for a woman's sake.

I stood on deck for a minute or two. The screaming blast of wind and the heavy clouds of spray acted like tonics. I soon gained complete self-possession, and descended to my desperate work. Old Craigton stood by to choke off the steam when the engines began to race.

Down I went—down into that hole where I had even less mercy to expect than in a lion's den. Taking my life in my hand, I descended to the depths—with the vision of a fair woman before me.

Soon I was in the midst of the turmoil—slipping, grasping, gasping, panting, perspiring at every pore. Sometimes my head began to reel, but by a strong effort I steadied myself. The whole thing was like a hideous nightmare.

A few minutes sufficed to enable me to detect the mischief—and I saw at once that it could be remedied, and also that it was quite time it should be. A few minutes more, and the nut would have been off altogether, and the engine would then have torn herself to pieces in two strokes. Bracing all my energies, I succeeded in applying my screw-key again and again. It required great quickness of hand to seize the second of time in which a turn could be given. I now found the value of my Clyde training. On the Clyde an engineer is taught all about the parts of an engine—he learns to do all that requires to be done in case of break-down. I now felt the value of this broad engineering education.

At length I succeeded in making all tight—just as my head began to swim, and my sight began to grow indistinct. How I managed to climb and scramble up again I scarcely know. Old Craigton and one of the firemen hauled me up part of the way by catching hold of my coat-collar. When I got out on deck, I fainted and fell.

But now the engine could be worked firmly, and we were saved.

I did not do much more work during that voyage. I was utterly exhausted; my nerves were quite unstrung. But I got my reward.

When we came into port the passengers gave me a dinner, and presented me with this watch—read the inscription—and I was feasted and flattered till my head was nearly turned. The chief and the captain both spoke well for me, and I was appointed chief engineer to a new steamer which the company had just launched.

All these things were but means to an end. I grudged every minute that I was away from my sweet lassie.

I would not tell you all that we said and looked when we met—no, not for the world—for Jeanie then would never forgive me.

Well, I'll say this. When I clasped her in my arms, and felt her arms tightening round me, and when I felt her hot tears—well, well! Jeanie, I'll say no more.

We were made man and wife when I came home from my first voyage as chief. And in a few years the company gave me a good post on shore, with a snug salary.

So I'll go to sea no more.

And these are the bairns, two laddies and three lassies. Do you think that they take more after the mother or me?

IN HONOUR BOUND.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

THE LAIRD.

THE Laird of Dalmahoy was tall and large-boned; his features large, except the nose, which was small and inclined upwards; very few wrinkles,

"Now is my opportunity," he whispered to an old friend who sat beside him.

"For heaven's sake, Hugh, let me out first," exclaimed his friend in a whisper, rising hurriedly to escape the spectacle of the Laird's humiliation.

"NOW, NOW! BE PATIENT."

thin grey hair cut short, no hair on the face, and quick keen eyes. Dress neat—a large show of white shirt-front, about which he was particular. He was sixty, and would have passed for not more than fifty. In the morning he usually appeared in a dark brown tweed suit, the coat cut short as for a youth. He carried his head high, shoulders square, and was proud to believe that people still regarded him as quite young. He was pleased to be a radical by profession; he was an intense conservative in fact. He sat in Parliament for the county under several governments. He had promised great things; he had done nothing. On one occasion he had meditated a speech, when some county affairs engaged the attention of the House.

That crushed the orator in the bud. He never spoke in the House; and soon afterwards—finding that he was not likely to be returned—he gracefully retired from his onerous position. He was fond, however, of letting off at local meetings, agricultural dinners, or flower shows, or even into the ears of individuals who were sure to listen to him, those fireworks of eloquence which had been intended to set the House in flames.

He liked to be regarded in the character of an enthusiast; he was constantly theorising about the greatest happiness for the greatest number; the minority must submit to be sacrificed to the majority. It was the nature of things; we could see it in the animal, aye, and in the vegetable kingdom; and the absolute necessity for an immediate recognition of the law in human affairs was apparent on every hand, in the contentions between class and class which never ceased.

He was perfectly sincere in his declamation and faith in his theory, but he never thought of himself being in the minority; consequently he increased his rents whenever he found an opportunity, he preserved his game strictly, and he held his family in severe subjection, so that his theories and actions were not always in accord; and his enthusiasm—a friend said—was uncommonly like a disguise for a selfish nature. But the Laird was innocent of all intentional hypocrisy. He believed thoroughly in himself and in the honesty of his every word and act.

"Have you come about that Methven business, too?" he said as he entered.

"What Methven business?" asked Dan, surprised.

"Oh!" This was a half-subdued note of astonishment and inquiry, and there was something in it which suggested that the Laird regretted he had spoken so hastily.

He raised his glasses—heavily mounted in gold—and glanced at an open letter in his hand. Then, as he dropped the glasses, he looked at the skipper curiously.

Walter was standing at the window, tapping the sill with his fingers, and gazing out on the lawn. He was puzzled by the readiness with which his father had come to see Dan Thorston, and more so by the question he had asked. Walter had at once associated the name Methven with the millionaire who died recently, and he could not imagine how that event could have anything to do with Dan.

"I care naething about the business you speak of, Laird," said Dan in his dry way; "I came to speak about your son Walter."

"About Walter?" exclaimed the Laird, evidently mystified; "has he been doing anything wrong?"

The son wheeled round and frankly met his father's eyes.

"We'll see about that. He wants to marry my daughter Teenie, and I want to ken what you have to say to it."

"Wants to marry your daughter!" (taking a long breath and looking more astounded than displeased).

"Just that, and though I would as soon see her married to him as to anybody, she shall be wife to nae man whose friends will not make her welcome."

"Quite right—very sensible," muttered the Laird, evidently thinking about something else.

"Let me tell you, too," proceeded Dan quietly, "this has taken me as muckle by surprise as yourself, and the minute I heard of it I came to you."

"Thank you, Thorston—I would have expected as much from you. Will you excuse me a minute?"

The Laird, with brows knit, again examined the letter he held, and then carefully placed it in a large morocco pocket-book; apparently he was satisfied upon some subject which had engaged his attention.

Walter all this time was watching him, his pulse beating fast with suspense.

The father slowly crossed the room to his son, and looking straight in his eyes, said in an undertone simply—

"Miss Wishart?"

"She knows;" and Walter felt his cheeks hot whilst his eyes sought the floor. During the last two or three minutes he had been faintly hoping that Grace had already explained.

The Laird bent his head and returned to Dan. Taking up his position on the hearth-rug, one hand behind him, whilst the other played with his glasses and the silk cord by which they were suspended round his neck, he began graciously—

"Take a seat, Thorston, take a seat, please. You see the matter stands somewhat in this fashion. Walter is a fine fellow, he has an excellent head, but his ideas are apt to resemble a midges' dance—they are rather confused. I measured his capacities, as a man of experience and some intellect can measure the capacities of a child constantly under his observation, and I had formed certain plans for him which I believe would have rendered his future one of ease and usefulness.

"As he grows up he thinks that he can form better plans for himself, and accordingly does so. As a father, I might have insisted upon obedience to my wishes; as a man of experience, I say, 'Very well, since you are resolved upon your own course, take it, but absolve me from all blame if you fail.'"

The Laird paused as if for some sign of approbation of his wisdom and forbearance. But Walter could not speak, and Dan was silent, thinking what a gift of language the Laird had, and wondering when he would come to the subject in hand.

"I must own that I am disappointed," Dalmahoy went on; "I think he could have done better than he can do in the Church; I think he could have done better than marry your daughter."

Dan got up.

"Now, now! be patient, if you please," exclaimed the Laird, closing his eyes, averting his face, and motioning grandly with the glasses for his auditor to remain seated.

Thorston would not sit again, but he held his tongue, and the oracle proceeded—

"I did not intend the slightest disrespect to your daughter. I admire Christina extremely, and if I had been a younger man I have no doubt the feeling would have been still warmer. But you are aware that the match is, in some respects, unequal—at least, I fear there are some old-fashioned people who will so regard it. Pardon me for saying this; I only desire to place the whole matter plainly before you, in order that there may be no reflections upon me hereafter."

"I'm no asking a favour for Teenie," said the skipper gruffly, and preparing to go; for as he understood the harangue, it meant a refusal of the young folks' wishes. So Walter thought too.

"No favour at all, Thorston; understand me clearly; I am only referring to what will be said by others. For myself, I admire her; I admire your upright, straightforward character, and you know my principles. To me 'an honest man is the noblest work of God,' and the observation applies equally to women. Therefore——"

He paused, closing his eyes, and enjoying in imagination the round of applause which that sentence would have evoked at the annual meeting of the agricultural society. He mentally noted it, to use on the first public opportunity.

"Therefore I give my free and willing consent to my son Walter to marry Christina, and I shall take an early occasion to salute my daughter-in-law."

Walter could scarcely believe his ears, and his throat was so full of happiness that he could not speak immediately. He hastily crossed the room and seized his father's hand, saying huskily—

"Thank you."

"I did not expect this," muttered Dan, as if he were inclined to be sorry; "how's ever, I'm glad that it is so, since the lass wants it."

"You are surprised," said Dalmahoy, gratified by the impression he had made, "but you will observe that in consenting to this marriage I am only carrying out the principles which have guided my public life. It is long since I first raised my voice against class distinctions; and I am proud to find that the growing power and intelligence of the working classes are compelling universal acceptance of my doctrines. I am proud to think, sir, that we are approaching the era when intellect alone shall distinguish one man from another." (Another sentence to remember for his first speech.)

"Nae doubt, nae doubt," muttered Dan, neither understanding nor caring about the Laird's principles; "I'll say good day now."

"Before you go, Thorston, you understand, I hope, that Walter has nothing but his profession to depend upon at present; and even when my time comes he will have little more to expect than the house and a bit of land. I have a large family; we have no entail; and I mean to make my children equal as far as possible in what is left to them."

"Yea could not do better, sir; that's fair. Teenie will have some siller of her own. At any rate, she'll no bring her man an Inverness tocher."

Dan grinned at his little joke. According to one version of the saying, a man is supposed to get an Inverness tocher when he receives with his wife a mother-in-law, a sister-in-law, and a piano to keep.

The business being thus settled to everybody's satisfaction, as it seemed, and very much to the surprise of one of the persons interested, Thorston made his way home, taking a good look at the house and grounds as he passed out, although he had often seen both before. He was glad and sorry; he was eager to get home with his news, and yet inclined to loiter. He felt very queer; could not make it out; maybe it was some ailment coming on him. He could not tell, for he had never known sickness in his own person. He wished young Dalmahoy had been at Jericho, or that Teenie had been still a wee bairn, scampering about in short coats and bare legs.

Walter remained, and tried again to express his very warm gratitude to the Laird for thus readily removing the only obstacle to his perfect happiness.

"I hope you'll find it perfect, Wattie," said the father smiling; "you'll be the first man who ever did. Prove your gratitude to me ten years hence, by telling me that you do not blame me for what I have done now."

"I'll do that!" cried the lover eagerly.

"Aye, be sure of this—I thought it was for your good to say yes, or I would have said no, just as readily. How the devil you are to get on with Dan Thorston as your father-in-law I can't see, unless you manage to bribe him to emigrate to the Cannibal Islands or the North Pole. A good idea! Start an expedition to discover the North-west Passage, and make him captain. He'll never come back. The captain never does."

Walter laughed.

"There will be no need for that; everybody likes Dan, and he's a fine honest fellow, as you yourself said."

"Yes, but I wasn't going to be his son-in-law. Honesty is admirable—in the abstract—but culture and manners are much more comfortable companions on a long journey."

"I am content—more than content. I am very happy."

"I dare say; we all think that in the first heat of life. Oh, I know what the glamour of Love's young dream is, and upon my soul I don't think I would have opposed your wishes very savagely, even if there had not been good reasons known to myself for yielding to them. But, my lad, if you want to succeed in life, doubt everything and everybody except yourself. Remember that, and success is sure."

"You say that," said Walter—awkwardly, for he could not preach to his father—"and yet, has your life been all that you would have desired it to be?"

The Laird winced; his brow contracted, and he looked hard at the window. His memory flashed over the past, and he saw many hopes baffled, many aspirations thwarted, many fine calculations upset, and many desires never gratified.

"No," he said, blowing his nose to conceal something like a sigh, for the retrospect was not a pleasant one—as whose is? He saw so much that might have been accomplished if only this or that had happened, and so much that had been accomplished which might have been left alone—"No; my life has been a failure. But I did not start with the experience which I offer to you."

"Don't you think, sir, that every man must work out his own experience?"

"It may be so, but there is so much wisdom in the experience of our fathers, that we would be happier if we would only be content to walk in their old-fashioned ways instead of striving after fantastic novelties in business, politics, and art. I have heard Whately say that the proverb 'Experience teaches fools' is a lie, for he is a wise man who profits by his own experience, a wiser still who profits by the experience of others; but a fool profits neither by his own nor others' experience. We shall see by-and-by in which category you stand."

"I hope it may not be the last."

"But it is the most probable place for you. Now go and amuse our friends until I join you. They are quite interesting. You will find them smiling on one side the face, and grinning in bitterness and spite on the other. This Methven property seems to have set the whole county by the ears."

Walter being unspeakably happy, and utterly indifferent to the Methven property, could afford to make a smiling effort to mollify the rancour of his cousins, uncles, and aunts, although he would have much preferred walking off to Teenie at once.

The Laird retired to his private room, a small corner apartment, where he was rarely interrupted. Two sides of the chamber were covered with books, many of them Parliamentary, now seldom disturbed.

He sat down in his easy chair in front of his writing-table, and took out the letter which had occupied so much of his attention during the early part of his interview with Dan Thorston and Walter. He read it again, as if to reassure himself as to the nature of the contents.

GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

"SIR,—We have made the necessary investigation into the affairs of the late George Methven, some time of Rowanden and Kingshaven, and latterly of Manchester. The result of that investigation is as follows:—

"The said George Methven being a natural son, and dying without a will, the whole of his estate passes to the Crown; but the nearest of kin on the mother's side may petition Her Majesty, through the Queen's and Lord Treasurer's Remembrancer of Exchequer, for a gift of the estate. As a rule this prayer is granted, subject to certain fees.

"We may mention that the members of the father's family are, such a case as the present, devoid of right or power to make a claim, the members of the mother's family only being considered.

"So far as we have been able to discover, the nearest existing relative to the late George Methven is one Christina Thorston, daughter of Daniel Thorston, fisherman, now or recently residing at Rowanden. Daniel Thorston espoused a sister of George Methven's mother, and Christina Thorston is therefore full cousin of the deceased, and, according to our present belief, his direct heir. We believe that by prompt and decisive action she might obtain the whole or greater part of the estate, subject to the usual fees.

"We shall be happy to attend to any further instructions with which you may favour us, and meanwhile

"We are, Sir,

"Your most humble and obedient Servants,

"PATTERSON AND GREIG, W.S."

"It is the most remarkable event in my experience," said the Laird to himself, a glow of satisfaction suffusing his countenance. "To think of that youth Wattie stumbling blindfold into a million, and I, who have assiduously courted fortune all my life, never knew what it was to be out of difficulty. But I never had the same chance; and Wattie won't forget his poor father when he is rich."

He wrote an answer to the lawyer's letter, and then locked it up in his strong-box.

"We must keep this quiet until our arrangements are completed; it would be a shame to disturb the contented minds of the girl and her father until I am quite sure of her claim. Now I can go and condole with our friends, and advise them not to be fools—if they can help it."

So, having arranged his plans—of which Walter was to know nothing either, for he was such a droll that he would reveal everything at once to Thorston—the Laird proceeded to join the ladies and gentlemen in the drawing-room, who were busy disputing their respective titles to the wealth of the dead man whom, living, they had snubbed and shunned.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

"GOING TO BE MARRIED."

NEXT morning, Dan was out on the headland before daybreak. It was a calm morning, only a ripple upon the water, whilst the bay was like a sheet of glass. There was just a mysterious breathing of the atmosphere which mingled with the soft pulsations of the sea. The slightest sound was heard with singular distinctness. He saw the sun creep slowly up the horizon, darting many golden bars athwart the quivering breast of the sea.

The stillness was pathetic; presently it was broken by the mellow chant of some fishermen singing in the distance, and looking round the point he saw the fishing fleet, in a straggling line, with brown sails flapping lazily in the gentle breeze, stealing slowly towards the haven. Then came the indistinct cur-rr-eck of grouse, the screech of the heron on the rocks, the croak of gulls floating over the water, and the sharp twitter of lapwings as they rose in flight. The soft spiritual light of the morning, the waters flashing with all the colours of the rainbow, and the fishers' song combined to soothe Dan into a more contented mood than he had known since yesterday.

If the fishers of Rowanden had watched the skipper this mornigg, not one of them would have expected luck to the nets; for his hand was often up at his brow, as he peered into space—farther than usual, for he was trying to see the future when there would be a solitary old man and a desolate cottage on the Norlan'. He stalked about with uncertain, dissatisfied steps. Then he would halt a long while in one place, calling himself hard names for not being proud and pleased as Teenie was when he told her of his expedition, and the result.

She clapped her hands, and cried, "That's fine!" And old Ailie chimed in with "It's grand news; I aye said Teenie was born to be a lady." But neither thought of asking what he had to say.

He became dour, and would not speak.

Teenie saw this, and bade Ailie "whisht," subduing her own expressions of pleasure at the same time. After supper—Dan's appetite was still excellent—she made him a big tumblerful of steaming toddy, and he felt better. She got out the cards; they played, he won, and felt better still. The dark grim face of the man, the bright fair face of the girl bent over the table, and the feeble light of the oil-lamp flickered upon them, showing an expression of eagerness on the one, and simple joy on the other.

Ailie sat in the corner knitting, and retailing all the gossip she had picked up in the course of her morning's excursion. Buckie Ker's boat got adrift, and was found "dug a' to bits" on the rocks; Shauchlin (Shuffling) Sandy's wife was laid up with a very bad fever; Hirpling Jamie had quarrelled with the fish-dealer about the number of crans of herring they had got in the last "shot;" Louping Bob had got into trouble with the water-bailies, and his wife had been drinking "sare;" and so on, giving to each person mentioned the distinguishing to-name or nick-name, which was generally suggestive of some physical characteristic or ability. All this amused the skipper whilst his attention was fixed on the game.

Then Teenie sang to him her favourite ballad, the "Lass of Lochryan," and after, "Willie's drowned in Gamery." Her sweet voice made the plaintive story of the weary wanderings across the sea of fair Annie of Lochryan a real event to Dan, and he spoke of the heroine's fate as if he had known and loved her. The gloomy legend of the two lovers drowned in Gamery filled him with anger at the hard-hearted parent whose curse had been the cause of the trouble.

Dan went to bed happy; Teenie went to bed full of confused thoughts and visions. She was changed somehow, and all the world was changed. She was not the same Teenie who had been feeding the doos, threatening the cat, and studying the Book of Fate, half in fun and half in earnest, early that day. She was going to be married! It was all settled, and she was thrilling with the strange exaltation, pleasure, and wonder which a girl experiences in the first few hours after her lover has spoken, and she has pledged herself to him. She could not possibly sleep this night, with that minister with the invisible head, the misty crowd of people, the beautiful bride's cake—which she had seen a few days ago in the confectioner's window at Kingshaven—the old shoes, and the yellow carriage with the two white horses from the King's Arms, all dancing wild reels at the foot of the bed. There she was, in the carriage now, Walter beside her—the horses going off at a gallop down the brae, driving into the great mystery of the future.

She closes her eyes, covers her head with the clothes, and tries to shut it all out. But that is worse than ever. She gets up, goes to the window, and looks out. The sky is pale, and mottled with slow-moving clouds; the sea is rolling inward from the darkness, and breaking with long measured sweeps upon the rocks; the lights of the White Tower, high up in the air, are glinting their warning across the waters; below are the black spots which she knows to be the fishing-boats, and Rowanden looks like a black irregular mass of rocks pressing back from the shore. She felt calmer, looking out at these things, listening to the sea, and the eerie sough of the wind.

Stepping back from the window, she moved a chair, and presently there was a tap on the wooden partition which separated her bed from Ailie's in the next room. The sharp voice of the old woman cried—

"Goodness be here! lassie, ha'e you got the dwams, or what, that you're no bedded? There'll be nae word o' this in the morning" (meaning that she would be sorry for missing her rest).

That had more effect than anything else in composing Teenie's mind. She crept back to bed, surrendered herself to the exciting visions which she could not control, and by-and-by she slept.

The very happiness of the evening made Dan's waking thoughts the sadder, so he was up and out early. He ought to be proud of the position his lass was to fill; and he was proud in a manner, for all Rowanden would be "in a way" about it, and he would be looked up to more than ever. But he would have been quite contented if things could have gone on in the old way; and he had an uneasy suspicion that things would not be so comfortable either for Teenie or himself in the new way. There was the boat she had so often sailed with him; there were the nets her nimble fingers had so often helped him to mend; there was the hut which she had helped him to build—by carrying the nails for him in her "daidly" (pinafore).

He did not see how he was to get on without her at all. Only she wished it—and that was the one unanswerable argument.

"I'll awa' to Greenland with the next whaler," he muttered, "and just think that she's waiting for me at home here as in the auld times."

A hand touched his arm, and he found Teenie beside him, looking as bright and fresh as if she had known no unrest during the night. She was a part of the morning, with her thick fair hair, her grand blue eyes, and sweet face.

"Weel?" said Dan, delighted by her presence, but not displaying the least sign of pleasure—"You're early afoot."

"You'll no guess what I've been thinking?" she replied, looking at him with such a cunning smile.

"No; what might that be?"

"I'm no to marry Wattie Burnett!"

"What?" and he stared at her to see if she were quite herself.

Lips close, and expression serious; she nodded her head emphatically.

"Toots! you're raving, lassie, or you're trying to make fun of me. You maun marry him."

And Dan exhausted all his arguments to show her how there was no escape from the compact now that it was made. He discovered ever so many reasons, of which he had not thought before, for considering the marriage in every way a fortunate and desirable one. At that she smiled, and said with wonderful resignation—

"Very well, father, since you say I must, I will."

He felt hurt, for he saw that she had been laughing at him all the time; and he was relapsing into dourness, but she placed her hand on his shoulder and said, quite earnestly this time—

"But I would not have him if you said no, father—no, though he was King of England, and no another man for me in the world."

It mollified him to hear her say so, and from that moment Thorston appeared to be the proudest and the most contented man in the world; whatever his secret thoughts or feelings might be, he looked always satisfied. It was a clever trick of hers, if it were only a trick.

Soon after breakfast Walter drove up in a gig, leapt down, and called for Teenie. He took both her hands; the man's eyes were full of the love that was in his heart. Teenie smiled, and for the first time felt shy with him.

"You know that it's all right? The Laird never said a word against our wishes, but was as kind as if I had just done what he wanted."

"Father told us last night—the Laird is very good."

"I wanted to come down myself last night, but I was kept late at the house—I must tell you the fun we had another time—and then I went over to Craighburn."

"To Miss Wishart—'deed and you might have come here instead," cried Teenie, laughing and pretending to be offended.

"I could not help that—it was due to her who has been so good to me. But get on your things; I've brought the gig, and I want you to go with me for a drive."

She was not quite prepared for that; it would be the first time they had driven out together, and it would be like an open declaration to all the country of their new relationship. However, he insisted, and she was not obstinate. So she went to her room to prepare for the journey—an operation simple enough and speedily effected, for it chiefly consisted of removing her apron, and putting on a straw hat and a shawl.

As Dan saw them drive off, he began to feel really proud and contented. Ailie was at his elbow to add her approval.

"Eh, but they're a braw pair, and it's a wonderful match for Teenie—though no so great when a's done, for the Laird hasna muckle to gie them. But they're a braw pair, and I felt in my heart to cast a bauchle after them even now."

Ailie was as blithe about the match as if she herself had been the bride.

Dan went down to the shore to see about the result of the last night's fishing, in which he had considerable interest, having this year taken a larger share than usual in the herring trade.

Walter made the horse go at a grand pace; the earth was too dull for him; he felt that he would have liked to fly. Rocks, trees, and water glanced by them; the keen air bit their cheeks, refreshing and exhilarating them; the clear sky seemed to smile upon them. They crossed the moorland, and the way seemed short for both. He told her about that meeting at Dalnahoy on the previous day; of the discussion about the Methven property; of the ridiculous claims which were advanced to a share in it, and of the petty squabbles that were arising out of it. They laughed mightily at all that—money was such a small thing in the account of happiness to them.

Then he spoke about the coming days when they would be settled at Drumhemount, and the countless occupations they were to have; the earnest work there was for them to do, and the joy they would have in doing it.

To all this Teenie listened, smiling approval, but saying little, because she did not know what to say other than "Yes" to every suggestion he made.

Suddenly, as they were drawing near the foot of the hills, she asked—

"Where are you going?"

"To Craighburn."

There was a little start and a flush on Teenie's cheek, as she hastily put her hand on the reins.

"I don't want to go there—any way, not yet."

He looked at her in surprise.

"But Grace wants to see you, so much, and to speak to you."

"I don't like to go there yet."

She felt awkward, and unable to define to herself, much less to him, the source of her objection.

"Why?"

"I don't know."

"But to please me?"

A pause, during which he began to draw rein.

"Very well, if you want me to go, I'll go."

He gave the horse head again, and they went on, but he was not quite so buoyant as he had been at the beginning of the journey.

END OF CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

A GOSSIP ABOUT SPONGES.

THE substance we familiarly term "sponge" forms part of an organism which, in its life-history, presents not a few exceedingly interesting and instructive phases. What we know as a sponge represents merely part of the entire organism; and the fibrous or horny material, formed to the living sponge a kind of skeleton, which at once gave a firm basis to, and supported, the soft living tissue of the animal. But we are, perhaps, forestalling our subject a little, by thus indicating the relations of the familiar sponge-substance to the living part of this organism. For, regarding the exact nature of this living part of the sponge, much discussion has taken place among naturalists in the past; and even in the present day, there are not wanting those who refuse to assent to the very generally received notion, that sponge is a true animal production.

The ancients and earlier writers, from their mere external resemblance to vegetable productions, classified sponges in the plant kingdom. But a more careful examination of the structure, development, and affinities of the sponges, has warranted the naturalists of modern days in placing them in the animal series, and in assigning to them a position among the lowest group of animals.

It may thus at first sight seem a somewhat strange idea to regard a living sponge as a true animal; and it may be somewhat difficult for the non-technical individual to reconcile the ordinary idea of active animal life, with the rooted, shapeless mass seen in the living sponge.

Very briefly, then, let us try to peer into the inner depths and mysteries of sponge existence. We already know that our domestic sponge formed part of a living being; that, in short, the living part of the sponge manufactured or secreted the horny, fibrous material which forms so important an object of commercial pursuit. And the living portion of the sponge consisted of a whitish glairy-like jelly, which coated the horny material outwardly, and also lined the canals that permeate every part of its internal structure.

This whitish living jelly we know as "sarcode," or "protoplasm;" but concerning its exact nature, or its relations with the mysterious principle we term "life," we know but little; although speculation and theory have not been wanting in the attempt to elucidate these relations. My readers will doubtless be familiar with the "protoplasm" battle in many of its varied phases; but in the present instance we have nothing whatever to do with controversy or argument, and so we simply recognise the "vital" nature of this sarcode, or living jelly, and its capability of itself to constitute a perfect living being, able to carry on all the functions which appertain to the living state. We see it forming the bodies of most of the lower and microscopic animals; and in our sponge it constitutes, as we have seen, the truly living and vital portion of this curious animal form.

Now the living sponge-flesh is in turn made up of a multitude of individual portions, each of which is known as a "sponge-particle;" and hence the apparently uniform living matter is found to be composed of an aggregation of semi-independent particles. The entire organism known as a sponge, therefore, in virtue of this constitution of its living portion, is of a compound nature. The little sponge-particles are, in fact, so many minute individual beings, which, massed together, constitute an organic colony; and upon this living colony devolves the manufacture of the fibrous or horny structure we know as the sponge.

If we obtain a sponge fresh from the chemist's shop, and shake it over a sheet of paper, we may extract therefrom a number of hard grains or particles, which the uninitiated observer would doubtless regard as mere grains of ordinary sand. And we all know the trouble which the coarser sponges give us, when we try to get rid of the "grit," or hard particles, which are commonly imbedded among the horny fibres of the sponge. But if we examine these little mineral particles by aid of the microscope, we shall find them to present certain definite shapes, and to exhibit evidence of being distinct structural parts of the sponge. We may thus distinguish mineral particles which are like three-rayed stars. Others exhibit an appearance like an anchor with double flukes, one set at either end; and others may exist as needles.

We thus notice in our sponge a second kind of skeleton, represented by these mineral particles of flint or lime; and to these little bodies the general name of "sponge-spicules" has been given. These spicules, therefore, form a kind of interlacing network of mineral matter, which, distributed throughout the softer horny skeleton, serves to strengthen and support the skeleton, with the living flesh which invests the whole structure.

An ordinary living sponge is therefore a complicated colony of semi-independent bodies, which secrete a horny fibre with its interlacing mineral particles; and by these latter structures the living matter is thus bound together.

We have still, however, to notice how the life of this curious organism is provided for. Like every other animal, it nourishes and reproduces itself, and the nutrition of the sponge is effected in a singularly interesting manner; for throughout the sponge-colony a constant circulation of water is maintained. All over the outer surface of the sponge, the horny skeleton is perforated with innumerable small apertures known as "pores;" and we can also detect a smaller number of much larger apertures called "oscula;" or sometimes—as in many specimens of fine Turkey sponges—we may find only one large "osculum" in the middle, which thus resembles a cup-like organism.

Now it is highly important to distinguish carefully between the innumerable small pores and the larger oscula, since these two sets of apertures perform very different functions in the life-history of the sponge. If we microscopically examine a fragment of living sponge, we can readily perceive incessant currents of water entering the sponge by the pores, and as incessant streams issuing from the sponge through the oscula. In other words, the pores are just so many inhalent apertures, and the oscula so many exhalent ones. And this "circulation in the sponge," as it is termed, goes on continuously.

The mechanism by means of which this circulation is carried on, forms one of the most curious phases in connection with the sponge's history. Underlying the outer layer of the sponge, and excavated, as it were, in the lining membrane of the canals which lead from the pores, we find little semi-circular chambers. Each chamber is of a half-moon or crescentic shape; and one of these chambers is situated opposite the other in the sides of the canal, so that two of them together make up a circular excavation, cut out in the walls of the narrow passage.

The walls of these chambers are lined by little living "sponge-particles," each of which is furnished with a vibratile or moving lash-like filament, known as a "cilium." And hence the row of "cilia," which borders each chamber, projects into the canal like a delicate fringe of eye-lashes or hairs. And these rows or fringes of cilia are the means whereby the constant circulation of water is maintained throughout the sponge. For, acting like so many brooms or brushes, they at once sweep the water inwards from the outer world, and onwards towards the deeper parts of the sponge. Then the currents of water thus excited and maintained, are gradually sent throughout the organism, and by the same incessant motion of the cilia, are finally swept out by the oscula.

The use or function of this circulation is twofold. Firstly, particles of nutrient matter are swept into the sponge, and are seized upon by the living sponge-particles. The first use is, therefore, to administer to the nutrition of the being; and, secondly, the living substance of the sponge is thereby purified and renewed, this second function being analogous to that of respiration or breathing in the higher animals.

The sponges reproduce themselves by "spores," or "gemmules"—little oval bodies which are matured in the deeper portions of the sponge, and which in the spring season are liberated from the parent-body, and soon develop into true sponges. Then, also, we have the "sponge-eggs," which pass through the stages of development common to all eggs, and finally give origin to little free-swimming germs, provided with cilia; and these, after leading a roving life for a time, settle down, root, and grow up into mature stay-at-home sponges.

Although we have been describing the structure of one of our ordinary sponges, yet it would not be correct to conclude without saying a word or two regarding other varieties. I allude to lime and flint sponges.

These latter sponges, although exceedingly numerous in past ages of this earth's history, and well known as "fossils" to the geologist, are few in number, and are but sparsely represented in the seas and oceans of to-day. They are mostly found in deep water; and recent deep-sea dredging expeditions have brought several new and very interesting species to light. These lime and flint sponges have no horny material whatever in their composition; and we may thus be grateful, in a domestic sense, that the true horny sponges attain their maximum development in our own day. Several of the flint sponges exhibit exquisite shapes, the "Venus' Flower Basket" (Euplectella), in particular, possessing a close resemblance to an exquisitely modelled and reticulated flower-vase, and being frequently seen as an elegant ornament in our drawing-rooms.

The sponges of commerce inhabit water of moderate depths. We know of many familiar British species, and the common Spongilla, or fresh-water sponge, a green organism found in all our ponds and canals, presents a very familiar and excellent subject for the study of the sponges. The only process to which the living sponge is subjected, is the washing away of the living "sarcod," and the skeleton is left for use.

ANDREW WILSON.

THE STORY OF A MINIATURE, AS TOLD BY A PIECE OF GOLDSMITH'S WORK.
BY THOMAS ARCHER.

'SHE LAY THERE IN THE GREAT LEATHERN CHAIR.'

IN FIVE CHAPTERS — CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

It was many minutes before old Anton Dormeur could clear his mental vision or recover his senses sufficiently to determine that the girl who stood beside him touching his shoulder was real flesh and blood; but at last, with a strong effort, he roused himself to listen; and only half comprehending her hurried story, rose from the chair into which he had fallen.

"And you, little one, who are you? what are you?" he asked presently, without taking his eyes from her face. "Your name is Sara? it must be—shall be," he exclaimed almost passionately.

"It is," said the girl—"Sara Rondeau."

"Rondeau, Rondeau, where have I heard that?"

"It is my aunt—she is a weaver; we work for you, monsieur. See you not that this Monsieur Bashley, having a spite against us, and against monsieur your grandson—"

"Who and what are you?" again said the old man; "you talk as one of us—speaking of monsieur my grandson. Has he seen you? do you know him? Your mother never saw him; she was—Mon Dieu! what am I saying?" he added wildly.

"Pray, pray delay not!" said the girl, clasping her hands.

"No, no, I come—first to the watch-house, and then to your house, did you say?" And with a great effort, but almost without taking his eyes from the child's face, Dormeur strode to a closet beside the window, and took down a sword, which he drew quickly from the scabbard.

Sara feared him, and retreated to the door.

"What!" he said, "dost think I'd harm thee, little one? Come, take my hand. Tell me, how did you get in?"

"I found the street-door unfastened, and knocked, but could make no one hear; then I came in and listened, and there was a light up here, and so I came and knocked, not knowing what to do; but there is some one there now—hark."

"Tis the servants come back, child," said Anton, but he trod softly for all that, and, turning about, traversed noiselessly the long winding passage that led towards the back of the house.

At the end of that passage the well-staircase sent a cold grey gleam from the skylight in the roof, but down at the basement, where the lobby opened in the yard, there was a stronger light—the light of a lantern, by which a man stood impatiently examining a key, and picking it with a penknife, as though it had been clogged.

"I wanted to unlock that closet too," he muttered, "for I would swear he keeps gold there, but the cart will be here directly. It's the devil's luck that he should be out, and the women too, as I verily believe, for not a soul is stirring in the kitchen. Fancy leaving the house alone! I was a fool not to take the chance before."

The sound of wheels aroused him, and Bashley—for it was he—gave a half-frightened glance behind him, for he had suddenly become conscious that he was talking to himself. He looked upwards also, though by some strange instinct; and there, leaning over the wooden balustrade of the "well," their faces lighted in the gleam of his lantern, were Anton Dormeur and Sara Rondeau, looking down upon him.

He made a dash at the door leading to the yard, then suddenly turned and, with a desperate oath, drew a pistol and fired it from the stairs; but his aim was uncertain, and the ball went straight upward crashing through the skylight. Another moment, and a door clanged open, a torrent of air rushed up the well, and amidst shouts and cries, and the sound of falling glass, Bashley was smitten down, and handcuffed between two officers, who had been posted in the street, according to the instructions they had received from Peter Dobree. The old weaver had not counted on such a success, but he had actually driven Antoine home in the very cart which was to have carried away the plunder, after having conveyed the young man to some place of imprisonment, where he might have died before aid could reach him.

The first thing that Antoine saw clearly, when they had all got into the house again, was his grandfather carrying a woman in his arms. The old man had darted down the stairs at the moment Bashley fired his pistol; but Sara had fainted. Poor child, she had been long without food, and her strength gave way amidst that awful scene.

Arrived at the door of the room, the second thing he saw was that the woman was the very girl whom he had gone out to seek. As she lay there in the great leathern chair, with a wan face and closed eyes, a keen anguish wrung the lad's heart—anguish not unmingled with utter amazement, for there, bending over her and kissing her hands, which he chafed gently with his own, was the proud old man, who had so rarely displayed emotion.

Antoine covered his face with his hands, for his head began to reel. So Peter Dobree found him standing outside the half-open door, when he came panting up.

"Why, what's the matter, boy? you're not wounded surely—say?" asked the old foreman anxiously.

Antoine pointed to the scene within the room, and Peter stooped down and peered in—well he might. Anton Dormeur was on his knees beside the child, moistening her lips with brandy from a teaspoon (it was a spoon that had fallen from her dress, but he knew nothing of that, for he found it on the floor without thinking how it came there). He spoke encouraging words to her, talked to her as men talk to babies; touched her forehead with his fingers, and took up one of her long fair tresses to press it to his lips.

Presently she sighed heavily, and opened her great eyes upon him, then flushed, drew herself further back in the chair, and began to cry.

"Pierre—Pierre Dobree!" shouted the old man, striding to the door, "come here; where are you?"

"Here am I," said Peter, suddenly confronting him, and drawing Antoine into the room, all grimed and torn, and smirched with mud, as he was.

"What is the meaning of that?" said old Dormeur, glaring into Peter's eyes, and laying a grip upon his shoulder that must have left a bruise there. .

"The meaning of that is," said Peter steadily, and looking back with an eye as fierce as his master's—"the meaning of that is, that when nearly nineteen years ago I stood under St. Guillotine and vowed a vow, I meant to keep it. That when Sara Dufarge—once Sara Dormeur—my loved and lovely mistress, joined her husband—not by the guillotine, but in a little country lodging at Nogent—she left her child—that child—to the nurse who had been faithful to her—to my own good sister Nancy, who, bringing her to England when she and her husband came to escape the troubles of the Hundred Days in La Vendée, where they lived, found here another sister, the widow Rondeau—childless—to whom came as a legacy that same little orphaned one who lies now in her grandsire's chair."

Anton Dormeur stood and glared for a moment at the undaunted little old man, who had thus kept a secret for eighteen years, though he had been here in his service; but even in his bitter anger there came to him the recollection of the stern relentless temper with which he had blotted out his daughter's name from the family record; and, with a drooping head and tears that fell fast on his furrowed cheeks, he went again and knelt beside the girl, who now sat with crimsoned face and wondering eyes.

"Peter Dobrce," he said presently, "go or send for your sister Rondeau.—Antoine, dear lad, go you into the kitchen and see if any one has come in; for we will have supper through all, and Sara, Sara, my child, my little one, you must never leave me more."

"What! and are you, monsieur, truly my grandfather, and Monsieur Antoine truly your grandson? Then he is—no, not my brother; what then?—But I may kiss him?" said the wondering girl, as she stood the centre of a talking group, apart from which stood the lad, who looked at her with wistful eyes.

They broke into a laugh, at which she turned red as a rose, and with a sudden gesture, which shot a pain to the old man's heart, for it was that of her mother once again, turned away.

"Yes, but you may kiss him," said Anton gently, and leading her to where Antoine stood—"a cousin's kiss, you know—have you learned what that is?"

"No, I never had a cousin—at least, Antoine never kissed me," she said simply, and held up her sweet face to the young man, who bent and touched it with his lips.

I do not think I need say any more; we French love to talk—but there—you have found that out long ago.

UNDERGROUND EXPLORATIONS.

BY J. E. TAYLOR, F.G.S.

FOR centuries, anything relating to gold and silver, diamonds and rubies, emeralds and topazes, has always been able to catch the public eye at once. It would seem as if "coal" were rapidly taking its place among this aristocracy of names! However dull the newspapers are (and we cannot complain much on that score lately), the briefest paragraph relating to coals—whether as regards their abundance or their dearth, their higher price or their lowered, new strikes among colliers, or differences between them and their employers—is sure to command attention.

As is usual with English people, who always bear their troubles bravely, we try to make bad jokes about the high price of coals, and speak of them as no longer figurative, but veritable "black diamonds." The attempt, however, is a very poor one, and is only praiseworthy on account of its bravely hiding the wincing, which heads of families cannot help feeling whenever any reference is made to coal.

I do not wish to rub against these old sores—rather, I would endeavour to heal them. My intention is to introduce my readers to an underground experiment which is going on in a part of England entirely removed from any coal-field area. The success or failure of the undertaking will be of great scientific and economical importance to England.

Readers of newspapers may have incidentally heard of it as the "Sub-Wealden Exploration"—such being the modest name under which one of the most important scientific experiments ever conducted in this country has been called by its originators. But such paragraphs give no idea whatever of the intrinsic importance that is attached to the "Boring." It can hardly be termed a "search after coal," and yet the spirit of enterprise which has led to the undertaking, has been more or less roused by the probability that coal may be found. Just now there is somewhat of a rage about finding new coal-fields. Hardly a week passes but some mining engineer, as yet unknown to fame, hazards his hitherto unheard-of reputation that an extension of a neighbouring coal-field may be met with under a certain area where it has not before been thought to exist. Such a man, if he obtains nothing else, gets advertised gratis !

There is no class more interested in this general search for coal than that usually called the working class. I never remember so much excitement about the possibility of new coal-fields occurring under strata of much more recent date, where it was never thought they would be found, than is just now prevailing even in the scientific world. There is no doubt that a good deal more is being said about coal being workably available under new areas than will be ever realised. Unfortunately, as was only too fatally indicated in the mania which led to the notorious railway panic, there are always adventurers on the look-out for something to turn up, who are only too glad to turn a little excitement like this to their own advantage, much to the detriment of genuine investigations and investigators. Still the country generally will profit by this search after coal, and the science of geology especially will be a gainer by it. Indeed, it is to a fuller acquaintance with physical geology that some of these investigations are due. The researches of one of our most philosophical geologists, Mr. Godwin-Austin, continued over many years, have at length led to practical results. Should the views now propounded concerning the existence of additional coal-fields prove true, they will add untold millions to the wealth of this country, besides furnishing additional markets for human labour and enterprise.

West Lancashire and Sussex—two areas widely apart from each other—figure most prominently as the places where mining experiments are to be carried on. The former is covered up by a series of deposits formed long after the elaboration of the Carboniferous or coal-bearing strata. I need not refer to the fact, now established beyond contradiction, that coal is nothing more or less than mineralised vegetation, buried untold ages ago. Equally is it a fact that the rocks in which the valued coal-seams are enclosed—as indeed all sedimentary rocks, of whatever geological age—are the accumulations of sands and muds, chiefly along ancient sea-floors. The later rocks which overlie the coal-seams of West Lancashire (supposing they are there) belong to two divisions, called the Permian and New Red Sandstone. Each of these has its own suite of fossils of peculiar animals and plants, which may be regarded as the creation of that period, just as we look upon the existing animal and vegetable kingdoms as belonging to the Human epoch. These formations abound in dull red-coloured rocks, and, as a rule, fossils are never very abundant in such strata, from some cause or another. Their combined thickness, if one group were piled above another, would not be less than four or five thousand feet. It is not often, however, that the rocks do thus come together. And, even when they have overlain each other, there are certain disturbances which have shattered and cracked the solid strata right through, and which have uplifted one part of this broken-up area more than two thousand feet above the other. Then have followed other agencies, chiefly the wear-and-tear of the solid land by atmospherical agencies, whereby this lifted-up tract has been gradually eaten away and planed down to the common level. Such dislocations are very common in the older formations, and there is not a single coal-field in this country that is not more or less affected by them, insomuch that their presence greatly influences the mode of working the coal.

It is evident that, in those areas where the dislocations, or "faults," as they are termed, have brought up the lower rocks nearer to the surface, coal may be worked for an available depth ; whereas, had it not been for their having been thus brought up, the greater depth at which they would then have occurred would have placed it completely beyond the power of engineering science to have mined for coal. Professor Hull has placed four thousand feet as the greatest depth which it is possible to work for coal, on account of the great heat from the interior of the earth making labour unbearable, as well as from the increased mechanical cost of working below that depth.

Such areas of denudation are believed to exist in West Lancashire, and it is thought by many authorities that coal may be found and profitably wrought underneath them, in localities where it has hitherto been thought that coal (if present) was too deep down to be profitably available.

The search for coal has been commenced in several other districts, as in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, where coal has actually been reached at some distance from what was before regarded as the extreme boundary of the South Staffordshire coal-field. In Nottinghamshire, at Shireoaks, some splendid collieries are now established, obtaining coal by working it beneath the Permian, or Magnesian Limestone rocks, where, a few years ago, it would have been declared impossible to have reached it so as to work it at a profit. Owing to these collieries being situated so far midland, they possess advantages over those to the north and west, in reaching London markets.

In the neighbourhood of Leicester, boring experiments have been conducted with a view to finding coal beneath, and there is good reason to suppose these may ultimately prove successful.

In this way existing coal-fields are extending their borders, and therefore promising such additional supplies that we may extend the probable duration for a few centuries more. And one or two new coal-fields are turning up, to still further indicate that the commercial importance of Great Britain will not suffer, at any rate for a considerable period, for want of fuel.

Still, all the localities I have as yet mentioned lie more or less within the area we are in the habit of regarding as essentially coal-producing, and therefore it does not provoke much surprise that the boundaries of already-worked coal-fields should be enlarged, as our geological information becomes more accurate and extended. The most surprising idea is that, far away to the south-east and even the east of England, it should be deemed possible to work for coal beneath the chalk and other strata. Should these experiments eventually prove successful, the face of England will be completely changed. Brighton, the favourite watering-place of Britain, will be turned into a coal-port. The "Downs" may be pierced for coal, as well as grazed for famous mutton; and agriculture, in the quietest nooks and corners of Sussex, will have to give way to as busy centres of industry as those which mar the fair face of England in the midland and northern counties.

Not long ago, I had the opportunity of visiting the locality in Sussex where the "Sub-Wealden Exploration" is going on. St. Leonards was reached by rail, and I proceeded thence, by way of the famous town of Battle, to Netherfield. For miles after leaving Hastings, the road runs over hill and dale in nearly a straight line, thus indicating its possible Roman origin. The Norman invaders must have proceeded by this very road. Reaching Battle, we may notice how the physical character of the scenery suddenly changes close to the town, and geologists tell us that this is due to an enormous "fault" or dislocation of the solid rocks beneath, which has brought up the lower beds to the surface. It is certain that this has operated upon English history, for it was chiefly by taking advantage of the position thus brought about that the conqueror defeated the Saxons under Harold, and established a Norman dynasty in England. As one passes along these straight roads, with their high hedge-banks, one cannot but think of that important event which occurred hereabouts eight centuries ago, and wonder what the England of the nineteenth century would have been, had the Norman invasion never taken place! The many bright flowers of an English summer are competing for the mastery of the luxuriant hedge-banks. Gnarled old oaks, chiefly dwarfed by the sea breezes, line the road-side, and occupy the same places they may have held when the Norman troops marched past. But one's eyes catch glimpses of a period infinitely older than that of the Normans, for the flag-stones which pave the sides of the road are each distinctly impressed with ripple-marks! They come from the formation known as the "Hastings Sands," one of the upper beds of the great Wealden deposit which underlies the whole of this part of Sussex. The Wealden was a formation elaborated at the mouth of an enormous river as a delta, where the materials brought down accumulated until they reached a thickness of two thousand feet. Since then, these sedimentary beds have been converted into rock, but, as in the case of these ripple-marked sandstone flags, they still retain many traces of the physical and vital conditions that were in force at that distant epoch. In these deposits you obtain the remains of the great fossil reptiles, Iguanodon, Megalosaurus, etc., huge monsters thirty feet or more in length. You get fossil relics of palm-trees and tree-ferns that then clothed the dry land, and, as we approach Netherfield, we shall come to limestone beds composed entirely of the remains of fresh-water shells. A wonderful country this is, and one cannot wonder it should be so fertile, seeing that its subsoils are the remains of an old river delta, just as the fertile land of Egypt owes its riches to a similar physical cause.

We pass through the quiet old town of Battle, which seems as if the onward tide of progress had left it high and dry. There is only a short time to walk through the Abbey grounds, and recall the historical incidents associated with this ever-memorable spot to Englishmen. For we are desirous of reaching the Boring. From Battle, past Norman-hurst, and other villages whose termination of hurst shows that they were founded in an ancient forest, the scenery is most magnificent. The country is one grand undulating, forest-clad area, and as such has very little altered its character since the days of the Saxons. Indeed, one cannot doubt that the surprised and affrighted remnants of Harold's army must have sought shelter amid these very coverts, from the dreaded pursuit of their Norman foes! In our rapidly changed country, it is quite refreshing to come across spots so rich in incident, and so thoroughly unchanged since those incidents took place. At length we come to a denser part of the wood, away from the main road, and find our way down a tolerably steep declivity, covered with brushwood and loose fragments of limestone. The brook, which is still cutting its way through these beds, may be heard and seen below; and there you may get a good section of the beds, and as many of such fossil fresh-water shells as I have just referred to, as you like. Indeed, these limestone layers are literally composed of nothing else. But just before you have reached the stream, a little wooden shanty and the three wooden legs of a crane will have met your eyes. A portable engine is puffing out balls of steam and smoke, and the otherwise unbroken silence of this old English forest scene is thus disturbed. It would not be difficult for you to imagine you were in Australia, and that this was some exploring party in search of gold! Such was my first impression. But the "exploration" going on in this quiet and retired nook is not searching for gold (although that may ultimately come of the labour here expended). Unpretending as it appears it is really a most important scientific experiment. Geologists are boring if haply they may meet with a chain of mountains below, buried deep under other deposits. And the probability that these buried mountains may be composed of Carboniferous rocks, in which coal-seams are included, has given to the experiment an importance it would not otherwise have obtained. In Norfolk and Suffolk, there is reason to believe the same phenomenon lies buried below; and I will now proceed to lay before my readers the reasons which have influenced scientific men to commence this experiment.

The subject is one in which there is considerable difficulty to those who are not well up in geology. You are required to be acquainted with the succession and distribution of rock-masses, and ought to know a good deal about the physical geography of the ancient seas along whose bottoms the rocks were originally deposited as sediments. In addition to these matters, you cannot well be ignorant of the various volcanic and other disturbances which subsequently took place, or of the forces which uplifted the marine sediments to become dry land. This catalogue of requisite knowledge may deter many an inquirer, but let it be understood that I am only mentioning the vast and various kinds of information required to make an expert—that, in fact, has been mastered, before this idea of a buried mountain-chain could be arrived at. For my own part, I do not think it is impossible to bring this important subject before a non-scientific public, not only in a readable, but even in an attractive form.

Among the many wonders which geology has brought to our notice, or the mental reforms its discoveries have necessitated, none is more striking than the fact that our earth was in existence, before the appearance of man, for untold ages. During these enormous lapses of time, certain physical operations were going on. Sedimentary material was deposited along ocean-floors to form rocks, accumulations of ancient vegetation were covered up with similar deposits, and quietly stored away as coal. Creation after creation of animals and plants passed away, and their remains were included in the materials then forming the rocky crust of the earth, where they are now found as fossils. The dry land of every geological period has been mapped with mountain-chains, plains, lakes, and rivers, as the dry land now is. For ages, the mountain-chains were exposed to similar atmospherical wear-and-tear, the materials thus slowly stripped off being carried away by rivers and streams to the sea, to form deposits of a later date. There is no reason whatever to suppose that this wear-and-tear was one whit more rapid than it now is; but it extended over such long periods of time that, before man's introduction, sedimentary or stratified rocks had been formed in this way, no less than nineteen miles in vertical thickness! This wear-and-tear was compensated by volcanic outbursts and continually upheaving forces. In this way the relative conditions of land and water were always maintained, although their areas of distribution were continually changing in the different epochs.

But, it may be asked, what have these elementary geological observations to do with the search for coal in Sussex or Suffolk? A little further patience will show. From what I have just said, it will be seen that the physical geography of any one of the past geological periods cannot be guessed at from the present surface arrangements. That is to say, the mountains and plains, the seas and rivers, which chequer the face of our globe in our time, bear little or no reference to those of former periods. Let us suppose the entire area of Great Britain to be sinking very slowly below the sea-level, as we know the extreme northern parts of Europe are doing at the present time, and that this slow subsidence should go on for (say) five millions of years! What would be the result? Why, that as the land sank, the sea would gain on the lowest parts first, and would extend further and further, until, when the depression had reached its utmost depth, the highest hills would be covered. Marine sands and muds would be strewn first over the low-lying parts, or plains, and, as time proceeded, these formations would increase in thickness, until eventually, if their deposition continued, and the formations increased in thickness, the highest hills would be completely buried. If Snowdon or Ben Nevis were to be thus entombed beneath a layer of rock to the depth of a thousand feet, by some mud-sheet that had accumulated over it in this fashion, then, when the sea retired, an extensive plain would be the effect of the last geological operation. Should man be introduced to live on such an extended plain, how little would he dream of the buried mountains that lay beneath his feet!

This may seem a far-fetched sort of illustration, but I am only boldly sketching what every geologist can prove has repeatedly taken place, and the conditions which there is every reason to believe exist beneath Sussex and Suffolk, and even beneath the great metropolis itself. But I must request my readers to still further bear with my analogical reasoning, and to suppose that the ancient rocks composing the buried Snowdon or Ben Nevis were of Carboniferous age. This being the case, it would be evident that if you wanted to find coal beneath the newly formed plain, your object would be to hit upon the place where the mountain-peaks came nearest to the surface. Even that might be a thousand feet or more down, but it is evident that if you went further away you would come over where the original plains lay below at a depth of many thousands of feet; so that, even if the rocks at that depth did contain coal, the great depth would utterly preclude profitable coal-mining. Now, it is a matter of geological deduction that a chain of buried mountains does extend beneath the eastern and south-eastern counties of England. This ancient ridge slopes off gradually in a northerly and southerly direction, so that, further away from a given point, the strata overlying grow thicker. We further know that these old mountains must have been long exposed to atmospherical wear-and-tear, inasmuch that thick masses of strata had in this way been removed. Now the experiment that is going on in Sussex is taking place along the south side of this old ridge, and should the true coal-strata be met with, it is evident that another valuable coal-field will be added to Britain. But whether coal will be found here or not, at any rate geologists will have another point given them to enable them all the better to designate the next most probable place where the Carboniferous rocks occur.

I now proceed to give an outline of the brilliant generalisation which led to the belief that a ridge of ancient rocks stretched across the eastern and south-eastern counties, long before any facts concerning it were known to science. Sixteen years ago, Mr. Godwin-Austin read a paper before the Geological Society of London on the subject, and as this geologist stands in the first rank of those who have studied the physical geography of the ancient seas, and therefore of the distribution of their sedimentary deposits or rocks, his views were listened to with all the respect they deserved. In that paper Mr. Godwin-Austin showed that the coal-fields of Bristol and South Wales on the west, and of Belgium and Northern France on the east, were the two ends or "outcrops" (places where the rocks rise to the surface) of a continuous ridge of Carboniferous or coal-bearing rocks. Both these distantly separated coal-fields have the same "strike" or run. It is evident, therefore, that the Somersetshire and South Welsh coal-fields at one end, and those of Belgium and Northern France at the other, are continuations of an extended ridge of coal-bearing strata. And the consequent deduction is that the continuity between them is broken only so far as surface appearance is concerned; that between these two outcrops in different countries there has been a "bellying down," or depression, which has let down these ancient rocks, and caused deposits of later date to be so accumulated over them as to present the existing apparent disconnections. It is at the bottom of this filled-up hollow that the buried-up ridge is to be found, deposits of much later date filling up the depression.

A few years after Mr. Godwin-Austin's theory was published, it obtained verification in a remarkable manner. A deep well had to be bored at Kentish Town, in London, over where, if the foregoing theory were true, some part of the depressed mountain-ridge was expected to extend. The well-borers passed through the Tertiary strata, as well as through the various subdivisions of the chalk formation, and then, at the depth of about thirteen hundred feet, they came upon some undoubted Primary rocks, of unknown geological age. In fact, they had hit upon a part of the ancient mountain-chain! No fossils were obtained, and this was an unfortunate circumstance, as geologists can tell as easily the age of any strata by the fossils imbedded in them, as a gardener can tell different kinds of trees by the fruits they bear. But, as far as appearance and mineralogical structure went, the best scientific authorities believed that the old rocks thus reached belonged to the geological formation known as the Old Red Sandstone, which poor Hugh Miller has rendered so famous. Now this formation lies below the Carboniferous or true coal-bearing rocks, and, indeed, takes its name on that account. Hence it follows that, below Kentish Town, either the coal-strata had never been deposited, or they had been subsequently stripped off by denudation. The latter is generally believed to be the true state of things. Mr. Joseph Prestwich, late President of the Geological Society of London, had long been of the same opinion as Mr. Austin as regards the extent of the entombed mountain-ridge. Both these geologists gave their full reasons for holding that a ridge was thus buried up, before the Royal Coal Commission, and to the report of that body I refer all of my readers who are desirous of fuller and more technical reasons than the limits of this article will allow me to give.

Not long after the well-boring at Kentish Town had taken place, the Harwich Corporation commenced their water-works, and the supply was obtained from several deep wells that had to be bored. The deepest of these went to about eleven hundred feet, and at this point, at a depth of two hundred feet less than at Kentish Town, the old mountain-ridge was again struck upon! This time, however, certain fossils were obtained, which indicated to geologists for a certainty that this portion of the old ridge was composed of Carboniferous rocks, so that their geological age and position were certainly known. But the particular part of the Carboniferous or coal-bearing rocks thus reached was the lowest—that which immediately rests upon the sloping flanks of the Old Red Sandstone, which we have seen is believed to underlie the metropolis. It is the upper part of the coal-measures most sought for, as it is here that coal usually occurs. Hence it is thought that if the Carboniferous rocks underneath Harwich have a series sloping on them, as they rest on the slope of the metropolitan ridge, by going farther north, say to Norfolk, we may by boring strike the true coal-bearing strata. The great thing to be considered is whether they lie at an available depth.

To prove that the ancient vegetation that became metamorphosed into coal extended over the area of Norfolk and Suffolk, we have only to notice the important fact that much farther to the south, and more on a line with the Sussex beds, near Calais, in France, coal is being profitably worked from a depth of about fifteen hundred feet. The true coal-bearing rocks there lie just beneath the chalk, the Secondary strata being absent, as they are under Harwich and London. There is little doubt that the ancient and buried-up mountain-chain of which I have been speaking, like mountain-chains in general, did not run in a directly straight line. The course it took was more or less curved, so that there is a difficulty in knowing exactly how it runs beneath the beds which cover it. We have some reputable geologists living who, for many excellent reasons, believe that coal will one day be obtained from beneath the chalk of Norfolk and Suffolk, as it is even now being worked beneath the chalk of France and Belgium. Without doubt the time will come when a series of experimental borings will be conducted in various parts of the country, where scientific men shall direct. That these will prove of great commercial importance is sufficiently proved by the history of the "Sub-Walden Exploration" in Sussex. Even if coal be not found at the end of that experiment, the boring will not have been in vain. Within one hundred and fifty feet of the surface, most valuable beds of gypsum were passed through, all of which are capable of being wrought at a profit. The existence of these valuable beds was unknown until this boring brought them to light. The latest news we have from this spot is that the boring tools had penetrated to the depth of nearly four hundred feet, and had passed into the Kimmeridge clay, one of the subdivisions of the Oolitic rocks. It was laid down theoretically by the originators of the exploration that the old ridge of Primary rocks, of which I have been speaking, might be reached at Netherfield at a minimum depth of a thousand feet, and that they could not lie (if present) at a greater depth than seventeen hundred feet.

I have said enough, however, to show how modern science can seize isolated and seemingly disconnected facts, and, by properly connecting them, arrive at the most nationally important generalisations. Should the reasoning hold good, and the experiments I have mentioned end in the discovery of new coal-fields, we shall have another illustration of the genuine seership of science.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE NINTH.

AT CRAIGBURN.

THEY drove into a bosky glen, the hills rising upward on either side, purple with heather, so that Teenie felt as if she were in the hollow between two great waves at sea. They crossed a little grey stone bridge with low parapets, beneath which a burn, that came glancing and waving like a silver ribbon down from the hills, ran singing a merry song; they entered at a large wooden gate, and drove up to a white house which was hidden from the roadway by trees.

Grace was on the lawn, a broad-brimmed white-and-black ("pepper-and-salt," boys called it) straw hat on her head, with long black ribbons hanging loose. As soon as she heard the wheels, she hurried to the entrance to receive her visitors. Walter was already on the doorstep, helping Teenie to descend. She jumped down, and at that minute Grace caught the girl in her arms and kissed her.

Teenie was taken by surprise; she was unaccustomed to such warmth of salutation, and so she shrank back a little, her head drooping shyly.

Curious that this girl who could remain unmoved in the midst of a storm, who had never shrunk from the gaze of man or woman, should suddenly feel awkward and shy in the presence of one who had proved herself a true friend.

"I am glad to see you here, Teenie, and very pleased," said Grace, in a low sweet voice; and Teenie immediately felt ashamed of the attempt she had made on the road to delay the visit.

"I would have been over at the Norlan' myself, if you had not come," Grace went on with simple earnestness, "for I wanted so much to see you, and to wish you a joyful future—as I am sure it will be."

"Thank you," was all Teenie could say, for she still felt strange and awkward.

She had often before met Grace, and had been always happy with her. But then they had met on the shore, amongst the boats and the nets, where Teenie was quite at home; and then they had met before Walter had told her his story. Now the whole world seemed to have changed and become strange to her, and all its people different from what they used to be.

"But come away and get your shawl off, and then we'll send Walter about his business, to smoke or to read, or to do what he likes, and we'll have a nice long chat all to ourselves," said Grace, with her pleasant smile, leading the way into the house.

Teenie looked anxiously at Walter, as if she would ask him not to leave her; but he was busy giving some directions to the ostler, and did not observe her. So there was nothing for her to do but to follow Grace.

There are faces—mere faces—which flash upon disappeared, the very faults of the face became attractions, for features and eyes glowed with intense sympathy.

Figure, small and delicate, but endowed with a spirit which gave almost unnatural activity to her slight frame. The figure would have been perfect but for the right shoulder, which was deformed—slightly, but sufficiently so to be a distinct scar upon her beauty, and to be the subject of the nicknames and jests of children, and foolish or cruel men.

She had suffered terribly when a child, on account

THE GLASS WAS BEFORE HER.

you and electrify you. They strike you in the street, on a country road, in the house, in the theatre, or in a railway carriage: only one glimpse, one bright look, and you are spellbound—ready to follow that face wherever it may lead you, to good or ill. This kind of electrical face accounts for many wild, incongruous, and insane acts of men. Women are sometimes, but comparatively rarely, subject to a similar influence.

Such a face was Grace Wishart's.

A naturally pale complexion, looking paler by contrast with her dark hair; eyes large and deep brown, almost black; features singularly regular, but somewhat pinched, as if by much suffering. A sad face; but when she smiled all sense of sadness of this physical misfortune; she had been often so severely tried, that she had felt and wished to be wicked in order to punish her tormentors. But she had grown up good and gentle; the ready helper of all who suffered; the comforter and adviser of those who staggered under the blows of fortune. Her income, small though it was, enabled her to relieve the pressing wants of poverty; but her own good-nature did far more than money to soothe and relieve troubled hearts.

"Miss Grace" became a name to be loved and revered throughout the country. Wherever sickness showed itself, she was there to help and comfort; wherever sorrow had laid its heavy hand, her voice and presence brought speedy relief.

Wherever her steps passed, she left a trace behind her, bright as a moon's path on a calm sea.

"She's Grace by name, and grace by nature," said Todd the miller, who was not given to sing the praises of womankind generally.

Her father died when she was very young; her mother, a sister of Dalmahoy's, and by many years his senior, was almost a constant invalid, and severely tasked her daughter's time and patience.

But Mrs. Wishart, who had married late in life, and had been blessed with only the one child, had no idea of her own infirmity. When getting into bed on one occasion (she was close upon seventy then) she felt some twinges of rheumatism.

"Eh, Grace," she cried, "if the Lord be pleased to spare me to grow old, what's to become of me, if I have the rheumatics now?"

From a very early age the entire management of Craighburn had devolved upon Grace. She had known much bitterness in childhood, she had known nothing of the pleasures of girlhood, and the necessity to think and act for herself and others from youth onward made her feel quite old whilst in years she was quite young.

This was the lady at whose embrace Teenie felt shy.

Leading her up-stairs, she spoke to her in a quiet pleasant way about her father and his affairs, about Allie, and the doos—about everything she thought could interest her. But still the girl was awkward and could not feel at ease. Then Grace spoke of her mother, and how she was always expecting to be up and doing as briskly as in the far-back days before she had married; of the folk at Rowanden, and the various ailments from which they suffered; of the farmers roundabout, and their people.

Teenie answered in short uncomfortable sentences, which supplied no impetus to the conversation. Grace was very patient, and would take nothing amiss; indeed, she knew that it would have been wrong to do so, for she had an instinctive appreciation of all the difficulty Teenie experienced in speaking to her, and she was doing her best to remove it. She knew that Teenie was aware of all that had passed between herself and Walter.

She helped Teenie—much against that young lady's will—to take off her shawl, and then she looked at her with honest admiration: the lithe shapely form, the rich fair hair, and the bright fresh face, looking all the more beautiful under its present expression of shyness that was almost timidity.

"Ah! I never thought you were so bonnie, Teenie, until now," exclaimed Grace, sincerely proud of her, although she could not help a faint regretful remembrance of her own misfortune in presence of this perfect embodiment of youth. "Walter has been lucky, and you will be a good wife to him."

"I'll try," said Teenie, wishing with all her heart that she could find something warmer and more expressive to say.

"I'm sure you will, and it was very kind of you to come to me and let me be the first to say 'God bless you and him,' as I do, very earnestly."

Teenie felt that she was receiving thanks which she did not deserve. She could not bear that, and she broke the spell which bound her tongue.

"You are no to thank me for coming," she said hurriedly; "it was his doing. I did not want to come—at least not yet. I thought—I felt——"

She stammered, stopped, afraid to say something that might give pain, and looked helplessly at Grace, whose calm face was a little paler than usual. She spoke tenderly, as if Teenie were the one who needed sympathy and not herself.

"Come and sit down here, Teenie" (placing her in a big old-fashioned arm-chair, and seating herself in a straight-backed high one); "I can talk to you better there. When you are standing you look so big and strong that I feel half afraid of you."

They both laughed at that, and they felt more companionable, that is, more equal than they had done yet. Grace proceeded—

"I am glad you have spoken so frankly, and I still thank you for coming, for I know that you are glad you came, now you find it gives me pleasure."

"Yes, very glad."

"Well, I want to speak to you very seriously, and I would never have been able to do so if you had not spoken out just now. Walter has told you what has passed between us; I am very fond of him, and always will be. He is true and earnest; I want him to be happy, and just because I am fond of him I want him to marry you, because that will make him happy; and I want you to think of me and love me as the dear sister of both, for I shall always love you both very much. Do you think you can do that?"

Teenie looked at her, wide-eyed, wondering—never doubting her, but wondering how she could say in one breath that she loved the man, and yet that she was content he should marry somebody else. She would not have felt so, and therefore, of course, could not have said it. What was the difference between them, then? Was there not something very bad in her, that she did not feel like Grace? Was there not something very wicked in her, that she did not feel more acutely sorry than she did for the pain Grace must be suffering? She could not tell, but she felt almost inclined to envy Grace the power of making this sacrifice.

From her babyhood, in trifles and in serious matters, Teenie had always shown a restless desire to be equal to everything and everybody. She had never seen any of the fishermen perform a feat which she did not attempt, and attempt again, until she could do it as well as, or better than, her example.

"I wish I could tell you what I'm thinking," she cried distressedly; "I wish he had never seen me, for he ought to have married you; he would have been far happier than he can ever be with me."

And she stared vacantly at the window, as if seeking in space some means of altering the arrangement yet.

"Hush, Teenie! you must not speak that way. Think how much he cares for you before he would have—altered his plans."

She was going to say, "Before he would have sought my leave to break off his engagement with me," but she stopped in time.

"I wish I could be like you, Miss Wishart," said Teenie, with such a plaintive look, full of such a pitiful sense of her own failings, that Grace's whole heart was drawn towards her.

"You must call me Grace, and you must not wish to be anybody but yourself—for it's Teenie he wants, and nobody else."

"Aye, but I begin to feel there are so many things I am stupid and ignorant about, that——"

Grace would not allow her to finish.

"You are a brave, bonnie lass, and we are all fond of you, and that's everything. Even the Laird said he admired you, and gave his consent at once, when we were expecting a fine to-do. Now I am your sister, am I not?"

Teenie's face brightened, and the two girls clasped hands as she replied in her fearless, honest way—

"Yes."

"And you will always like me and believe in me?"

"I cannot help doing that."

"Very well, it's a bargain, mind you, and I will hold you to it." Grace, smiling, held up her finger in a mock threatening way. "Remember, I am your elder sister, with great experience of the world, and I shall be very severe if you ever dare to say another word against Teenie. I won't be afraid of you, although you are ever so much bigger and bonnier than me."

Teenie was amused, and all her shyness disappeared—the affectionate nature of Grace had entirely overcome it. They laughed together, and there was no longer any hesitation between them.

They went out to the garden, exchanging confidences about the management of pigeons and bees, about flowers and cooking. Teenie explained that the proper way to cook a yellow haddock was to toast only one side—the skinny side—so that all the juice might be preserved in the other. Love and cookery supplied delightful subjects of conversation.

They sat down on a green knoll, backed by rose-bushes and the bee-hives, Grace a little below her "big sister," as she called Teenie, so that she might look up and admire her, which she was never tired of doing.

Walter appeared in the distance, smoking; he saw the two, and halted, a glad smile on his face. Suddenly he hastened into the house, and reappeared with Grace's painting paraphernalia.

"Sit there," he cried gaily. "I want to make a sketch of you two—it will be something by which to remember this day."

He sketched, they all chatted, and they were very happy. The song of birds, the hum of the bees, and the perfume of flowers around them contributed to their pleasure. Beyond the garden was a field of ripe barley, its long beards drooping gracefully under the weight of its own rich burden, showing what the farmers like to see, "fine sweiyeed (swayed) heads." They were like ladies' fingers stretched towards something they feared to touch, yet trembling in their eagerness to reach it. Then the wind swept over the yellow mass, and it rolled and murmured like the wavelets of a loch.

Grace declared that the sketch flattered her far too much, and did not make Teenie half so handsome as she really was; but Teenie thought it was quite the other way, and that lady sitting there was much too nice for her. So there was a pretty dispute between them. Walter said he would keep the daub himself since they were not satisfied with it, but he thought it wasn't bad.

They enjoyed his pretended vanity; and the lovers drove away from Craighburn.

Grace watched them till they had passed the gate and were hidden from her by the trees.

"They will be very happy," she thought, "and I am glad."

She went quietly about the ordinary affairs of the household, just as if there were no pain at her heart, just as if she were not trying with all her might to close eyes, ears, and mind to the wild cry that was swelling her breast.

"They will be very happy," she kept on saying to herself, as if the words were a charm to protect her from bitter thoughts, "and I am glad."

She waited upon her mother, who was a prisoner in a big arm-chair that was like a sentry-box with the top off, and who was always fretting that the days passed and she was not yet able to walk over to Dalmahoy to see her brother as she used to do. He was sure to be getting into some mischief; he always did when she was long away from him; he was such a young, hair-brained youth!

Grace was gentle, patient as ever, and promised that they should drive over some day soon to see the Laird.

"Toots, drive! Can I no walk as I used to do?" was the impatient cry of the old lady.

But at last Grace went to her own room and sat down to think.

It was indeed a heavy hand that was laid upon her. From her earliest childhood she had striven to do what was right, and yet it seemed as if the more she strove the heavier became the cross she bore. Why was it that she should suffer thus, and why should these bitter thoughts come now? Because of Walter? Well, why should he leave her?

She was older, but not much ; she was not so very hideous, and she loved him very dearly.

She looked up almost wildly. The glass was before her—the beautiful face, and the shoulder which seemed to make a mockery of her beauty.

She shrank downward, covering her face.

But they would be very happy, and she was glad !

CHAPTER THE TENTH.

THE GOLDEN AGE.

THE result of the excursion to Craigburn was a source of intense joy to Walter Burnett. He had determined upon the visit after much hesitation, for naturally under the circumstances he had feared that the interview might prove unpleasant to all parties. But Grace and Teenie were friends. He did not think he could have been happy otherwise. He was not vain enough to think that Grace would suffer very much on his account, but he knew that she must experience disappointment and annoyance when the fact came to be known to their friends that her marriage was definitively broken off, and that he was about to marry Thorston's daughter.

He believed that what he had done was right ; and, with good reason, he thought of Grace with deep and tender admiration for her generous readiness to release him from an engagement which, although not made by himself, he had acquiesced in by his silence. But he could not avoid an uneasy feeling that he had been unkind to her ; at moments he was troubled by a suspicion that it would have been truer and braver to have closed up in his own breast for ever this love to which he had yielded, and without a word to have fulfilled his engagement. But would that have been honest to her—to have made her his wife whilst his tenderest and best thoughts were with another ? No, that could not have been just to her. Then he looked at Teenie, and he felt so full of joy that he could see no further. One is stupid when very happy ; we need the sting of sorrow to make us wise.

Although Teenie was somewhat silent on the way home, he knew that she was pleased ; and he obtained from her the admission that she was glad she had yielded to his persuasion and gone to Craigburn—Miss Wishart had been so good and kind to her. That Grace would be so, he had never doubted ; but it made him the happier to know that Teenie was sensible of it.

"Aye," he said, playfully making the whip crack over the horse's head ; "the highest reputation a man's talents may win for him is nothing compared to the affection which simple goodness will attain. But it requires genius to be good."

He laughed at this sententiousness ; but he was earnest enough, nevertheless. He was thinking of his own aims, and half conscious of weakness in himself which threatened to mar all that he hoped to do.

Teenie looked at him, wondering how it was that he could have turned away from Grace Wishart for her sake. For a minute her face was darkened by a doubt that they were making a blunder somehow, for which they might suffer sadly by-and-by. But his dauntless enthusiastic love and her own affection dispelled the cloud immediately.

It was all so strange, driving along in the bright sunshine with him, knowing that they belonged to each other now, and that they were to go on this way side by side through life—he holding the reins, of course, just as he was doing now, occasionally touching her hand with tender warmth, glancing with fond smiles in her face, and even (in some very quiet parts) stealing an arm round her waist, giving her a hug and a kiss in defiance of all decorum.

She felt more and more impressed by the sense that she was not the same as yesterday ; but she could not understand what was the nature of the mysterious change which had taken place during the night. She hesitated about what she was going to say ; she hesitated about her movements in a way that she had never done before, and for which she could find no satisfactory reason. She used to speak out whatever thought came uppermost ; now she regarded him first with a quick timorous glance, as if seeking his approval.

It was a fairy story, or a dream, and it was very sweet. Here was the prince (he was the Laird's son, and the Laird was a man of importance in her eyes) come to take the simple daughter of the fisherman away to a grand castle ; and she was to be decked out in silks and braids of the rarest ; many servants were to wait upon her ; horses and chariots were to be at her command ; and barges glittering with golden masts and silver sails were to convey her across the seas whither she willed to go. It was very beautiful. She knew of such things in ballads and legends ; but who could have thought that she was to become the heroine of such a romance ? It was almost too good to be true.

Dan came home to dinner, and feasted rarely upon prime corned beef—fishermen as a rule have a preference for "fleshers'" meat—turnips and potatoes. Walter feasted too, and remained the whole afternoon. Dan found himself in the way ; he grumbled, and kept as much out of sight as possible.

In the moonlight the lovers were still together, walking upon the headland. They halted beside a clump of scraggy trees—the moorland reaching towards the hills behind them, the sea radiant with silver streams before them.

The shadows of the branches formed exquisite laccwork at their feet ; they stood in a fairy circle of delicate tracery—involved and uncertain in its forms as their own future ; changing with every breath of wind, but beautiful as their hopes.

Her life had been a happy one, brightened by many homely joys and little adventures along the shore ; her will in all things unconstrained. But there had been long monotonous stretches in it, too, where the bare moorland looked dull and bleak, and her limbs thrilled with energies for which there was no outlet. Then the restless spirit of the sea seemed to possess her, and she hungered to see and to know the something which lay beyond the encircling horizon.

Curiosity almost as much as affection made her think eagerly, yet with a strange timidity, of her marriage-day. She dreamt of new scenes, new duties, and a purpose in life that would fill her mind and occupy her restless hands; to Walter she would be indebted for all this, and to him she owed much of the inspiration of her vague imaginings. She was very proud of him and grateful to him.

END OF CHAPTER THE TENTH.

A BURIED CITY.

IN a secluded corner of Hampshire, quite out of the track of the ordinary traveller or tourist, lies a village known, even by name, to few besides residents in the locality, but which is at the present moment one of the most interesting spots in the wide area of Britain. When our ancestors were little better than savages, and the Romans came with their civilisation to the islands of the West, they saw here a site on which to found a city, that became one of great importance. The traces of it in our early history are of the slightest description; antiquarians have disputed its original name, and no vestiges of it were known until recently, with the exception of huge and irregular masses of masonry, which the country people have long designated "The Walls." Within these Walls, whose remains enclose a space of one hundred acres and extend about a mile and a half in circumference, there had been for centuries nothing but fertile corn-fields, which presented, however, a marked peculiarity. In certain lines, which sometimes crossed each other, the crops would come up but thinly, and the corn itself would here be very inferior to the rest. More than three hundred years ago, the old antiquary, Leland, had noted this fact as a "strange thing;" for when, said he, "the corn is marvellous fair to the eye, and ready to show perfecture, it decayeth." But the country folk had a ready way of accounting for it. They held, from tradition, that the absence of fertility followed the lines of the ancient streets; and farmers on the spot have been known to assert that when the crops were fully grown, the sites of the streets and the principal buildings could be noticed, on overlooking the fields, by the thinness and weakness of the ears in long lines and patches, while all else was luxuriant. The tradition and the observation have been verified in an extraordinary way within the last few years, and of this I purpose giving a brief account.

The spot referred to is the village of Silchester, on the northern border of Hampshire, where it touches the county of Berks—about seven miles from Basingstoke and ten from Reading. Silchester occupies some of the highest ground in its county, and is surrounded by woods and copses, which form the remains of what was once a dense forest, extending many miles away. Surmounting these woods—dear to the fox-hunters of two counties—is a nearly level plain, a portion of which is enclosed in "The Walls," while just outside their northern boundary lies Silchester Common, profuse in heather that would delight the heart of a Scotchman. This common, I may say in passing, formed one of the most convenient sites that could be found for a military camp during some Autumn Manœuvres, which thus furnished a forcible illustration of the ancient character and importance of the place.

A few miles from Silchester lies Strathfieldsaye—the estate given, as most readers are aware, by the nation in gratitude to the victor at Waterloo. The space within the Walls, and much of the adjoining land, was the property of the Iron Duke, and passed on his death to his son, the present Duke of Wellington. The advent to this locality, as Rector of Strathfieldsaye, of a gentleman of antiquarian tastes and studies—the Rev. J. G. Joyce—gave rise to a consultation with the landowner as to whether something might not be done to unfold the mystery which for centuries had enwrapped the Silchester corn-fields. His Grace readily consenting, experimental excavations were commenced about seven years ago, a spot being selected where the appearances of the streets of which the farmers had talked were most obvious. As results were problematical, proceedings were begun in a very leisurely way, a few intelligent labourers, well advanced in years, being selected to turn over the soil in one field during the fine weather. Summer after summer ever since, as the writer has witnessed, have the same party of old men jogged on in their unwonted occupation, bringing to light, with comparatively little effort, some of the most curious and interesting traces extant of the Roman occupation of Britain.

Their labours were rewarded, almost at the outset, by important discoveries. Within a foot or two of the surface of the ground, and sometimes almost immediately beneath it, they came upon the foundations of buildings, the pavements of streets and pathways, the remains of stone columns and entablatures, all undoubtedly Roman, and many of them, considering the shallowness of the soil above, in truly wonderful preservation. Many times during centuries had the ploughshare been turned, as the farmer prepared his fields, by some resisting masonry; but no one suspected the hidden wealth, from an antiquarian point of view, which lay only just beneath those crops of waving corn. Nothing is more striking, to an observer of the excavations at Silchester, than the ease with which a wide range of the most interesting historical evidence has been laid bare, and the slight depth of soil which has sufficed here to conceal for fifteen hundred years the works of a great people, who first civilised our land. The proximity to the surface of the Roman ruins at Silchester is to be accounted for by the elevation of the site, which receives nothing from any adjacent soil, while the slope of the land in the locality all around has carried off the water which otherwise, in the course of ages, would have disintegrated such remains. At Silchester one may see in almost perfect condition, just below the level of grass and clover, paved ways formed in Roman fashion of exceedingly small pieces of tile laid side by side, and may walk for many yards along such a path, which Roman feet trod soon after the dawn of the Christian era.

Among the earliest of the discoveries was a mosaic, formed of tiles only half an inch square, and of various colours, the figure being a circular device surrounding an elegant urn. This was removed to the Duke of Wellington's mansion at Strathfieldsaye. Other curiosities, such as coins (found in large numbers), were deposited for the time in a wooden structure which was erected on the ground as a receptacle for anything worthy of preservation. This wooden building is itself an object of interest. It was formerly the portable "shooting box" of the great Duke, who used it occasionally in his visits to the Highlands. Taken to pieces, it occupied but little compass in travelling, and when fixed in position it gave all the convenience of sitting apartment and sleeping room which his simple habits required.

On the site of one building, which from its size appeared to have been the residence of some important personage, was found a hypocaust elaborately constructed of earth and tiles, and apparently once used for warming a room above; in a corner was the charcoal with which some slave had lighted the last fire. In another portion of the ground was discovered a complete furnace, conjectured to have been used by an artisan. The earthen banks and the flues in each instance remained in perfect condition, but they received some injury from exposure to the weather in the winter after discovery, and wooden sheds have since been placed over them for their protection.

Such were the results obtained at an early stage of the Silchester excavations; but others, much more important, were to follow. By going over the ground with great care, and closely following the traces of masonry wherever they occurred, the chief features of the city, as they had once presented themselves when it was in its most flourishing condition, were exposed to the view. It was the great reward of Mr. Joyce when he was able to show, beyond dispute, the site of the forum of Silchester, in its original plan, with every chamber clearly indicated. Only at Pompeii had a Roman forum previously been discovered, for even in the towns of Italy such traces have long since been obliterated. The forum at Silchester formed a rectangle in the heart of the city. The court of justice, the semi-circular seat of the magistrates, the covered walks outside, were all clearly visible from the distinct lines of masonry which had formed the base; and in the immediate neighbourhood of the court, or basilica, the market-place could be readily recognised. Square blocks of building were shown to have existed side by side, in front of an unoccupied space, which apparently formed the lounge of the citizens. In one of these blocks many coins were found; in another, a quantity of bones; in a third, a mass of oyster-shells. It seems no great stretch of conjecture, but a very probable conclusion to which Mr. Joyce arrived, that the first of these spaces was the abode of a money-changer; the second, of a butcher; the third, of a fishmonger.

But the most interesting Roman relic found at Silchester, or perhaps anywhere in England, remains to be mentioned. While searching a bed of burnt timber near the basilica, Mr. Joyce discovered a bronze eagle of beautiful execution; and a comparison of this with the sculptures on Trajan's Pillar showed clearly that it was one of the kind carried by the standard-bearers of the Roman legions. Nowhere in Europe, so far as the discoverer had been able to trace when he related the circumstance to the Society of Antiquaries, does a corresponding relic exist. The jealous care with which the Roman soldiers would guard their standard does not need to be pointed out; we all know the importance attached by a modern regiment to the preservation of its flag. Therefore the charred timber, and the mutilated condition of the eagle—the vertical wings being torn from the body, that the emblem might the more readily be concealed—tell a significant tale of surprise, defeat, and disaster. To the spectator who walks over the ground and into the little museum, the suggestion of this story is confirmed by the frequent occurrence of human bones among other animal remains. History is silent upon the closing catastrophe at Silchester, but we can imagine the scene when the Saxons, according to tradition, burst in overpowering numbers upon the last representatives of the Roman power, and with fire and sword destroyed a city which they soon after razed completely to the ground.

Outside the wall of the ancient city, on the south-eastern angle, is an amphitheatre, still nearly perfect in form, although its sides are overgrown by ferns and shrubs. Here the Roman citizens took their recreation, and witnessed those gladiatorial combats and struggles with wild beasts which constituted their great delight. Here also, there is every reason to believe, the blood of many a Christian martyr was shed during the long persecution in Britain, when

—“Dioctletian’s fiery sword Worked busy as the lightning.”

This spot without the walls will be more fertile in suggestion to many than the scenes within. The amphitheatre resembles a much larger one of the same origin near Dorchester.

Silchester is now considered by antiquaries to have been the ancient Roman Calleva, the chief city of the tribe of Atrobantes, who are believed to have swept before them into Wales the Segontiaci, once resident on the spot. A tablet dedicated to the Segontiac Hercules was found here in the last century. The name Calleva has been traced to the British Gual Vawr, or Great Wall. The modern name is probably a Saxon variation of the Roman Silicis Castrum, or Fortress of Flints, the walls being composed chiefly of flints embedded in the durable Roman mortar. These walls, which even in their dilapidation vary in height from ten to twenty feet, still strike the beholder with a feeling of respect for the people who raised them, and enable him to understand something of the impressions of the early Saxon peasantry, who believed they enshrined the abode of the giant Onion, and called one of the gateways by the name of “Onion’s Hole.”

SOPS FOR THE PUBLIC.

THE desire of the reader is doubtless, like my own, to be a hero and a martyr. Our moral courage is high, our indifference to the opinions of our contemporaries unbounded. Could we but earn a statue or so, and a place in the almanacks amongst the eclipses and bank holidays after death—could we but feel assured that a future generation would note the date of our decease and that of expiring life assurances with an equal interest—the fact of being thought extremely disagreeable up to the period of our funerals would affect us but slightly. But we have not got ourselves only to consider. Our families, our friends, our political and parochial allies, all demand support and co-operation; and in their interests we may often be called upon to temporise, to conciliate, and to throw sops.

There are two ways of governing mankind—persuasion and force. The politician can no further go; if he wants to make a third he must join the former two, like Nature in the famous distich. So that to accuse a statesman to whom force is forbidden of insincerity and inconsistency is absurd. A successful general might just as well be indicted for manslaughter; it is what he is paid for. If the public will not take its necessary powder plain, they must be concealed in jam. Or if, as more frequently happens, the said fractious public clamours for something which is likely to disagree with it, the judicious ruler does not inflame its desires to madness by opposition, but feigns acquiescence, and throws it a little bit of the indigestible stuff as a sop. That lulls the monster; and once quiet, it is ready to listen to reason. Sometimes the public swallows the sop and roars for more; in that case the minister is generally wrong in his diagnosis, and had better decamp, for the animal’s instincts are right now and then.

When, therefore, it seems incumbent upon us to undertake the ungrateful task of deceiving our fellow-creatures with an apparent rather than a real acquiescence with their wishes, we can at least console ourselves by reflecting that our success betokens the possession of diplomatic and statesmanlike qualities.

Railway directors are doubtless, from constant practice, about the most judicious throwers of sops we can hold up for humble imitation. Not far from where I write, there is a crossing over the line, which is periodically subject to accidents. Three-and-twenty years ago there was a wooden bridge over the spot, which cautious passengers might traverse if they preferred it; but the majority avoided the stairs and passed over the rails underneath; and practically the bridge was useful principally as a gymnasium for the children. Well, when two manglings occurred within a fortnight at crossing, the public began to remonstrate. It true that we did not quite know what was to be done. Shutting up the pathway was out of the question; but we all agreed that the authorities ought to do “something.” They promised that they would, and they did. They pulled down the wooden bridge, which was getting very dilapidated. I don’t know why that quieted us, for it was removing the one safeguard the crosser had, but it did; and though there were occasional deaths at the place, no more complaints were made for fifteen years. Then a churchwarden was run over, and we made a fresh stir. Again the officials promised that something should be done, and this time they erected two iron turnstiles by the sides of the little wooden swing-gates opening on to the line. I suppose the theory was that the exertion required to push through the turnstiles would arouse absent persons from their fits of abstraction, and enable them to notice approaching trains. But the wooden gates were not taken away, and they are always used in preference to the more inconvenient iron contrivances. But the sop stilled our outcries; and although the ribs of several parishioners have come into violent collision with buffers during the eight years that the useless turnstiles have been gathering rust, yet we trouble not the board.

This is only a local matter, but communication between the traveller and the guard is a general question, and has been from the first, or nearly so; for I am sorry to say that I can speak to a very early period of railway enterprise. One carriage took fire, and the occupants were unable to stop the train, which eventually became a comet. On another occasion the bottom of a carriage came out, and the passengers found themselves in the position of the Irishman who engaged a Sedan chair in a similar condition, and would as soon have walked, "if it had not been for the look of the thing." On these occasions the public waxed indignant, and the newspapers thundered. So directors had check-strings run along the trains, which imperilled travellers might pull; and when the storm blew over, officials ceased to attach them. At last, however, some wretched plagiarist, who had read "Davenport Dunn," committed a sensational murder in a railway carriage, and raised such a panic through the length and breadth of the land, that all sorts of ingenious devices were had recourse to by the various companies. On some lines you may still call the guard, or stop the train, by smashing a glass case and pulling a brass knob inside it; on others the sop is thrown no longer—for it was but a sop after all. The only effectual method of insuring communication between passengers and guard is to build saloon carriages with doors at each end, and an easy access from one to the other; but this would necessitate the reconstruction of a great part of the rolling stock; and when the expense had been incurred, it is doubtful whether the public would appreciate the change.

Nine or ten Augusts ago, when editors were at a loss how to fill their sheets with type, a clamour was got up against the practice of feeding waiters and chambermaids. "Why should not proprietors pay their own servants?" asked "X. Y. Z.," "Justice," etc. "Why not?" echoed the public, waxing so indignant that a sop had to be thrown to it. Hotels and restaurants did not, indeed, go so far as to propose to exempt their customers from all payment for service, but they instituted the plan of making a distinct charge, which, of course, soon became a mere addition, the servants expecting "tips" as before.

Thus the philosopher who studies mankind with a view to personal advantage, perceives that it is not always necessary to make a sacrifice in order to silence an inconvenient clamour. The sop may, in management, be provided at no cost at all.

I have often wondered whether Smart has cultivated that talent for sop-throwing which he displayed at college. I expect not, or he would have been famous long ago. Like too many undergraduates, he desired to "keep" as few lectures and chapels as possible, and probably continued to be more idle with impunity than any of his contemporaries. He perceived in his first term that the authorities were most easily disarmed by humility, and cultivated that Christian virtue, or at least the expression of it, with Heep-like assiduity. He never defended himself. When he was had up for missing lectures, he took the initiative and broke out into lamentations and self-reproaches over his own unhappy indolence, which gave him so much trouble in the end. "After attending one of your lectures, sir," he said on one occasion, "everything is clear to me; all my difficulties vanish; and yet, overcome by indolence or temptation at the moment, I too often miss the golden opportunity, and regret it when regret is useless."

But the notes of apology he sent the Dean when he missed morning chapel were the richest, and would make an amusing volume if collected, though unhappily the element of truth was sadly neglected in their composition. I remember one which I saw him indite sitting up in bed, when I went to breakfast with him one morning. "Dear Sir," it ran, "judge of my horror when, on reaching the chapel-doors with seven seconds to spare, as I thought, I found them closed against me! An inaccurate watch is no excuse, but it is an explanation."

It is the custom with some extravagant men, who find it inconvenient to pay their tailors' bills, to order more clothes instead, which—I don't know why—silences the tradesman's importunity. But the system pursued by a certain acquaintance, who lives considerably beyond his income, is rather less foolish and equally ingenious. A fortnight before quarter-day, when the bills are making up, he goes about amongst his creditors, and tenders small sums "on account." Payments which would appear absurdly insufficient after the bills had been sent in, act as sops beforehand, and he obtains the continued credit which he desires.

As for literal sops, I have been told that a pork-pie, with an opium-pill carefully—But the reader would probably take no interest in the secrets of burglarious enterprise. LEWIS HOUGH.

THE MENDICANTS.

"HIS WORDS ARE MINE."

THAT day, beneath the fitful blue
Of spring's first sky, we wandered through
The orchard heavy with its snows
Of blossom touched to sunny glows,

And out into the meadows, white
With foam of flowers, and the sight
O'ercame us with a glad surprise
Till tears of joy were in the eyes

I loved ; yea, tears were shed that day
May-bright that came before the May.

Through meadow-grasses surging sweet
And blossom tangled, slid our feet,
And round about us Carlo leapt,
Tumbled, and yelped, or forward swept,
Snapt at the grass, or feigned a fray
With rustling leaf or nodding spray.
The lark above us, singing loud
Against a fleecy flock of cloud,
Made subtle music as we went—
My love and I—and "Well-content,"
Said she, "may be the happy bird
Who ever, without uttered word,
Thrilling in ecstasy of love
Makes music to the heavens above!"

Wellnigh my heart within me died
In fitful throbbings, yet I cried,
"Nay, doubt not that the cadenced strain
Of music, like a rippling rain
Slow falling upon summer leaves,
Is language. Into song he weaves
His passion ; but we lack the art
To understand him—nay, in part,
A student of forbidden things.
I can unravel what he sings!"

Amazement brightened in the eyes
That were blue, sunshine-holding skies.
"You can the thoughts of birds divine,
And sing the lark's song, line for line?
The secret of the strain expound,
And give intelligence to sound?
And you will do it?"—All her face
Glowed in the pleading, as by grace
Miraculous a rose had sped
Through lapsing hues from white to red.

And I—repentant of my jest—
What could I but obey as best
My skill would serve, and as she clung Expectant, of my passion sung :—

THE SONG.

Love me a little While moments fleet,

Only a little
While warm lips meet,
And the years in their flight will be honey-sweet
Love me a little
Ere claspt hands part,
Only a little,
And heart to heart
Will throb, though the round of the world apart.
Love me a little,
And cherished so,
Knowing not little Love will grow
Like the ocean filling to overflow.

"Peace, peace! A foolish song," she cried,
As on my lips the fancy died ;
"No bird would sing it in the air,
Nor any creature anywhere
So wantonly a passion feign,
That is but answered with disdain."

A flashing glance that was not scorn,
A tone of love's awakening born,
Some subtle change in voice and mien
The rather felt than heard or seen,
Brought Carlo to her side, and there,
With paws uplifted in the air,
He raised a pleading, piteous whine.
"You hear?" I cried ; "his words are mine,
True as an echo to the sound,
Though phrasing rapture less profound.
'Love me a little,' sang the bird,
And Carlo pleading word for word
Like it—like all—your will would move ;
To look upon you is to love,
And out, alas ! to love in vain !"

All rosilily she said, "The gain,
Sir Student, from your mystic lore
Is all too scant, since, overmore,
There still is lacking to your skill
That without which it serves you ill :
You can give language to the lark,
You can interpret Carlo's bark,
And yet you cannot by your art
Expound the language of my heart ;
Is that so hard to understand?"

One answering kiss impressed her hand.

WILLIAM SAWYER.

THE MAN-EATER.

IT is rather presumptuous for me to tell a sporting story, for I am no "shikári." Nimrod would have felt no pleasure in my society had I been his contemporary, and there are many young men of my own generation who look upon me as little better than a muff. I was once persuaded to try pig-sticking, but I found it task enough to stick to the pig-skin which formed my saddle, and made no effort to spear the living animal. The fact is, I was a Competition Wallah, who obtained his appointment in the Indian Civil Service by hard book-work, and not by interest. I do not say that I am the more efficient for that; a restless high-spirited young fellow, fond of field sports, is often peculiarly adapted for dealing with Asiatics; the very contrast between their natures and his impresses them, and they feel confidence in his strength. Besides, he keeps his health better, as a rule.

However that may be, my strong point is languages and not sport, and when I received an appointment as collector in a wild district of North-western India, where man was scarce and game plentiful, many envious friends considered that the golden opportunity was thrown away upon one whose artificial tastes were in favour of civilised society, and who sighed in the midst of forest or jungle after the dinners, balls, and private theatricals of a British station.

Not that I disliked my life; I enjoyed a little shooting at leisure times well enough, though I was never enthusiastic about it, and the sense of importance which my somewhat despotic position afforded made amends for a great deal of isolation. "Better to reign in Doongapoor than serve at Bombay." My annual circuit I thoroughly enjoyed, though that was the most lonely part of my life, as I had no company but that of natives for weeks together. The work was also hard, and at times of a harassing description, yet satisfactory and pleasurable: when you decide a question which has set a whole village by the ears, or put a final stop to an iniquitous and tyrannical course of conduct, you feel as if you were of some use in the world. It is often difficult indeed to get at the truth when an equal number of witnesses contradict one another, on oath, on each side, but success renews for the arbitrator that delight which he felt on first stepping safely over the Asses' Bridge.

The style of life during the journey had also a certain romance about it, which is becoming very rare in these railroad days. The people would not believe in the collector unless he travelled in some state, so I had a considerable retinue in my train. There were my three Arabs with their gorah-wallahs and grass-cutters, the palanquin-bearers, the cook and his satellites, etc. etc., and the peons forming my escort: quite an encampment.

With the exception of my sleeping tent, all was struck in the middle of the night, so that when I rose at the dawn of day the train was some miles on the march. After a light meal I got into the saddle, and an exhilarating and appetising ride brought me to the new encampment, where I found breakfast ready, after which the business of the day commenced. It was during one of these morning rides that I came upon a group of villagers in great distress, to judge by their loud lamentations, and on approaching them saw a pitiable sight: the mangled corpse of a girl lay in their midst. The evening before, she had gone down to the river which flowed close by, to fetch water; and as she was returning, with the jar upon her head, a tiger sprang upon her from a neighbouring thicket, and as easily as a cat would a mouse, carried her screaming into the jungle, in the sight of several of her friends and relatives.

At the time they were paralysed, but at sunrise the bravest men of the village had armed themselves, some merely with their swords and shields others with matchlocks, and had ventured into the cover, where they found the half-devoured remains which now lay before me.

My appearance gave a new turn to the thoughts of the ryots, whose lamentations were exchanged for expressions of delight at the arrival of the Burrah-sahib, who would deliver them from their foe and avenge the poor girl's death; and I suppose a true sportsman would have felt nothing but elation in the prospect of hunting so grand a quarry as a man-eater. But the horrible fate of the poor child was all I could think of as I cantered on to the encampment, not half a mile distant.

After my bath and breakfast I repaired to the large tent in which business was transacted, and the patell, or head man of the village, was introduced. But neither he nor anybody else could speak of anything but the man-eater.

No fabulous monster of the olden time ever spread more terror throughout the district in which he had taken up his abode than did this tiger. First he had lost cattle and horses; then, about a year before, a child had been carried off close to the village; a grown woman was the next victim, and then the tiger, finding man so much easier a prey than any other animal, made human dinners his habit instead of an occasional luxury. If he had made his lair in one particular spot they might have avoided it, but he ranged over the entire neighbourhood, never lying in wait twice at the same place with the exception of one favourite haunt where a low rock overhung a public path along which the tapall, or letter-carrier, had to pass. Two of these unhappy runners had seen that striped demon spring from behind the boulder—and had seen no more.

The ryots hardly dared go out into the fields to pursue their ordinary avocations; the children could not play; the women feared to go to the river for water except in a large party, and company had not proved any protection to the poor girl of the night before. But what had paralysed the villagers most was the failure of a famous native "shikári," who had been named the "Destroyer of Tigers" from his success in slaying those beasts three of which had fallen before his craft and courage, when he vowed to add the skin of the present pest to his trophies, and another medal to those which had been presented to him by Government.

Night after night he lay in ambush, in places which his woodcraft suggested as the most likely to be visited by the beast, which prowled around him, but refused to leave the brushwood to seize the calf tethered in the open as a bait. It was a duel between man and tiger, and the brute conquered.

One morning the shikari failed to come into the village, and search being made in the spot where he had taken up his position the night before, his matchlock was found lying on the ground undischarged, while marks of blood on the grass and bushes spoke only too plainly of his fate. From the track of the tiger's enormous foot-prints, there was no doubt that the man-eater had stalked him carefully and sprung on him from behind. That the most celebrated hunter of the district should have been thus beaten at his own game, increased the panic of the superstitious villagers, who thought that an evil spirit must animate the brute that could thus successfully match himself against the craft of man.

But they declared that their fears and dangers were all over now; the Burrah-sahib had come! the Incarnation of Justice, the Fountain of Generosity, the Destroyer of Tigers, the Terror of the Wicked, whether man or beast, the Delight of the Good had come! And all was serene.

Perhaps you have had your health drunk after dinner in England, and wished that the proposer of the toast would not spread the butter quite so thickly; but the wildest panegyric ever begotten of champagne at a wedding breakfast is censure, compared to the flattery of an Asiatic who hopes to get something out of you.

This was my first circuit, and my predecessor had been a mighty hunter, so that there was some reason why the poor natives should hail me as a St. George come to deliver them from their dragon. And I was willing enough to try, for the sight of that morning had stirred my blood. It was a pity that the Destroyer of Tigers was dead, as his woodcraft would have been of the greatest assistance to me; but one of my peons was no despicable hunter, and had nerves which could be trusted in any emergency.

Unfortunately I had no elephant in my train, and it was therefore impossible to pursue the beast into the thick jungle where he had been tracked. On ordinary occasions I might have obtained a sporting elephant from the neighbouring rajah, whose palace was some twenty miles off; but he was absent at Bombay, prosecuting some claims he thought he had against Government. So there was nothing for it but to try to beat the tiger up and shoot him from a tree.

The ground was favourable for this operation. From the village to the river ran a strip of grassland covered with trees, growing not closely, but interspersed as in an English park. To the right of this, commencing half-way between village and river, was the patch of jungle where the remains of the poor girl had been found, and where the tiger still was. Beyond that patch again was cultivated land. So that if the brute could be made to break cover at all, it would not be difficult to drive him out within range of my rifle.

At any rate we could try, and I determined to do so that very day, while the villagers were still excited by the tragedy of the night before. And they responded readily enough to my call, a large proportion of the male inhabitants offering themselves as beaters, and being marshalled under the direction of two middle-aged men who had often conducted similar enterprises in the days of my predecessor.

After consulting with my sporting peon, I selected a tree not far from the river, and about fifty yards off the edge of the jungle, as the most commanding spot. The trunk was entire for some fifteen feet from the ground, and then branched off in four directions, making a snug little platform, where, rugs being spread, I ensconced myself, with two rifles and the peon. My reason for retaining the latter, instead of sending him to direct the beaters, or posting him in another tree, was this:—If the tiger refused to break, I intended to follow him into the jungle on foot, and take the chance of killing him with a shot between the eyes. I knew that it was a foolhardy thing for the coolest and most unerring shot to do, and hoped that it would not be necessary. But I was determined, at all hazards, to take vengeance upon that man-eater if it were possible; and in the event of pursuing him to his lair, I should require the services of the peon, both to track the beast and to hand me my second rifle.

I had hardly taken post before distant yells, the firing of matchlocks, and the occasional whizz of a rocket told that the beat had begun.

Never shall I forget the excitement, the flutter of nerves which I experienced as I knelt in my perch, rifle in hand, watching eagerly for the appearance of the tiger, listening intently for any crackling or rustling of bushes which should betoken his approach.

Had he come out during the first quarter of an hour, I believe that I must have missed him; but as time wore on I grew calmer, until I regained complete possession of my faculties. Soon weariness began to grow upon me, for one of the many sporting virtues in which I am deficient is patience, and above all the other iniquities of the tiger, that of not coming out to be shot became pre-eminent.

When nearly two hours had passed, I felt immensely tempted to descend and try to find the beast, as he would not show himself; and in order to conquer this insane impulse I lit a cheroot, and settled myself in a comfortable position to enjoy it.

Whether it was the soothing effect of the tobacco or the heat, for the atmosphere was stifling, another change came over me, and I began to find that I was very comfortable where I was, and to relish in a dreamy manner the strangeness of the situation.

All around me was most perfectly still, save for the occasional chatter of a monkey, or chirp of a bird, while in the distance there rose a confused medley of sounds—the blowing of horns, the firing of blank cartridges, and the peculiar unearthly cry which the Indian raises, by placing both hands before his mouth and blowing into them. I perfectly remember thinking to myself how much better off I was at rest, and in the shade, at the moment that the peon suddenly grasped my arm, and pointed to the edge of the jungle in the direction of the river. I looked, and felt a sensation hitherto unknown as I saw an enormous tiger stealing out of the reeds not sixty paces from me.

I at once, and for the first time, understood the fascination which draws the hunter from home, friends, and civilisation, to lead the life and endure the company of savages in fever-haunted swamps.

No excitement that I had hitherto experienced ever gave me one-hundredth part the pleasure I felt at that moment. But description is impossible; I have often tried to express the sensation, and failed utterly. Words seem so cold. The aspect of that grand creature, the tiger, in captivity, can give the beholder no idea of the combination of grace, ferocity, strength, activity which impresses one who sees it in its native forests.

I cocked both locks of my rifle, and pressed the caps to see that they were firmly down on the nipples. I felt no nervousness now; the fear of missing, which has often brought about that result when in pursuit of meaner game, never occurred to me; hand, eye, and rifle seemed to be identical with volition as I raised the weapon.

He had moved: the head and flank were visible, but a tree intercepted my aim at the more deadly part.

I paused.

The shouts and firing of the beaters came nearer, and, with a deep growl, the magnificent beast strode on, stately and majestic.

Aiming carefully and steadily at his shoulder, I pressed the trigger, and heard with joy a "thud" which told that the bullet had struck the living target.

With an awful roar to which nothing in nature is worthy to be compared, save thunder in the tropics, he sprang forward, looking right and left for his assailant. Again I fired, and the huge beast fell, but quickly recovering himself, turned and crawled back into the reeds.

"Goolee mar khyar! He has eaten a bullet!" cried the peon in delight as he handed me the second rifle, and ere the man-eater reached cover I had put two more into him.

Descending from the tree, and reloading both rifles, I prepared to follow the wounded animal—not through ignorance that the act was a violation of all sporting rules, for no Indian can avoid having the danger of it constantly pointed out to him, but because I did not know what else to do. It was less dangerous for me to approach than for the natives, who were armed merely with matchlocks or swords; and as for leaving the work uncompleted, that I could not think of.

Directly I had fired the first shot, scouts in the highest trees had communicated in some manner with the beaters, who immediately ceased their clamour; so it was in perfect stillness that I stepped into the reeds, closely followed by my peon.

The trail was there broad enough, and marked with a great deal of blood, some of that frothy description which told of a shot through the lungs. I almost expected to find the tiger dead, but knowing the extreme tenacity of life in the feline tribe, advanced very slowly and cautiously. Fortunately the reeds were very thin just there, which much diminished the danger, and we had not advanced twenty paces before we could see him lying stretched out, not crouching for a spring—alive indeed, but wounded to the death.

The rustle of the reeds as I advanced my rifle through them caused him to stir, as if endeavouring to rouse himself for a final effort for revenge. I aimed at the heart, and fired. With a wild roar he sprang up and stood, not five yards off, facing me. But before he could spring, if indeed he had strength to do it, the contents of my second barrel were poured between his eyes, and rearing up on his hind-legs, he fell over, dead.

The natives now came trooping round, and their joy and triumph knew no bounds. Having singed their enemy's whiskers, to guard against being haunted by his spirit, they proceeded to shower upon him every abuse and insult which they could think of.

That evening, as I sat in front of my tent after dinner, smoking my hookah, I saw the villagers bringing home the man-eater, mounted on a wagon and crowned with flowers, in triumph; and if a short-hand writer could have taken down their extemporised pæans for the benefit of posterity, people a thousand years hence might think that your humble servant had been an ancient demigod.

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—THE QUEEN'S INCOME.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

TN a former paper we showed how John Bull got into debt, and a debt so large that the interest of it consumes £27,000,000 a year of John Bull's income. We have now to point out what other expenditure has to be defrayed when this, the great liability of all, has been provided for. There are many claimants indeed on John's purse. There are armies and navies to be maintained, soldiers and sailors to be fed, clothed, and equipped, and a multitudinous array of ministers of State, judges, officials, policemen, and placemen of all sorts to be salaried or fed'd, or compensated or pensioned. But before all these there is the Crown, the visible representative of the majesty of the State, to be supported; and it is with this subject we are now concerned.

When her present Majesty succeeded to the throne, on the 20th of June, 1837, she surrendered the Crown Lands as her predecessors had done, and received a Civil List of £385,000 a year. This sum was made a prior charge on the Consolidated Fund—that is to say, provision must be made for it out of the accruing revenue of the country before other claims are met—and it was thus divided:—

Class 1.—Her Majesty's Privy Purse.	£60,000
„ 2.—Salaries of Her Majesty's Household, and Retired Allowances.	111,260
„ 3.—Expenses of Her Majesty's Household.	172,500
„ 4.—Royal Bounty, Alms, and Special Services.	13,200
„ 5.—Pensions to the extent of £1,200 a year.
„ 6.—Unappropriated Moneys	8,040
	£355,000

Here, it will be observed, we have no charges whatever connected with the administration of Government. The Civil List is appropriated entirely to the personal and household expenditure of the Sovereign. The Privy Purse, of course, explains itself. It is, indeed, the royal pin-money. Class 2 introduces us at once into the domestic life of the monarch. Her Majesty's Household may be said to consist of three great establishments under the control of the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse respectively. It is assuredly no light matter to describe these high officials, each one at once the custodian and the embodiment of "the divinity that doth hedge a king." As one contemplates the long retinue of courtiers, the vast array of attendants, the pomp and pageantry of a modern Court, how one feels that the days of royal simplicity are nothing but a nursery dream! The thrifty "king in his counting-house, counting out his money;" the queen of charmingly simple tastes, "in the kitchen, eating bread-and-honey;" these, the ideal monarchs in the days have been supplanted by Sovereigns grand, inaccessible, and dim. Why, if a recent writer may be trusted, Louis the Sixteenth had sixteen pages in crimson and gold, whose great business was to fetch the royal shippers!

"When the breeze of a joyful dawn blew free

The Lord Steward, most august of all the immediate attendants on Majesty, presides at the Board of Green Cloth at Buckingham Palace. Originally the Board of Green Cloth was a feudal Court. Its title and functions take us back many a century, to the old feudal times, when the king's household was arranged entirely on feudal principles. Then the royal purveyors, acting in accordance with the old feudal rights of pre-emption, seized, with power and prerogative, from the adjacent towns and villages, the viands they needed, and, in Burke's words, "brought home the plunder of a hundred markets." Then, too, a royal palace was a vast hall, where commodities of all sorts were collected, where soldiers congregated in troops, where force and power predominated, and comfort and seclusion were unknown. At the gate of every palace a market would be set up, and the produce of the neighbourhood be offered for the supply of the royal table. In short, wherever the Court went, it became necessarily the centre of all life, and the scene of much conflict and disorder. To control the vast and often unruly multitude who, for some cause or another, crowded into the palace, was the business of the Board of Green Cloth. It had its own laws, and a jurisdiction co-extensive with the area of the Court itself, and its members included the great officers of the household. Now all this is changed. The palace is now the quiet home of the Sovereign. The royal tradesmen no longer need an array of justices and soldiers to regulate their commercial activity. Moreover, State officers no longer sit in the entrance of a palace, to witness the stores of game and flesh which their subordinates have gathered. Yet the Lord Steward still has charge of all commissariat arrangements. He controls the kitchen, with its establishment of upwards of a hundred cooks, confectioners, and ewry and table deckers; the wine and beer cellars, where there are grooms and yeomen worthy of their arduous duties; the almonry, the gardens, the pay-office, and a phalanx of State porters, and assistant porters.

The Lord Steward, then, may be said to look after the monarch's "inner man." The Lord Chamberlain has higher and more varied responsibilities. He ministers to the æsthetic tastes of the Sovereign, superintends the wardrobe, and, generally, is entrusted with all details of the Court. With him is associated the Mistress of the Robes, who presides over the Robes department. All maids of honour, lords in waiting, ladies of the bed-chamber, grooms, ushers, and pages are within the department of the Lord Chamberlain. Moreover, he regulates the Court musicians and artists, the chaplains, the serjeants and gentlemen-at-arms. Last, but not least, to him is committed the health of his royal master or mistress; and the medical department, with its physicians and surgeons ordinary and extraordinary, dispensers, etc. etc., recognises him as its head.

But, wide as is the jurisdiction of the Lord Chamberlain, it does not include all the retainers of royalty. The Master of the Horse has a distinct sphere of operations. He controls the Royal Hunt, appoints the whippers-in, and is paramount in all matters connected with the stables.

If now to the above list we add the Keepers of the Privy Purse, the Private Secretaries, the Librarian, the Governesses and Tutors, and other subordinate officers who are more immediately under the direct authority of royalty, we have given some slight idea of the various elements of which the Court is now-a-days composed, and the salaries that have to be provided for out of Class 2 of Her Majesty's Civil List.

Class 3 is appropriated to the Expenses of the Household. Out of this class are defrayed all the tradesmen's bills of whatever kind. Thus this class represents what we may call the maintenance account of the Court, except so far as salaries are concerned.

Class 4, representing the Royal Benefactions, is distributed in several modes. The largest portion of it is under the control of the Prime Minister for the time being; another is dispensed by the Premier's wife. These are grants of money only, but the remainder, under the charge of the Lord High Almoner, consists both of money and commodities. On Maunday Thursday this bounty is distributed in the Chapel Royal, Whitehall. There is a choral service, and generally a large attendance of spectators. The lucky recipients, previously tested and approved at the Bounty Office, congregate in the centre of the church, where the Lord High Almoner, attended by his yeomen, superintends the almsgiving of his august mistress. Shoes, blankets, wearing apparel, etc., and a purse containing silver coins, specially coined at the Mint, and of denominations unknown to the nation at large, are the usual forms which the royal beneficence assumes. The number is increased in proportion to the length of the Sovereign's reign.

Class 6, consisting of a small grant of moneys not specially appropriated, needs no explanation. As will be seen by the foregoing statement, the five classes—for the total of Class 5 is not included—make up the aggregate sum of £385,000.

We turn now to the consideration of Class 5, the Civil List Pensions—a subject which, though of small interest to the present generation, has, in days gone by, formed the battle-ground of parties, and been the cause of grave disquiet to financial reformers. At the outset we must distinguish between the pensions granted by Parliament to members of the Royal Family, and to meritorious public servants, and those which have been bestowed by the monarch himself, of his own will and pleasure, and without the intervention of the Legislature. It is with the latter only we are now concerned. During the reign of Charles the Second they first became an engine of corruption. Sir Robert Walpole still further extended the system of influencing the House of Commons, either by donations or annual gifts. Lord Brougham has, indeed, endeavoured to exculpate the minister who declared that "all men have their price," by pointing out the urgent perils with which Walpole had to contend. Others have to defend a ministry or a measure; he had to preserve a Crown.

We who have the happiness to live under a monarch whose knowledge of, and love for, the Constitution are above suspicion—who has never been prompted, by excessive zeal for prerogative, to interfere with the freedom of Parliamentary debate—whose ministers, of whatever party, resort to no unworthy arts to snatch a majority—cannot adequately realise the unblushing attempts at oppression and corruption which characterised the relations of King and Legislature in the days of the Georges. True, there were no longer high-handed attempts on the part of the Crown to dispense with Parliament altogether. The efforts of the Tudor and Stuart monarchs in that direction had, at least, the merit of candour; the Georges, while treating the Houses with outward respect, endeavoured so to corrupt them as to make the members simply the creatures of the royal will. Obviously, so far as the maintenance of constitutional freedom is concerned, there is no difference between the abolition of Parliament altogether and the degradation of it to a venal assembly, ready to execute the wishes of the Court. Yet it was no easy matter for an independent member to escape the influence or the arts of such a monarch, for instance, as George the Third. He spared no pains to ascertain the weak points of any doubtful member, and would comport himself at a levée or drawing-room so as either to intimidate or to conciliate. "Tell me," he writes to Lord North, his favourite minister, "who deserted you last night . . . that I may mark my sense of their behaviour at the drawing-room to-morrow;" and again, "If the utmost obsequiousness on my part, at the levée to-day, can gain over Mr. Solicitor-General to your views, it shall not be wanting."*

If the influence of the Court had assumed no other form than a smile or a frown at a levée, it may perhaps be thought that no very great harm would have followed. But this was not the case. Bribery, either by specific donations of money or by the grant of pensions, paid secretly, and held during the pleasure of the king, was practised to an enormous extent. A speech in the House of Commons that pleased the Sovereign, would be recognised by a douceur out of the secret-service money; a satisfactory vote, by a Civil List Pension.

Even as early as the time of Queen Anne, the House of Commons had cut at the root of the perpetual pensions which had delighted the hearts of the adherents of the Stuarts, by prohibiting the grant of any portion of the hereditary revenue for any period longer than the life of the Sovereign. But this was only a small instalment of needed reform. At length, in 1780, Burke took up the matter in his great speech on financial reform to which we shall hereafter refer. At that time there was absolutely no restraint on the monarch as to the amounts of his grants or the number of recipients. There were separate pension lists for England, Ireland, and Scotland, not paid openly at the Exchequer, but by a special paymaster; while the produce of some anomalous duties levied on the West India Islands, which ought to have been appropriated to the purposes of the colony itself, had been formed into a fund for pensions of a questionable kind. Burke proposed that the English pension list should be limited to £95,000 a year. This suggestion was carried out; but no alteration was made in the Scotch and Irish lists till some years later.

But the Act of Burke, followed up as it was by the motion of Dunning, that the "influence of the Crown had increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished," produced indirect results of more importance than its immediate economies.

Act after Act was passed limiting still further the grant of pensions; and, what is of more importance still, there was developed a public opinion altogether opposed to the continuance of practices which degraded the Civil List Pensions to the level of an immoral compact between a venal assembly and an irresponsible king. This opinion found fitting expression in the memorable resolution of the House of Commons in 1834—"That it is the bounden duty of the responsible advisers of the Crown, to recommend to His Majesty for pensions on the Civil List such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence, or who by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science, and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of their Sovereign and the gratitude of their country."

But the Legislature was by no means satisfied with a mere recommendation. In 1837 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into all the existing pensions. They did their duty thoroughly, writing to every grantee to ascertain the grounds on which the pension had been granted. Their report is extremely interesting and curious, but we are bound to say a perusal of it shows that the worst evils of the system had been removed before the committee commenced their labours. However, the committee struck off some pensions altogether, limited the tenure of others, and at the same time, with the view of still further enforcing the sound policy already recommended, they made several suggestions as to the modes in which pensions should in future be given. Meanwhile the Legislature, in passing the Civil List of Victoria, had enacted that the old pensions should be removed from the Civil List altogether, and should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and that Her Majesty should be empowered to give new pensions to the extent of £1,200 a year.

These pensions, then, constitute Class 5 of the Civil List, the total of which of course increases year by year as Her Majesty's reign lengthens, and which amounts now to £22,000. Every year the Prime Minister nominates the new pensioners, and Her Majesty issues a separate warrant for each individual, which warrant specifies at length the grounds for the pension. All additions to the list are reported to Parliament. Doubtless, the best proof that can be given of the satisfactory working of the system, is to be found in the fact that the Pension List has now-a-days disappeared entirely from the arena of public discussion. Once, indeed, in recent years the grant of a small annuity to one Close, for his "poetical merit," provoked a debate in the House of Commons, and the pension was cancelled. But the matter was important only as showing that even a Prime Minister of England may possess little or no poetic taste. On the whole, the pensions are doubtless granted to worthy objects. Indeed, the chief question that occurs to us is whether £1,200 a year is an adequate support for the number of patient toilers in literature, science, and art, whose services, though of inestimable value, do not succeed in reaping a rich harvest.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF

CHAPTER THE ELEVENTH.

AN ORDEAL.

THE Laird rode over to the Norlan' Head, next forenoon, trim, brisk, and youthful.

He had received another letter from Edinburgh, confirming his fondest hopes, and he was in a you, since you will not deal openly with us," said the general—General Forbes, long retired on half-pay—"why should there be any secret in a family so united as ours, especially when our interests are in common?"

"But you'll tell us in confidence, Laird?" said blithe humour although he had quarrelled with several relatives and a number of friends, because he had assured them that they had no prospect of obtaining a penny from the Methven estate, and that he had good reason to believe he knew the heir, whilst he declined at that moment to make the intelligence public.

"THERE'S THE LAIRD COMING

"You're jist a greedy old tyke, and I'm satisfied you mean to have something out of it for your own pouch," said Aunt Janc, his maiden sister, who lived in a little villa on the outskirts of Kingshaven, and on a moderate income maintained her position as one of "the gentry."

"Pon my soul, cousin, you force me to suspect

Widow Smyllie, a smooth-faced handsome little lady, with a large family, and therefore anxious to increase her means.

The provost, Dubbieside, modestly advanced his claim to know the secret on the score of justice—as a magistrate he ought to know how the matter stood, in order to be able to advise others.

But the Laird was neither to be gibed, threatened, nor cajoled into a confession of his secret. He magnanimously overlooked all the disagreeable things which were said of himself, and delivered a patriotic oration on the greatest happiness of the greatest number, and assured them that his only interest in the matter was to see that every one should have justice—that was, full satisfaction of all their claims.

Aunt Jane went off severely threatening that she would never darken his doors again.

The general swore that, if there was law in the land, he would punish the Laird for his attempted trickery.

The provost mildly declared that in his own behoof, and in behoof of others, he must enter a formal protest against the singular conduct of Dalmahoy.

Widow Smyllie playfully touched his arm, and with a coaxing look said in her smooth voice—

“But you’ll not forget the five fatherless bairns, Laird? You know what a struggle I have to put them forward in the world, and you won’t forget them if you have any influence in the matter.”

“But that is just what I have not, my dear, and these fools snap and snarl at me because they will not believe me. I have no power whatever, I can do nothing for anybody—not even for myself. It is entirely a matter of law, and I, having had some interest in the man, happened to make inquiries, which were answered in confidence. Without betraying that confidence, I wished to save you folk from wasting time and temper over a matter which I know cannot benefit any of you.”

“But you’ll try to get us a little?” pleaded the widow, smiling so sweetly, and not believing a word of what he said any more than the others.

“If you will show your relationship to Methven, on the mother’s side, I’ll do everything I can to help you. I can say no more.”

The widow did not even then think it a pleasant duty to hunt up her relationship with George Methven’s mother; but she smiled and thanked Dalmahoy as if he had done her the greatest kindness, and went away thinking that he was the most awful hypocrite she had ever come across.

The Laird did not care; he knew that he had spoken the absolute truth, and what he did not wish to make known he had frankly told them. He was a little irritated, perhaps, that they should be so inconsiderate and so indifferent to the true principles of action, either in public or private affairs; but then, what could you expect from people who had given no attention to the policy of the nation!

So when he received the second letter from the lawyers, he rode over to the Norlan’ Head in high “fettle.”

Alison saw him coming, and ran to warn Teenie, who was at that moment busy with the preliminary mysteries of kippering salmon.

“Guid be here, lassie!” cried Ailie, thrusting her away from the table, and snatching a large ashet out of her hands, “you shouldna fash wi’ thae things now. You’re going to be a leddy, and you maun learn no to soil your hands, least of all to gar them smell of fish. There’s the Laird coming,

I’ve warrant to back-spear you, and examine you in your carrichters (catechism) maybe, and no a minute for you to change your gown.”

Ailie’s idea of the Laird’s visit was that he intended to put his future daughter-in-law through an examination such as the children of the parish school were annually subjected to in his presence.

Teenie was not half so much discomposed as Ailie by the near approach of the ordeal she had to undergo—for it was an ordeal.

“Where’s father?” she asked quietly.

“He’s out—by some gate; but haste you, and put on your silk gown, and make yourself braw, or the Laird come.”

Teenie with the utmost calmness washed her hands in a basin which stood on the dresser, but displayed no intention of leaving the kitchen.

Ailie halted midway in the floor, her hands full of the ashet, her eyes full of wonder and indignation.

“Is it possible that you mean to meet the Laird in that fashion?” she cried; “are you clean out of your judgment, or what’s wrang with you? Gae ’wa this minute and put on your braws, or I’ll think you’re daft.”

“Never you heed, Ailie,” said Teenie doggedly; “if the Laird will not have me for his daughter this way, he’ll no have me any other way.”

“The Lord be merciful to us!” groaned Ailie; “the bairn has neither respect nor reason.”

But she had taken one of her humours, and was not to be moved. She would not have changed her dress if Walter had been coming—to be sure, she might have looked to see that her hair was in order—and why should she do it because his father came? No; he should see her just as she was, and he could be pleased or not—just as he liked.

The Laird entered, followed by Dan.

The Laird was on his grand horse; he was younger than ever—he was more condescending than ever.

“Where is Christina?” he was saying, as he entered the kitchen; and seeing her, he advanced quite gallantly and kissed her, much to her discomfiture.

“I must salute my daughter,” he said gaily, and repeated the kiss as if he liked it; whilst she shrank back, bewildered and confused.

She had been prepared to meet him, but she had not been prepared for such a display of affection and respect.

“Why, now, this is charming,” he said, holding her hands and looking at her admiringly. “I see you have not been foolishly preparing to receive me in your Sabbath clothes. You have paid me the very highest compliment you could pay me, my dear lass; you have granted me common-sense enough to appreciate the lady, no matter

"what her attire might be; and believe me, I am proud of your confidence."

Teenie felt herself quite put out of countenance by his compliments, and by his reference to a matter which only a minute ago had been the subject of a dispute between her and Ailie. But she felt somehow spiteful towards him that he should have thought of such a subject.

"I am glad you are pleased, sir," she said, with a self-possession which was born of her vexation; "I did not know you were coming to-day, or I would have been better prepared to receive you."

There was a degree of unconscious satire in the answer which amused Dalmahoy.

"Impossible that you could be better prepared than you are," he said smiling. "I am proud to call you daughter; and I do not at all wonder, now I look at you again, that Walter should have defied my wishes and sought you for his wife. I forgave his disobedience before I came here; now I admire it, and freely declare that with the same sweet temptation in my way I would have been disobedient myself."

This was spoken with the air of a man who thought he deserved to be admired alike for his frankness and condescension.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir," said Teenie, standing with hands clasped behind her, very much as she used to stand when repeating her lessons to the dominie.

Evidently she did not admire Dalmahoy as he expected. He, intending to be most conciliatory and most kind, provoked in her a spirit of rebellion which threatened to make his visit anything but satisfactory to either party. Walter had sought her because he loved her, and she had accepted him for the same reason, not because he was the Laird's son. Dalmahoy's grand air and his patronage irritated her so that she could have no sympathetic communion with him. She could not say as she felt, and as she had said to Grace Wishart, she was very glad that Walter loved her, and that she wished to be a true wife to him in all ways. She was rather inclined to be spiteful and dry—as unlike herself as could be. No doubt this was partly due to the feverish excitement of her position.

Thorston stood near the door, hat in hand, his thick curly hair tangled in wild confusion, his hard weather-beaten face cold and apparently indifferent, whilst his eyes moved slowly from Teenie to the Laird, and back to her. Big and stolid, he had no more appreciation of Dalmahoy's condescension than his daughter had. Indeed, he had a dull notion that he would have been best pleased if the affair should go no further.

Ailie was the only one who seemed disposed to pay proper respect to his Lairdship. She had been fidgeting at the dresser, and at last she wheeled about with the suggestion—

"Will you no bid the Laird ben to the parlour?"

"No, thank you," said Dalmahoy, before anybody else could speak, and not feeling quite so much at his ease as he liked to feel, whilst Dan was glaring at him with his great dark eyes, just like those of a fish newly out of the water, he thought, and Teenie was so reserved, if not defiant; "no, thank you, I like this homely place best. Nothing is more charming to me than simplicity of manners and life. I am delighted with nothing so much as the privilege of occasionally sharing the plain fare and the—the ordinary ways of my neighbours. Here, of course, I make myself quite at home."

He was taking advantage of one of the stereotyped phrases of his electioneering days, to get over what seemed to be an awkward pause.

"Ony way, you'll be seated, Laird," said Ailie, with her apron dusting a chair which was already as clean as scrubbing could make it.

"Permit me."

And the Laird advanced bowing to Teenie with as much courtesy as if she had been a real princess, and conducted her to the chair which had been offered to himself.

"Manners is everything," muttered Ailie to herself, as she thrust another chair forward for Dalmahoy, which he accepted with the most gracious "Thank you."

Teenie was fluttered and "put out" by all this. She submitted; she sat down; but she was even more rebellious the more polite he showed himself. The Laird, with all his courtesy, unfortunately did not possess the art—which is really born of unselfish good-nature—of making people feel at ease.

"I come to you to-day," he said in his best manner, "simply to offer you my sincere congratulations on your approaching union with my son, and to wish you all the happiness which can befall man and wife. Allow me to say that what I have seen of you leads me to think that you will be a good wife to him, and I do hope that he will make you happy."

He was so very sincere that Teenie felt somewhat ashamed of the almost uncivil way in which she had treated him.

"Thank you," she said very heartily.

"But I have another subject on which I hope to be able to congratulate you and my son in a few days. I shall not explain myself now, because it might raise hopes which may be vain, and therefore for your sakes I say nothing more than that I expect you to be the happiest and the luckiest couple in all the county."

"We mean to try our best," she said, wondering what he could mean by this vague announcement.

"No doubt of it, and I shall be always proud to think that in my private life, as in my public actions,

I have proved myself indifferent to and incapable of class prejudices."

That was another grand utterance which she did not understand, but she supposed it meant something very kind, and so she thanked him again.

"Your father I have long respected," he went on, "yourself I have long esteemed—long before I had any suspicion that there was likely to be an alliance of our families" (if it had been a royal marriage he could not have spoken of it more grandly)—"and now that I see you, simple, gentle, and beautiful, I cannot doubt that my son's happiness will be safe in your keeping."

"I hope so, sir." (She began to feel dazed and bewildered by this flow of words.)

"I trust you will soon learn to look upon me as your second father, whose affection, although it cannot be greater, is certainly not less profound than that of my good friend, Captain Thorston."

He called him "Captain" as if by some prerogative he conferred a special dignity upon Dan, which at once elevated him and displayed the magnanimity of the Laird.

Ailie was ready to lay down her life for him—he was "that grand and yet that free." Teenie was unable to reply, she was so overwhelmed by his kindness. Dan was silent and quite calm: he was utterly unappreciative, for in his eyes Teenie was all the world. If the Queen's son had come seeking her he would not have thought there was much out of the way in the proposal—when the object was his lass, who could manage a boat as well as the best fisher of Rowanden—aye, and manage the nets too, as well as make them.

He had just a confused notion that the Laird meant to be friendly, and to wish them well.

But when Dalmahoy again referred to the good news with which he intended to surprise them, and to the great fortune which might fall into Teenie's lap, he was puzzled, for he could not conceive how or whence any special fortune could come to them. The Laird playfully insisted upon his right to surprise them, and, kissing Teenie again without permitting her to object, he took his leave—charmed, as he said, with his new daughter, and the prospect of his son.

Walter, in feverish anxiety to learn the result of the interview, and forbidden the house during it, by his father, was in the road waiting for somebody to appear with intelligence as to the progress of affairs.

He advanced to the side of his father's horse, with the eager question—

"Well—are you satisfied?"

"Delighted, Walter, delighted—she is a splendid creature, and I admire your taste more than ever," cried the Laird, making his horse walk so that Walter might keep pace with him.

"You see, sir, she is not one of the fashionable kind of girls; she's not a woman of any particular talent—unless it be fishing," he added laughing.

"Toots, man! I abhor your women of talent—did you ever see a modest one? I know that you will appreciate my sentiment when I say that I have a ridiculous fancy for old-fashioned virtues; I much prefer commonplace and modesty to genius and indelicacy. Of course I do not mean to deny the pleasures of a talented woman's society—it is charming for an hour or so. It is like drinking champagne; but you can't keep on drinking champagne without paying the penalty of a headache. A woman of talent who was modest and loved her home would be a goddess—but we mustn't look for goddesses off the stage."

"I can't tell you how glad I am that you are satisfied with her," said Walter, thrilling all over with joy.

"Satisfied!—I am charmed—delighted, I tell you; and by my faith you may be thankful that time is on your side, or I would have tried to cut you out even now."

Walter laughed, and hastened back to the cottage.

The Laird nodded, touched his horse, and galloped home, all a-glow with admiration of Teenie.

He found several letters awaiting him, and amongst them another from the lawyers in Edinburgh, which he opened with eagerness.

He seated himself in the big chair, before beginning to read, and leaned back with the air of a man who wishes to enjoy good news to the uttermost.

But, as his eyes glanced over the contents of the letter, he suddenly bent forward with a startled expression. He took off his glasses (the letter lying on his knees) and polished them with the silk handkerchief; put them on again, and steadied himself like a man who braces himself up to some unexpected and disagreeable encounter.

He read the letter again:—

"GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH.

"SIR,—We hasten to inform you that there seems to have been some error about the heirship of the Methven estate."

"Then who the devil perpetrated the error but yourselves?" muttered the Laird.

"According to our information the heir was one Christina Thorston, daughter of the sister of the late George Methven's mother; but from information just received we are induced to believe that the said Christina Thorston's mother was not the sister of Methven's mother. If this information should prove to be correct, the Christina Thorston referred to in our former letter is not the heir to the Methven estate."

"Then why did you say so?" growled the Laird.

"We trust this may not have caused you any inconvenience, and can only express our regret that the information first received—which seemed to bear all the impress of truth—should have betrayed us into this error. We must beg of you to suspend any decision you may be inclined to come to on the subject, until the result of further inquiries is known."

"We are, Sir, etc.,

"PATTERSON & GREIG, W.S."

CHAPTER THE TWELFTH.
GOOD ADVICE.

DALMAHOY meditated, a blank look on his face, chin buried in his chest, and the letter dangling over his knee.

The result of his meditation was the honest admission—

"What a confounded fool I have been!"

The sweet visions of an unencumbered estate, of boundless financial resources which would have enabled him to develop the universal wealth of his land, and to prosecute successfully various other speculations—certain to return millions, if only "capital" were forthcoming to work them—all melted into thin air, and he had committed himself to the union of his son with old Thorston's daughter!—no longer Captain Thorston.

If he had been only a little more frank, Thorston might have set him right at once. If only his good-nature had not betrayed him—as it so often did—into the desire to give them a pleasant surprise; if only he had not been tempted by the wish to appear before them all one fine morning in the character of a noble benefactor conferring untold wealth upon the humble child of his adoption—he had rehearsed the scene repeatedly in imagination—and receiving their amazed and grateful thanks, he might have avoided this scrape. Of course it was ridiculous to think of his son marrying a girl of Teenie's position without some much stronger inducement than a mere fancy. But then he had given his consent, unconditionally and in the most formal fashion.

He summoned Peter Drysdale. The man had been, with only one brief interval, all his life in the service of Dalmahoy. The interval occurred when, tempted by the natural beauty of Canada, and the opportunity it offered to the poorest for making a fortune, as represented by a panorama exhibited in the village, he took his eldest son and made for the land of promise. On his arrival he saw a dismal uncultivated waste, and found that life was as hard, and in some respects not quite so comfortable, there as at home. He was filled with despair as he looked at the land which had been allotted to him.

"Eh, man, Jock," he groaned to his son, "this is no the panoramy!"

He hastened back to the old country, and was permitted to resume his former position at Dalmahoy. His son remained in Canada and prospered, so that Drysdale was sometimes disposed to lament his hasty return. He was one of those men who are doomed always to see the tide of fortune behind them.

When the door had been closed, the Laird spoke as if inspired by some trivial curiosity.

"You remember the woman Methven?"

"Fine; she was the mother of the lass that——"

"Just so, I know all that," interrupted Dalmahoy;

"but she had a second daughter, much younger than the one you allude to—do you remember her?"

"Mistress Methven had half a dozen daughters, at least—some of them living yet, and as decent women as you could find," answered Drysdale in his melancholy tone. "What was the name of the one you mean?"

"I don't know—but she married Thorston."

"Oh—her? She wasna a Methven ava, but just a neighbour's lass that the wife Methven got to take care of—that is, if you mean Jeanie Kerr, who was Skipper Thorston's guidwife."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Perfect sure—everybody ken'd it, though she was married out of the auld wife Methven's house."

There! if he had only taken the least trouble to investigate details, he would not have required to cross his own doorstep in order to discover the real position of affairs. But the Laird never could attend to trifles; his mind was far too much engaged with grand results to bother about details; and somehow these confounded details were always interfering with the most brilliant calculations of his fertile brain.

There could be no longer any doubt about it—the lawyers had blundered, and he had blundered in the most reprehensible way, because the most ridiculous, seeing that the information necessary to set him right had been all the time within hand's reach.

He dismissed Drysdale, and then he heartily cursed his own stupidity and his own blindness. Why had he not looked into the matter a little more closely? Why had Walter come to him just at the moment when he was most ready to believe what he wished to believe was the case? Confound them all! they had led him into a pretty mess, and he could not see any satisfactory way out of it, with all his experience of political manœuvring.

Enter Walter, face flushed and eyes bright with pleasure. He had been walking at a great pace, keeping time with the merry whirl of his thoughts.

"We have settled it," he said briskly.

"Settled what, sir?"

"The day of the marriage—there's no use putting off time, so we have fixed this day month. By that time we can have the cottage at Drumlicmount quite ready, and I shall begin work at once. We are to have everything as quiet as possible, and we go straight to our own home. Of course the marriage will take place at the Norlan' Head."

"Of course her marriage should, under the patronage of the fisher colony, and with a savoury smell of fine fresh herring prevailing."

Walter stared at his father, who sat looking at him over his glasses. The tone and the manner were so peculiar, and were so different from those he had used in the morning. Walter gave a short uneasy laugh.

"I like fresh herring," he said lightly; "and I am glad you do not wish to have the marriage here, for Thorston would never have consented to that. He would have taken the proposal as a kind of insult, and it would have displayed a prejudice—"

"Displayed a fiddlestick," interrupted the Laird restlessly, for he had not yet made up his mind how to declare his changed purpose.

He got up, crossed the room two or three times, then he halted, and, in his best Parliamentary style, addressed his son—playing with his glasses all the while.

"Prejudice is a characteristic of weak minds; I have none. I am practical; consequently I am occasionally disagreeable. Every man who is worth his salt is occasionally disagreeable. Every man who has any right to claim individuality of character, finds it occasionally necessary to change his opinions and views of things political and things social. I find it necessary to change my views."

"In regard to what, sir?" asked Walter, a good deal bewildered by his father's grandiloquence, and quite unsuspecting of the end towards which he was driving.

But that brought him to the point too abruptly. The Laird disliked to give pain, because the sufferer bothered him.

"You are too fast, Walter—you leap to conclusions without arguing them out thoroughly; and unfortunately you act upon these rash conclusions, thereby causing yourself and others a great deal of useless trouble."

"I really cannot discover what you refer to, sir. Have I been bungling in anything lately?"

"Indeed you have been bungling, and I am sorry to say" (with beautifully expressed mild self-condemnation) "so have I."

"That's vexatious; but what is it—money?"

"No—and yet, indirectly, yes," proceeded the Laird, feeling that he had got the sympathy of his son with him so far. "Now I wish to place this matter before you in such a plain way that it may appeal directly to your own common-sense."

"Thank you." (He knew that it was something very disagreeable which the Laird's individualism compelled him to utter.)

"You know, Walter, that I never do anything without a clearly defined motive. Well, when I consented to your marriage with Christina Thorston, I had a motive."

"You wished to make us happy," said Walter, with a startled smile.

"Exactly, but not quite in the way you are thinking. What is it the poet says?—"Love feeds the soul"—that's not right, but it is something to that effect; and that is the way you are thinking of happiness. I am practical: I say love is beautiful, love adds vastly to our enjoyment of life; but I also say love requires a leg of mutton to stand on."

The Laird chuckled at his own joke. Walter's face began to darken, but he remained respectfully silent.

"You are young; you are in love; you are enthusiastic: therefore you are incapable of judging for yourself at present in things practical. I am—well, we won't say old, but considerably your senior; I am experienced; I am a politician: therefore I am the proper person to direct your present course, so that hereafter you may be grateful to me and thankful on your own account."

"I shall be pleased to have your advice, sir," said Walter, his lips closing tightly.

"And I hope you will also be pleased to follow it. You have chosen a career—against my advice, remember—in which the worldly emoluments are small, very small. You may be useful—I will go as far as to say that I believe you would be useful even without a penny of your own—but your power of usefulness would be incalculably increased if you had independent means."

"Father, I cannot look upon the work in that way."

"You must allow me to look upon it in that way, however, and to advise—if necessary to command you. When I consented to this marriage I believed Christina Thorston to be the heiress to the Methven estate—that was the surprise I told you was in store."

"And now you have found that she is not the heiress?" (very coldly and deliberately).

"Yes, and therefore I say to you this affair must proceed no further. You are not to marry Christina Thorston."

END OF CHAPTER THE TWELFTH

JULIET'S TOMB.

ARRIVED at Verona late one evening in the month of August, 1868, after a long though interesting ride from Florence. The air was close and sultry, so close that I smiled at the words which would exactly describe my situation—a cup of tea in one hand, and a napkin sudarium in the other. There was no other wayfarer in the large salle-à-manger of a very old-fashioned Italian inn. Its walls were already decorated with loyal pictures of the Re-cletto, Principe Umberto, Garibaldi, and so on. Suddenly through the early gloom burst forth over the town a grand storm of thunder. The lightning broke open the black veil of night, lit up every brick on the opposite side of the square facing my hotel, and in a thought was gone. Then again and yet again. I stepped on the balcony and watched the storm bareheaded. The few drops that straggled down seemed to gladden and refresh me after a fortnight's sojourn in hot Italy. In a short time the rain came down more fiercely, and I had to retire.

To-morrow was to be an eventful day. There was that grand arena to explore, carrying one back bodily, as it were, and not in thought merely, to the days of the Cæsars. There were the tombs of the Scaligers, with their waving iron ring-work, and the ladder whence their name. All these and many more "lions." Already I was thinking of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona," of the feuds of Montague and Capulet, and above all I meant to visit Juliet's Tomb.

Later in the evening the heavens cleared; and I wandered to a café not far from the Amphitheatre, and sat down to meditate on that eternal monument of Roman force, on smoking officers, on crowds of Italians really enjoying the mere pleasure of being alive, and—my cup of coffee, for which I paid a franc, in paper of course, and had about seventy copper centesimi, kreuzers, etc., given in exchange. The Austrian's power was gone, but some of his coins remained. After dark I went into a square and heard a very good band of music. In the morning I was awake betimes. It was raining slightly; but this rather encouraged than damped my ardour, for the sky had been three weeks cloudless, and I enjoyed the mere touch of a raindrop. My hotel was the Torre di Londra, Englished on the omnibus "London's Tower," for the benefit of—perhaps the French. Issuing then from "London's Tower" in the Piazza Dante, I was taken possession of by an Italian cicerone. Now I know no Italian—may the shade of Dante pardon me!—but somehow I managed to make out my guide. He said he knew a little German and a little French. This may have been true, but he did not prove his knowledge in my hearing. I visited first the arena, one of the most perfect amphitheatres in the world, though not so large as the Coliseum. I wandered about a long time, and quite bewildered my good Italian: all round the top (i.e., the present top, for not more than two-thirds of the rows of seats remain)—all round the arena proper, now peacefully covered with grass—all round inside, besides in and out, in all conceivable directions. Here the wild beasts were kept, there the bodies of fallen gladiators were dragged off with a flesh-hook; here water ran to cleanse away the blood; there above and all round, in a huge elliptical sea or ocean of faces, sat the Romans, matres et filiae, toga'd senators and scarred warriors.

See! that conquered Dacian gladiator appeals to the assembled fifty thousand to signify whether he has lost blood enough, and whether he may be restored to his wife and children far away on the Danubius. Are the thumbs up or down?

But am I alive before the Christian era, or in the boasted nineteenth century? Behold, by Jupiter, O ye Roman ghosts, there is a dirty Italian stacking hay under one of your eternal arches, and another hammering a horse-shoe on a stithy!

After seeing the porter, who looked anything but a Roman—and he sold poor photographs—we went through the Piazza Dante to see the tomb of the Scaligers—the famous "Skalijeree" of the fourteenth century, as my guide called them. I find that the Escalus, Prince of Verona, in "Romeo and Juliet," is said to have been, or mayhap certainly was, Bartolomæo della Scala (A.D. 1303). Anyhow, the tombs are grand; the movable iron net-work around, with the "La Scala," the arms of the family, "entwined" (as the papers say of the Rose, Shamrock, and Thistle), is grander; and the whole surrounding very interesting, from an historical, an antiquarian, and many other points of view—if you could see them, for the tombs are in a small square almost as hard to find as Piccadilly Square, if you did not happen to know where to look. My guide told me all about it, and all about the palazzi round the Piazza Dante—perhaps in "very choice Italian," but I did not understand much of it. In any case I understood as much as the servant whom Capulet sent out through fair Verona to —"find those persons out

Whose names are written there, and to them say,
My house and welcome on their pleasure stay."

Says the servant—

"Find them out whose names are written here! It is written that the shoemaker should meddle with his yard and the tailor with his last, the fisher with his pencil and the painter with his nets, but I am sent to find those persons whose names are here writ, and can never find what names the writing person hath here writ. I must to the learned."

"In good time" enter Benvolio and Romeo, and as Romeo can read anything he sees as well as, or better than, his own fortune in his misery, he reads the list of the fair assembly that is to be.

After this we went to some gardens, from which I was to see in the distance not only the whole city, but much of flat Lombardy, with Custoza and many more places interesting or tragic in modern Italian story. I enjoyed the sight much. On referring to my Baedeker I find the gardens are called Giardino Giuste. They contain some magnificent old cypresses, said to be from four to five hundred years old.

At one o'clock I put up for a rest and a lunch, passing, on my way to the guide's favourite café, a church dedicated to St. Thomas, "the holie blissful martyr" of Canterbury.

Duly rested, I sallied forth to visit the Tomba di Giulietta. My guide did not care to go. He had no romantic notions on the subject. He said all the Inglese had a rage for this tomb, and it was only a coarse old stone trough, which he did not believe, etc. etc. At least, I thought he said something of that sort. At last, after a good deal of pro and con, he consented to humour me in what he considered a sort of harmless English mania.

He had shown me before Juliet's house, very high and not very grand, with a little cap, the family crest, on a small stone shield over the court entrance. It is now an inn, like Sir Thomas More's house of persecuting fame in Chelsea was, for the new Embankment has swept it away. The street was formerly "Capuletti," but it is now under the protection of St. Sebastian.

At length we came to a pair of broad doors, that prevented our further progress up a narrow lane. But there was a long bell-handle outside, at which my Italian tugged; and the sound produced a small boy, who opened part of the door, with an inquiring face, which inquiry I suppose was satisfactorily answered, for we crossed the bar into a low shed, a carpenter's shop, the floor of which was covered after the usual manner. Leaving this we entered a large garden, with beautifully laden vines trellised over the path. Juliet's garden! A real garden, with real vines, real grapes, real flowers, real fruit above the earth and in it, real rain too falling, and not such a garden as one sees on the stage. And yet the stage garden has one advantage, for it possesses a real Juliet.

And the window away there to the right—did Juliet look out there, or show a light there, after the manner of the young lady in "A Blot in the Scutcheon," when she was waiting for Romeo? And this high wall to the left—did Romeo scale this? Not that it is too high for a lover to scale.

Such thoughts as these and others like crossed my mind. In fact, I was in a high state of reverie somewhere in cloud-cuckoo-land, but came down to earth all too rapidly when my umbrella would catch against the overhanging trellis-work on which the vine was supported.

I enjoyed the visit; but as humanity—notably English humanity—is not wholly free from weather influences, I could not get up much romantic ardour.

I saw "fair Melrose" once, but not "aright." Another time the moon would not come through the right window at Tintern. It was as foggy as London in that real yellow November celebrated in "Bleak House," when I was on Snowdon; and on the Titlis; and the sun would not rise on the Schafberg, the Rigi of the Tyrol. Such experiences have taught me to make the most of what I can get, although I do not believe as a rule that myself or anybody else ever learns from experience.

Meditation among the tombs of the mighty dead was clearly out of place. One couldn't "shed a tear" very well; the heavens were doing that too plentifully; and one's poetic or imaginative flights, or even one's wishes, that one's own Juliet were by one's side, were pretty sure to be disagreeably put to flight by an envious raindrop finding its globular and chilly way just inside one's collar.

On the whole an umbrella is not romantic. Fancy Romeo and Juliet under an umbrella which wouldn't cover either of them! Cannot you see the stream from the tips making sad work with Juliet's dress? Then an umbrella under a vine-walk! Oh, Bacchus!

But at last by careful dodging I arrived at "the end proposed." A low shed—tool-shed—broken walls—roof off. Bah! Juliet's Tomb here! 'Twere profanation to think so base a thought.

"Ecco!" said my conductor, with a wettish smile, and pointed to a long stone trough, exactly like the baths of Roman times one sees in the galleries of the Uffizi—place for the head even. It contained half an inch of dirty water; and I stood there, looking at it, with my umbrella dripping into it.

My poor Italian stood with both garments and boots exhibiting many solutions of continuity, smiling wetly, as I said, and saying "Ecco, Signor." I could see that my folly amused him; but he was glad of it, nevertheless, for there were certain paper francs to come, on account of it, towards the polenta for a wife and four children all but starving at home. Fancy Friar Laurence, and Juliet, and nurse, and County Paris here! But no—no. "Do you—does the Signor believe it?" was nearly the question; and my answer was that which any of my young readers, if I have any, would most likely have made under the circumstances.

Poor Juliet! Didst lie there with bloody Tybalt and the bones of thy great ancestors? Did that fond, foolish, loving, cruel father and mother of thine—that wordy, deaf-on-one-ear old nurse—that paste-board County—that hearty friar, who reminds one very much of Goldsmith's "Hermit of the Dale"—and all the mourning coaches of Verona follow thee hither? Here didst thou sleep off that potent two-and-forty hours' draught? Did Peter and Simon Cutling, and Hugh Rebeck, and James Soundpost try quips here? Was all that fighting and tragedy work done here?—

"Here lies the County Paris slain;
And Romeo dead; and Juliet, dead before,
Warm and new kill'd."

Nay. And again, no!

I walked from this scene thinking much. The small boy looked wondering why I should give him certain small coins for a look at a stone box. The guide hurried me off to another church (we had seen several before) and my visit was ended. But I should like to go again on a fine day, and not accompanied by a guide only.

JNO. P. FANNTHORPE.

THE WHITE DEER.

"HE SEEKS THE DEER OF THE FOREST."

'HE hunter leaps from slumber,
And quits his cottage door ;
' Days and nights without number,
Forth he has fared before.*

Still the old quest is sorest,
The hunter's heart is cold ;
He seeks the deer of the forest
With mystical horns of gold ✓

Dim as a dream it glimmers
Through the dark forest glades,
Passes with star-light tremors,
Trances the sight, and fades.

By the dim quiet fountain
Lies the print of its form ;
Up 'mid the cloud of the mountain
Cries its voice in the storm !

Not a bullet or arrow
Hath reached its bosom yet,
And though the ways are narrow,
It slips through noose and net.

The hunter's cheek is sickly,
Time hath silvered his hair,
His weary breath comes quickly,
He trembleth in despair.

Many a one before him
Hath been a hunter here.
Then, with the sad sky o'er him
Died in quest of the deer.

See, the day is dying !
See, the hunter is spent !
Under the dark trees lying,
Perishing ill-content.

Ev'n as his sad eyes darken,
Stir the boughs of the glade ;
He gathers his strength to hearken,
Peering into the shade ;

And lo ! with a soft light streaming,
Stainless and dimly bright,

Stands with its great eyes gleaming
The mystical deer, snow-white !

Closer it comes upcreeping,
With burning, beautiful eyes—
Then, as he falls back sleeping,
Touches his lips, and flies !

II.

The live foot ever fleeing,
It comes to the dying and dead
Oh, hope in the darkness of being,
Methinks I hear thy tread.

Around, above me, and under,
God's forest is closing dim ;
I chase the mystical wonder,
Footsore and weary of limb.

Down in the dim recesses,
Up on the heights untrod,
Eluding our dreams and guesses,
Slips the secret of God.

Only seen by the dying,
In the last spectral pain,
Just as the breath is flying—
Flashing, and fading again.

White mystery, might I view thee !
Bright wonder, might we meet !
Ever as I pursue thee
I see the print of thy feet ;

Ever those feet are roaming,
Ever we follow in quest :
While thou hauntest the gloaming,
Never a Soul shall rest !

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.--THE QUEEN'S INCOME.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART THE SECOND

AND now, having stated the arrangements adopted in the present day for the support of the Crown, we wish to point out very briefly how the system came into operation. Our inquiry involves, in substance, the investigation of the whole of the causes which, in the course of time, have led to the development of Constitutional Monarchy in this country ; but a few of the more salient features of the subject must suffice for our present purpose.

At the Conquest, the Land Revenues of the Conqueror amply sufficed for all the expenses of government. William the First held 1,422 manors, besides lands and farms in several counties, and the revenue from the forests where the Royal Hunt was maintained by a system of cruelty and exaction, the severity of which cannot be exaggerated. His annual income, if old chroniclers may be believed, was equal to nearly a million and a quarter of our money ; and his wealth was constantly being extended by the profitable prerogatives of the feudal system.

Now the history of the Crown Lands is briefly this—a history of prodigal waste on the part of the monarch, and of constant intervention on the part of Parliament. Of course, the disposition of the Sovereign would, in this as in other matters, exhibit itself, and a frugal monarch would, now and then, attempt something like control over his estates. Moreover, great political complications such as the Wars of the Roses, or national occurrences of cardinal importance, such as the Seizure of the Monasteries, would at times transfer to the monarch estates of enormous value. The annual income of the religious houses suppressed by Henry the Eighth amounted to more than a quarter of a million.

But the extravagance of the majority of our kings far more than balanced the thrift of one or two, and even dissipated the majestic additions to their revenue which resulted from such special events as those we have mentioned. Prodigious grants to favourites and mistresses; sales under ruinous conditions when money was sorely needed for foreign war, or when public discontent precluded an increase of taxation; complete mismanagement in administration; these were the characteristics of the Royal Property from the Conquest to the Revolution. On the other hand, Parliament viewed with profound distrust the conduct of the Crown. The House of Commons, and the nation too, had no liking for a king who was always squandering his patrimony and then begging for money. They held it impious to alienate the old estates of the Crown. Year after year, the Legislature passed what were called Acts of Resumption, by which the Crown was compelled to take back its landed property.

But these efforts were fruitless. When the Revolution had been consummated, and Parliament proceeded to settle the question of the support of the Throne, it was found that so little would the king be able to rely on the income derived from his landed estate, that special provision must be made out of the taxation of the country. This special provision was called the Civil List, and its amount was fixed at £600,000 a year.

Now be it observed this sum included the whole public expenditure, except that necessary for the support of the army and the progress of the war with France. All charges for Civil Government, of whatever kind, were considered just as much Civil List charges as those connected with the monarch's household. In fact, the distinction made in the present day between the administration of the Government and the personal expenditure of the Crown was then unknown.

It happens that a detailed list of the charges borne on the Civil List of William the Third has been preserved in the Record Office. It bears date 10th August, 1699, and is valuable because of the information it affords as to the rate of salaries payable at the time, as well as the nature of the expenditure generally. Its main divisions are the Personal Expenditure of the monarch; the Charge for Foreign Ministers; the Fees and Salaries, under which head is included nearly all the cost of the Civil Administration; the Pensions and Perpetuities; the Privy Purse, and Miscellaneous Expenditure. The Privy Purse is stated at £40,000. The Personal Expenses are sub-divided with considerable minuteness. Then the Household Expenses are estimated at £100,000; the cost of the Royal Wardrobe at £24,000; the maintenance of the Palaces and Gardens at Kensington, Hampton Court, and St. James's, £25,000; of the Stables, £18,000; and of the Jewels and Plate, £9,000.

It is important to note that this division of the king's household and family disbursements was no mere calculation entered into for the purpose of arriving at the total required. Much more than this was involved. Parliament, in thus appropriating the Civil List, desired to uphold the principle that the outward and visible pageantry of the monarch must not be impaired. Just as in the management of the Crown Lands it was necessary to interpose even sternly, and prevent the king from impoverishing himself, and so presenting to the eyes of his subjects the spectacle of a lack-land Sovereign: so, now, the king was expected to maintain an establishment adequate to the dignity of the nation. Hence a distribution of expenditure between household, wardrobe, stables, and jewellery, which seems at first sight puerile and frivolous. To this point, however, we shall have occasion to recur hereafter.

The charge for Foreign Ministers is small, and not devoid of interest; £40,000 is stated as an adequate provision for fifteen ambassadors, envoys, and consuls, in days when the nation found it necessary to have representatives at no place out of Europe save Algiers and Tripoli, nor in Europe at the courts of Russia, Turkey, Germany, and Holland. Now-a-days, when English commerce and English colonisation have planted a consul at almost every port, and necessitated diplomatic relations with every power, this £40,000 has swelled to more than half a million, for the regular consular establishment, to say nothing of special missions and outfits.

Turning to the list of salaries, which includes all sorts of officials from the Lord Chancellor to the Master Plasterer and Master Bricklayer, we observe that the twelve judges received £1,000 each; the Secretaries of State, £1,950; the Lord President of the Council, £1,500; the Lord Chancellor, £4,000. Some names occur familiar to every reader of English history. Dr. Bentley, as Library-keeper at St. James's, has £200; Mr. Rymer, the editor of the "Fœdera," is Historiographer Royal, with £200; Mr. Tate, Poet Laureate, with £100. The total for salaries is only about £80,000, a sum curiously small, even when allowance is made for the fact that many of the great officers of State were remunerated by fees.

But if the cost of the Civil Administration was small, the charge for Pensions and Perpetuities was anything but slight. As the historical student peruses the long list of pensioners, he feels no surprise that the Pension List should have been for years the bugbear of financial reformers. The extent and character of the pensions he confers will form no bad test of the character of the monarch who confers them. The Civil List of William the Third bears indelible traces of the licence and extravagance of his predecessors, and especially of the king "who never said a foolish thing, and never did a wise one." The annual grants varying from £1,000 to £4,000 a year bestowed on the Dukes of St. Albans, Grafton, Southampton, and Richmond, and of £4,700 to the Duchess of Cleveland, point unmistakeably to Charles the Second. The same observation applies to the £500 a year paid to Thomas Lane for services in Charles's escape. Indeed, so prodigal had this monarch been in burdening the Civil List with grants to his favourites, that the claims of his gentlemen, grooms, pages, etc., are emphatically described as "scarce to be computed."

Of other items on William's Pension we notice that consummate scoundrel Dr. Titus Oates as the recipient of an annual sum of £300 for life of himself and son; grants to the University of Cambridge of £13 6s. 8d. for a divinity lecturer, and £40 for a physic reader; besides small benefactions to the poor of several of the London parishes. On the whole, out of a Civil List of £660,000, over £200,000 is expended for pensions and bounty, or about two and a half times as much as the cost for salaries for the Civil Administration. And this, be it remembered, was the state of things under William the Third, a monarch whose natural thrift, united with the minute and often vexatious Parliamentary criticism to which he was always exposed, forbade to some extent reckless expenditure.

We repeat that the Civil List of William the Third contained all the expenditure necessary for the government of the country, the charge of the National Debt and of the Army and Navy being defrayed out of other funds. The Civil Lists of George the First and George the Second, arranged on the same footing, amounted to rather more than £800,000 a year. These monarchs, of course, received the revenues arising from the Crown Lands. But when George the Third came to the throne the mismanagement of these lands had become such a scandal, that reform could no longer be delayed. Accordingly, the king agreed to surrender them to the country; in other words, the proceeds arising therefrom were henceforth part of the revenues of the nation, and saved taxation to that amount. This example has always been followed by subsequent Sovereigns. It will, of course, be understood that each monarch resigns his landed estate for his own reign, in return for the Civil List granted by the nation. On his death, the Crown Lands vest in his successor, who on his accession makes a new surrender. Thus the position occupied by the public is simply that of a life-tenant.

There cannot, we fancy, be any question as to the wisdom of the arrangement by which the Crown Lands are managed by the nation. The policy of that plan is justified by the results. Since these lands have been administered by a public department, the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, the profits arising therefrom have steadily increased, and amount now to £375,000 a year. Indeed the nature of these estates is such as to render them eminently unsuited for management by the Crown itself. There are forests and woodlands, such as Wychwood and Whittlewood, with hereditary rangers, who seem not to have considered their Sovereign in the discharge of their duties. When the Royal Warrants for the supply of venison for the royal table were issued, the ranger killed the deer, and took his twenty-six shillings for each buck slaughtered. But the timber, which is the main element of profit in a forest, seems to have been neglected. Then there are manors and houses dispersed over nearly all the counties of England, and a multitudinous array of fee-farm-rents, varying from shillings to many pounds each, the remnants of old feudal tenures. Such an estate needs a frugal and careful supervision hardly in keeping with the generous magnificence of royalty. Thrifty and provident administration by a king is apt to expose him to the charge of penuriousness. Economy is not commonly considered to be a royal virtue.

The surrender of the Crown Lands by George the Third was the first of the reforms of the Civil List; and it was quickly followed by others. No sooner, indeed, had the Civil List been settled, than it proved inadequate to the ever-growing demands of the Civil expenditure. Grants had frequently to be made to pay off Civil List debts. Then came times of great distress, the National Debt increased, the "Letters of Junius," old nominis umbra, fanned the flame of public discontent; and at length, in 1780, Burke, in a speech remarkable alike for its majestic diction and its massing of facts, introduced his proposals for a reform of Civil List expenditure. He showed how the old idea of a monarch's household, based on the feudal system, was inapplicable to modern times. Thus it came to pass that the Court was so managed that "the people saw nothing but the operations of parsimony attended by the consequences of profusion." The expenses of the king were enormous, yet he lived in a stinted and meagre fashion. The throne was surrounded by sinecurists. The very turnspit was a member of Parliament, and received a handsome salary, while the actual work was performed by an underpaid drudge. The royal palaces, with bleak winds howling through the vast halls, with chill and comfortless chambers, served only to remind of an effete magnificence, and offered neither grace nor comfort. Burke's proposals certainly went to the root of the matter. Many of them, such as the arrangement of the Civil List expenditure into classes, the abolition of a vast number of sinecures, and the maintenance of a vigorous control over the disbursements generally, were undoubtedly good; others, as the sale of all the Crown Lands, were too drastic to be attempted;

while others again, as the whimsical suggestion that the supply of the royal table should be contracted for, clearly involved principles derogatory to the dignity of the Crown.

END OF PART THE SECOND.

MEN WHO FACE DEATH.

THE DOCTOR.

DON'T know that members of the medical profession have the reputation of being cynical brutes. On the contrary, it is quite common to hear them spoken of in society as jolly fellows. They frequently exhibit a certain reserve when they are called upon to speak, not as companions, but as practitioners, and this is often attributed to the etiquette demanded of them by the necessity for keeping up professional mystery. If they were to speak quite openly and plainly, and to write their prescriptions in English, or tell a patient to go and buy two-pennyworth of something, make it into tea, and drink a wine-glassful three times a day, nobody would believe in them; and everybody would find out what a very simple thing the science of medicine is after all.

This is how ordinary people talk about doctors while they are pretty well in health; and it is just this kind of half-truth, which is worse than a whole falsehood, that produces the reticence complained of. The reserve, or the professional mannerism, that is so constantly resented and so frequently derided, is a protest against ignorance and injustice, and is necessary to protect people against their own self-conceit. While patients persist in regarding the remedy as more important than the knowledge which directs its use, it is actually dangerous for a doctor to trust them to take physic except in the form of so many table-spoonfuls from "the mixture as before." In the present condition of popular intelligence, it might be profitable for doctors to leave people to dose themselves occasionally. Just as the shrewd attorney proposed as a legal toast, "Here's to the man who makes his own will," the general practitioner at a medical soirée might (ironically) propose the health of the patient who tries to be his own doctor.

The truth is that "medical men" might very well be excused for thinking a little bitterly of the manner in which they are too frequently regarded by a very large section of the community. Even in this boasted age of enlightenment they are the victims of a remnant of barbarous superstition, under the influence of which otherwise intelligent people treat them as though they were the medicine-men of a tribe of savages, not only curing but bringing diseases, or even promoting ailments which they afterwards remove by some kind of incantation and the use of charms or fetishes. Nothing can equal the sarcastic expressions of people in reference to doctors, except it be the abject recantations of the same people when they are taken ill and fail to cure themselves with a couple of pills or a dose of salts and senna. On every hand the poor medico is condemned to hear himself spoken of obliquely as though he went about the world inducing people to ruin their constitutions, that he might keep them on his books for the remainder of their feeble lives.

Even in neighbourhoods where advice gratis or a dispensary letter is the common form of medical practice, the shoemaker tickets the thickest-soled boots in his window as "the doctor's enemy," and the vendors of chest-protectors and flannel waistcoats will exhort the public to wear warm clothing and "defy the doctors," as though indulgence in damp feet and the disuse of woollen garments had been advocated by the faculty from time immemorial.

Do a dozen robust people ever meet together and fall into that common topic of conversation, their past, present, and probable ailments, without some of them expressing a disbelief in medicine, and narrating the experience of somebody who, after having "spent a fortune in doctors" in vain, was cured of an intolerable malady by sucking a lozenge, or eating brown bread and butter, or some other convincingly simple process, the recital of which confirms the general opinion that mankind ought to be without doctors? Yet let any one of these people, or a member of their household, begin to suffer from some unexplained disorder, and they will send post-haste for medical aid, even at midnight, and watch with eager, reproachful looks for an opinion to which they give almost the importance of a verdict.

It is this dreadful persistence with which, even the most sensible people are led, in their anxiety, to regard the doctor as the arbiter, instead of the helper, that makes the profession so arduous. No practitioner who permits his feelings to be too deeply moved, or who stays long to listen to the entreaties, or to watch the wistful imploring looks of those who wait for his coming, and almost resent the fact of his having other patients, will be able to get through the work of a day's ordinary practice. To give way to the outward expression of sympathy that may move his heart, or to encourage a half-hysterical demonstration of sentiment, may be injurious to those concerned, and may utterly unfit him for the duty to which he is called. So his directions are brief, his opinion guarded. He "will look in again in the evening," after he has seen his other cases. For all of which perhaps he is suspected of "finding himself baffled," while the general conclusion is that "doctors have no feeling."

And should he have to face Death, should all his efforts be unavailing, and the exercise of his utmost skill fail to arrest the footstep of the silent messenger, he has, in addition to the grief and the pang that must come to us all when we stand in the presence of the dead, the sense that he is likely to be regarded with unjust suspicion, and spoken of with bated breath, in words of scarcely concealed reproach.

It is not unnatural; he knows that well enough. Even in his own heart there may be painful self-questioning: Could not something more have been done? If such-and-such a remedy had been used, might it have turned the balance? Supposing some experiment had been tried? Experiment! Why, even now he is half accused of having "tried experiments," and of having neglected the good old certain paths. Heaven help him! what was he to do? He almost wishes he had never entered the profession. He has "lost a patient" in a world where it is ordained that every man and woman shall die, and where children are born and die every day. Happy for him if he be not pursued with trouble, in consequence of having been called in to several hopeless cases, and so acquiring a bad reputation because he has not been able to cure the incurable by conjuration.

The more closely we observe the tone of ordinary thought on the subject of doctors, the more we shall be convinced that we are still in a semi-barbarous condition, where the medicine-man is expected to charm away disease.

It is only with a kind of wrench to the side of reason that people are brought to acknowledge doctors to be themselves mortal. For a medical man to be long ill is a proof that he is a pretender. Should he die, there is a kind of suspicion that his demise is a disgrace to the profession, and is another proof (had any more been wanting) that the science of medicine is a delusion. That the skilled practitioner is unable to carry his own immortality in a phial or a pill-box, is at present not quite clear to the ordinary understanding; so that the dangers to which he is exposed daily are thought lightly of, not only because they come into the ordinary round of his professional duty, but because he is supposed to have in his pocket an antidote to contagion or infection, and to the results of exposure to cold and wet during long hours of mental effort, and often of enforced abstinence from food and drink.

Even in a general, or what is called a "family" practice, the doctor may be said to look Death in the face more frequently than most other men; but he has probably learnt to do so more often still during the early training by which he has risen to a recognised position in the profession. In hospitals and workhouse wards, in gaols and infirmaries, in fever-stricken ships, or asylums for the destitute or the dying, and—worst of all, perhaps—amidst the foul neighbourhoods of large towns, where the children sicken in the tainted air, and the very water holds the germs of disease; where meat means more than medicine, and the dispensary should be built against a kitchen; by beds of straw, and in rooms where fireless grates and empty cupboards mock advice gratis, and shame the words of science into a groan of sorrow—it is in these places that the doctor goes to face Death. He will go still, even though public boards and Government committees join hands to keep things as they are, in spite of Acts of Parliament and sanitary measures which exclude from their provisions any adequate recognition of those "medical officers" who are supposed to be sufficiently rewarded by the accession of dignity derived from a "public appointment," which may actually have the effect of destroying, rather than increasing, their private practice.

The brave fellows who have to face Death by sudden summons—the fireman, the lifeboat-man, the engine-driver, and others who have yet to be noticed in the public estimate of men's work—are among those who best know how to appreciate the doctor's duty, and who greet him with brightening eye and respectful gesture as he goes amidst them on his daily round to visit wife, or child, or mate; and their grateful thanks are to be reckoned among his keenest joys. In the triumphs of his profession, the increasing if slow achievements in the alleviation of suffering and the abatement of mortal diseases, he finds the true antidote to the corroding suspicion and misunderstanding that too often threaten to sour his temper and make him doubt the wisdom of his choice. As a matter of fact, the man who has gone into the profession with a true liking for the work seldom regrets his choice. Of him it may be said, "The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and a stranger intermeddleth not with its joys."

I think I used to feel this even when I was a young assistant to a country practitioner, and had to saddle the pony on a wet night and ride eight miles, to administer a couple of pills and prescribe a black draught for a farmer who had eaten too much at the market dinner. I know that I came to London with unabated enthusiasm, and had, as I fancied, an enormous capacity for hard work, when I was appointed house-surgeon to my hospital, and prepared to go through the usual course, with the addition of attending all the lectures for which I could afford to pay the fees. Doctors are not accustomed to say much about early struggles; it is another peculiarity of the ordinary patient, that he would suspect the ability of any medical man if he knew that he had once carried out the medicine, or taken down the surgery shutters, or sold penn'orths of antibilious pills behind a chemist's counter. I shall not, therefore, say much about the constant work—the effort to eke out a small allowance by living on sixpences and shillings—the sense of dismay when at last the money has been scraped together to pay for “a small practice capable of considerable extension,” and the new aspirant discovers that, like Mr. Bob Sawyer's business at Bristol, it is “so snug that you might put it into a wine-glass and cover it over with a gooseberry leaf.”

I have reason to be thankful that I was of a rather imperturbable temper, and that I meant to make a fight for a position. There was only one plan open to me in the district I had chosen, and that was to cultivate a dispensing practice amongst the poor. Need I say that the parish soon had its eye on me? I mean the guardians of the poor—the workhouse authorities, who marked me at once as a struggling practitioner who could naturally be bought at a very cheap rate.

The appointment of parish doctor was vacant and I obtained it. I became one of four hundred medical men, holding similar appointments to about six hundred and seventy unions in England and Wales, and who attended the inmates of their unions at an average rate, taking them all round, of fivepence-halfpenny a case; though in my instance the pay was less by a great deal—for ours was a large metropolitan workhouse, and the number of patients reduced the sum per case to about threepence-halfpenny; while the doctor was expected to exhibit a subserviency to the board, to the master, and to the relieving officer, which would probably have been considered humble if it had been displayed in a similar degree by the hall-porter. Could I order meat or wine at discretion? Certainly, in theory I could—just as I could report on inefficient drainage, or foul water supply, or contravention of sanitary Acts of Parliament—but as the sole object of guardians was to keep down the rates, and I was expected to earn my salary by keeping a badly ventilated infirmary empty of patients through the use of common drugs, poor in quality, and supplied by contract, I had a hard time of it, and longed to be able to leave the coveted position to a successor.

If the parish doctor does not face Death, I cannot tell who can claim the terrible experience; and that duty continues even after he has resigned his public position; for his practice still lies amongst the poor, and maternity charity, dispensary, or hospital, probably all these claim him for their own. If he be a true man, he is willing that it should be so. He has learnt that he cannot turn from the plough on which he lays his hand; but he seeks sympathy, and the tacit acknowledgment of his work. Night after night when the bell jangles close to his ear, and summons him to dress speedily, and go out into the dim drizzle or the dread cold and darkness that settles down upon the threshold of the coming day, he knows that there is no more sleep for him that night—as well as he knows that there will be but a three-and-sixpenny fee for medicines, or perhaps that it will be a parish case after all. He may be wearied, or himself be suffering from pains and sickness; but should he refuse to go, or refer the applicant to another practitioner, his name would be mentioned with execration, and perhaps the most inveterate of his accusers would be a well-to-do tradesman who had come to him as a gratis patient, and been offended at being charged for a bottle of medicine.

Every surgeon of a hospital knows too well to what inconceivable meanness people will stoop to obtain medical advice for nothing. There might be some excuse in the prevalent opinion that the most eminent men are selected to see patients at special and other institutions; but the same practitioners can be consulted at their own homes—and, as a matter of fact, the well-to-do impostors who obtain gratuitous relief are not grateful enough even to send a donation to the institution. Shall I ever forget meeting, at an assembly at the Mansion House, the wife and daughters of an alderman, who had come to me disguised in shabby apparel to seek advice, at a hospital where I had recently been appointed surgeon!

That was later in my professional life, of course, and after I had given up parish practice; but I had looked Death in the face very often in that poor district where I settled down, and at length extended the practice that had absorbed all my savings, and a small patrimony besides, before I ceased to wonder how I should be able to hold on. There was serious work to do there, for when the epidemic broke out whole streets were smitten, and the courts and alleys became centres of pestilence that had to be cleansed and purified, if only we could stir the unwieldy authorities to action.

Again it was the lack of wholesome meat and drink that kept us looking Death in the face, and but for the funds of a few charitable people, and the efforts of those who came to the rescue, and stood by the doctor to stare down Death with hopeful eyes, nobody can tell when the plague would have been stayed. For some time I had found out, that other visits, than mine had comforted the poor creatures in those wretched homes. Broth and wine and simple food began to be distributed, and I sometimes heard a woman's footstep on the creaking stairs. We met at last, and joined hands to the work. All the poor people knew her, and some of them turned their smiles to share them with me, when we met at their bedsides—which happened seldom, for she had duties to do at home, where her brother the curate lived, a widower with two little children. They could afford to give little, but they knew how to make the alms of others multiply into wholesome food and warm clothing; and brother and sister, but lately coming to the parish, brought with them as it were the inheritance of the widow's cruse that Elijah had blessed, and preached a living gospel. The sick-nurse and I had looked Death in the face together, and our hands clasped in work were not unloosed when the epidemic had disappeared. Bessie and I have children of our own now, and live in a large house, and sometimes she goes with me when I visit patients in the carriage. I am senior surgeon to the local hospital, and so see my poor patients still; and I have my gratis mornings, and Bess my wife her coal clubs and mothers' meetings, and all the rest of it. Perhaps I have less reason to grumble than many others among my professional brethren, but on their behalf, as well as my own, I do earnestly wish that we doctors could come to be regarded as earnest, striving, conscientious men, heartily anxious to do our work, and to keep up the hearts of our patients as well as to physic them, and to come amongst them as friends if they will only cease to treat us as necromancers.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE THIRTEENTH. TEMPTATION.

WALTER had been prepared for something disagreeable; but he was not prepared for the command to break off his marriage. At the words he lifted his head, quick and angry; then suddenly became calm, smiling incredulously.

"That is not a pleasant joke, sir—I thought for an instant that you were serious."

He was so quiet and so respectful that he made it appear as if such a proposal could not be anything but a jest—and a very poor one.

The Laird was hurt; he had wrought up to his climax, as he thought, so cleverly, and with such keen argument, that it seemed impossible to deny the force and necessity of his conclusion. And then to have it all treated as a bad joke!

"I am perfectly serious, Walter; I speak for the girl's sake as much as for yours; and you will offend me very much if you do not behave in this matter like a man of sense."

There came over Walter's face a dark expression—as if he had moved into a black shadow—which the father knew to be indicative of the very worst phase of his character—utter and unreasoning stubbornness.

"And a man of sense would—?"

"Would see that I have spoken out of the kindest feeling for you and for her; and he would agree with me."

"I do not doubt the kindness of your motives, father; but I am sorry that I must offend you, for I must ask you not to speak of this again. Our marriage will take place on this day month."

He wheeled about and quitted the room before Dalmahoy could recover breath to reply. He was altogether taken aback by the calm resolution of his son; he could have argued with him, and beaten him in the argument, he flattered himself. But when a man quietly declines all discussion, and gives no opportunity to bring him to reason, what can you do but leave him to his own devices?

The Laird was angry. Children, he thought, were very different from what they used to be when a parent's word was law. He had been anxious only to insure the future welfare of "that youth," and here he was treated with silent contempt for his pains. Worse, he had been made to feel that it was a sort of contemptible thing to do, to make mischief between two young folk. But he was angry, and he was resolved that his word should be respected—resolved in fact to have his own way, whatever might be the cost; and he magnified the wisdom of his own ways, in order to quench that irritating suggestion of conscience that it would be best not to interfere any further.

"But these hot-headed youths and thoughtless lassies are always fools, and they blame their friends when it is too late to mend the blunders they have made themselves. I will not give them a chance to blame me. I shall do my best to save them from this folly."

He really had no evil intention; at that moment he was not thinking of his own hopes at all; he was only speculating upon the future troubles which Walter was preparing for himself with such dour perversity.

The Laird rode over to Craighburn.

He passed by fields of ripening grain which swayed softly to the wind, and sparkled yellow and green under the sun-rays; the distant roar of the sea swept over the moorland, and the hills before him looked blue, and black, and purple under the rapidly changing touch of the afternoon light. He returned civil salutes to the hearty greetings of the farmers who passed him in their gigs or on horse-back; but his thoughts were busy with one subject, and he could not halt to discuss the game-laws, or even the law of hypothec, with any of his acquaintances, though as a rule he was ready enough to avail himself of any opportunity to express his decided opinions on the popular side of any of these questions.

He found his sister, Dame Wishart, much as usual, a prisoner to her big chair, and impatiently waiting for the time when she would be able to march out as formerly, and pay her respects to the neighbours.

"Aye, Hugh, it's a sight for sare e'en to see you," she muttered; "but if I wore breeks, and had a vote, you'd be here fast enough."

"You forget that I have no interest in votes now—I gave up Parliament twenty years ago."

"Twenty years ago!—you're raving, man; it cannot be. I mind weel enough it was just the other day you were elected; and did you no spout that speech of yours to me and the cabbages in the cauld winter morning, when the curlics, tipped with the frost, looked like a crowd of auld wivcs' heads in white mitches? Oh, I mind fine."

He made no further attempt to undeceive her as to the lapse of time; it would have been cruel to do so, the mistake afforded her so much enjoyment.

He signified to Grace that he wished to speak to her privately, and they went down-stairs together.

"I HOP I SEE YOU WEE!"

"I want to see your pansies, Grace—didn't you take the prize at the last show?"

"Yes, and I am very proud of it, for the pansies are my favourites; there is something so very subdued about them—they always make me think of sad eyes; they look up so wistfully, as if seeking for some lost hope. There, you will think me sentimental, uncle, and that would be dreadful!"

She, laughing, snatched up her garden-hat, took his arm, and they went out, followed by her dog, Pate. It was a shaggy collie, and seemed to be the most ferocious of animals, on account of the teeth of the under jaw overlapping the upper lip. For this "shot" mouth and his general ugliness he was, when a pup, condemned to be drowned; from that fate Grace rescued him, and as he grew up he showed a devotion for her alone, which suggested that he understood how much he was indebted to her. She used to say that he was the ugliest dog in the world, and the kindest and most sagacious. He did everything but speak, and he tried that sometimes when expressing thanks to his mistress.

Grace exhibited her pansies, and the Laird examined them absently; indeed, he did not show the interest in them he professed to feel. They walked to the foot of the garden, where a green bank, now studded with buttercups and daisies, kept the burn in bounds during the frequent floods of winter.

She gathered flowers for a nosegay, and, when they reached a bower covered with honeysuckle, she sat down to arrange them. Pate stretched himself at her feet, his nose resting on his paws. The Laird remained standing.

"I want your assistance, Grace."

"In what way, uncle? You know how it pleases me to do anything for you" (her dainty fingers busy selecting the flowers from her lap).

"It is with Walter."

There was just the least little start, and the fingers trembled for a second on the stem of a rose.

"What has he been doing?"

"Making a fool of himself, as usual. Now, Grace, there is nobody who has so much influence over him as you have——"

"Wrongly, uncle; my influence must give place to that of Teenie, now."

The Laird's eyes twinkled. Teenie! he had not thought of her, but she might be made the chief power in his scheme.

"But it is in regard to her that I want you to help me—I want to have this ridiculous marriage broken off at once."

Grace's head drooped over her flowers. She spoke in a low agitated voice—

"I thought you had given a full and free consent to the marriage."

"Well—yes—but—in fact, things have since come to my knowledge which have induced me to retract. For the girl's sake as well as Walter's, I think it right to prevent this affair going any further."

Her eyes were fixed steadily on the flowers. What a temptation there was offered to her! Prevent the marriage, and by-and-by—a long time hence—perhaps Walter might come back to her. And his father, who should know best, told her that it was for the girl's sake as much as Walter's. It would be right, it would be kind; and then the dreams of happiness, which she had been trying so hard to forget, might be realised—might——

She got up, scattering the unused flowers on the ground, and over Pate's ugly head—dusting the fragments off her dress with one hand, while the other held up the bouquet.

"I cannot help you in this, uncle," she said firmly; "it would be unjust to Walter and cruel to Teenie to interfere with their arrangements now."

"I thought you cared more for him than to refuse to save him from an act of folly——"

He stopped; her dark eyes were lifted to his face with such a pained look—they were like her pansies with the dew upon them.

"You know that I cannot speak to him on this subject" (voice subdued, but quite steady).

"There, there, child!" exclaimed Dalmahey hastily; "I am anxious, therefore I am stupid and selfish; but I am the more anxious now that I see—well, never mind. I shall do what I can."

"She's at the greetin' for him," muttered the Laird as he rode home, "and he's a bigger fool than I thought. But we'll see."

She felt such a queer aching in her breast that Grace wondered if she had caught cold, or if it could be rheumatism. In her quiet way she was very merry, and Pate gambolled beside her; he was always ready to sympathise with her moods, gay or sad. But he could not see that her gaiety was close kin to tears.

She was indeed glad that she had been able to resist the temptation to join the Laird in his effort to stop the marriage; but she could not help speculating upon what might happen if he should be successful. Then she felt so full of shame and vexation at her own weakness—she felt so bitter against herself that she was ready to use a scourge to her own back with vigour. She would halt, dreaming, eyes fixed on the ground, until Pate roused her by placing his cold nose on her hand. Then she would start, with a kindly word to her friend, and hasten forward.

"Habbie Gowk brought this for you, mem," said a rosy-faced housemaid, handing a letter to her mistress.

"Thank you, Mary" (taking the letter listlessly, but stirring into quick interest when she recognised the penmanship); "tell Habbie to wait."

"Yes, mem; he's in the kitchen, and his donkey's in the stable-yard, and he says he's had naething to eat or drink the day, but I think he's gey fou."

"Give him some dinner, then."

"Yes, mem."

And Mary hastened back to the house.

Grace, standing under a hawthorn-tree—bright with red berries, which, by contrast, made her bonnie face appear the paler—read the few lines Walter had written.

Frank and trustful, he was almost cruel in his utter faith in Grace. He forgot, or rather he did not know, what she was suffering. It was a hasty scrawl, telling her that his father had changed his mind about the marriage, and begging her to help him to satisfy the old gentleman that he was bound to redeem the pledge he had given Teenie.

"There is some wicked perversity in my nature," he wrote, "for my father's objections made me feel the more devoted to her."

He did not mention the motive which inspired his father's objection—he felt that to be a disgrace to them all.

Grace was pleased that he should appeal to her even in this matter, whilst her heart ached. How blind and stupid he must be, not to know that every word which showed his devotion to Teenie inflicted a wound upon her, by making her feel the more keenly that the love she craved for was given to another! But he trusted her; he had accepted with blind fidelity the hasty renunciation she had made. He loved her so much that he never doubted her truth. Well, she would be worthy of his trust—but how cruel they all were to come to her in this crisis!

Those wicked feelings which had tortured her of late began to rise again; but she would trample them underfoot. She would help Walter and Teenie, and in their happiness she would find her own.

Yet she felt very weak—ah, how she loved him! She had never known till now how entirely her best thoughts and hopes were concentrated in him. Would Teenie ever love him so? She dared not answer that, for she feared doing injustice to Teenie—and she was to be his wife. But she was proud now to think of the answer she had given to Dalmahoy. Aye, she would try, and try very hard, to be worthy of Walter's inconsiderate trust.

She went indoors, leaving Pate unnoticed in the hall, and he looked after her with wistful eyes, sensible that there was something wrong. He sat down and waited, his eyes fixed upon the door of the room, his teeth showing more ferociously than ever.

Grace wrote two brief letters—one to Walter, the other to Teenie. Then she went into the kitchen, followed by Pate, for he was privileged to go there. It was a bright, tidy place; dish-covers, polished to a degree, glistening on the walls; hams and comfortable sides of bacon dependent from the roof, interspersed with netfuls of onions. The kitchen despotism of the cook was unknown to these simple folk, and the mistress was as welcome in that region as in any other part of her own house.

"Where is Habbie?" she asked, looking round.

"Here, mem," answered a voice, and the owner appeared from behind a clothes-horse, wiping his mouth—which was full—with the cuff of his coat. "I hope I see you weel."

"Thanks, Habbie. I want you to take these notes for me to Mr. Walter Burnett and to Miss Thorston."

"Oo, aye, it will just be ae errand, for I'm sure to find young Dalmahoy at the Norlan' Head—he's aye there; and there's fine clashes going round the country about him and Thorston's lass. She's a braw quean, mem, and I wouldna wonder if there was some truth in what a'body says."

"I would like you to go to Dalmahoy first, though."

"Very weel, mem; it's a gowk's errand, but ony-thing to obleege you."

Grace repeated her instructions, and the man, who had by this time got his mouth emptied, professed the most implicit obedience. As if determined to show that he could be brisk in her service, he finished his cog of ale at a gulp, seized his staff and bonnet, and made for the stable-yard as fast as his lame leg would allow him to go.

He found his donkey at the water-trough, looking rather melancholy; and, inspired by the importance of his mission, he asked the ostler somewhat pompously if his "beast" had got a feed.

"He's had a pickle straw and some thrustles," said the man, laughing, and with mock respect holding out his hand as if for a fee.

"I'm obleeged to ye," said Habbie, "and I'll be owing you something at the fair."

He mounted his steed and rode out of the yard—or court, as it is called—with more importance than the Laird himself.

CHAPTER THE FOURTEENTH.

"THE POET."

HABBIE GOWK—Geikie was the name, but popular humour had transformed it into Gowk, the equivalent of a fool; and Habbie accepted the amendment without murmur—Habbie was a man of importance.

He was a stout thick-set fellow; round cheeks and pale grey eyes; thin hair and shaggy beard; a broken nose, with an emphatic turn-up at the point. Dress: a threadbare tweed shooting-coat, of speckled brown colour, with capacious pockets at either side and in the breast; the side-pockets seemed to be always loaded, so that the coat hung heavily from the shoulders; vest of similar material, and, in default of buttons, fastened across his breast with large pins, which were very conspicuous; trousers of moleskin, well patched; and a fur cap, somewhat greasy, and in several places scalded-looking.

He had been lamed in childhood; he had been always "half cracked," and consequently he had never been expected to take part in the hard work of his fellows. However, he learned to read and to write: he became the recognised clerk to all the lads and lasses of the district, who from ignorance or shyness could not write their own letters. This circumstance, combined with the reading of Burns, the Ettrick Shepherd, and other poets, whose works the minister lent him, and something in himself (vanity?) made him a poet.

He wrote verse as well as prose for his patrons; and he was rewarded with more hearty meeds of praise than most versifiers enjoy. His lameness interfered with his progress; he got a donkey for a few shillings, and so he was enabled to travel throughout the country, independent and happy. He wrote ballads—they were printed at the office of the Kingshaven Gazette, on long strips of paper—and his pockets stuffed with bundles of his own “making,” he wandered about from house to house, and from fair to fair, selling his ballads at a penny apiece. Habbie, his donkey “Beattie” (named after “the Minstrel”), and his verses were recognised as a part of all the local gatherings, into the midst of which he rode always with the same song—

“I’m Habbie Gowk o’ Rowanden;
Here’s ballants for the maids and men
I wrat ‘em wi’ my ain pen.”

On occasion he was ready enough with sly retort. At the house of a farmer, who soon after the death of his first wife had taken for his second spouse a woman who was a “manager”—that is, extremely stingy—and who covered her stinginess with extreme piety: the mistress entered the kitchen where Habbie, as a matter of course, was about to take his kail with the ploughmen. She was not pleased by the appearance of this ungodly interloper, and she insisted upon hearing the men say grace before they began their meal. Habbie got up and, remembering the guidwife who was no more, said—

“Guid and gracious, she is gane
Proud and saucy she’s come hame,
Cauld kail and little bread—
Oh, guid gracious, that she was dead!”

Habbie was never admitted to that kitchen again. He did not care; his rhymes and his gossip obtained for him a welcome in so many places.

“How do you make your ballads, Habbie?” said an aspiring poet to him one day.

“Oo, I make my ballads best when I’m just lying on my back in a ley-field, chawing a carrot.”

It was a free and joyful life he led, wandering from town to town, across the moors and through the bosky glens, by the shore and over the hills. But there came a season when he was sick, and harvest was bad, and poor Habbie and his donkey were like to starve. The Kingshaven Gas-works had just opened, and a time-keeper was wanted. The provost and bailies—meaning kindly—thought that this would be an excellent appointment for Habbie. He could write well; he could sum a little; his lameness was no obstacle; and so they offered him the place, making it a solemn condition with him that from that date forth he would never attempt to write a line of verse.

Habbie, weak with sickness, looked at his donkey, and for the donkey’s sake agreed. The provost would have had him sell the companion of his wanderings, but that was too much. He refused; so the provost yielded, and Habbie, with his donkey, entered upon the important duties of time and gate-keeper of the Kingshaven and Rowanden Gas-works.

The provost congratulated himself upon having done a charitable action and reclaimed a vagrant. Habbie felt that he had sunk very low in the world, but for the first week he was punctual and attentive to his duties—the weather happened to be misty and dull. The sun shone—Habbie became restless. Sitting on a high stool in the wooden box at the gate, the time-book before him, and rows of figures dazzling his eyes, he snatched up a scrap of paper and the stump of a pencil, inspired with the grand idea of turning the multiplication table into rhyme. He remembered his pledge, and with a sigh put away the paper and pencil. The high walls which enclosed the gas-works looked to him like the walls of a prison. He began to feel as if he could not breathe in such a narrow space.

At first Dubbieside was proud of his protégé; but Habbie began to make blunders and to drink. He was visited with remonstrances and warnings; he was suspected of having resumed his bad habit of making rhymes, which would account for all his stupidity. He said nothing; he tried to be submissive and to become a “respectable member of the community,” as the provost put it. But he looked wistfully at Beattie grazing contentedly at the roadside; then his eyes wandered over the moorland, and to the blue headline of the hills. He never had any notion until now how hard it was to be respectable.

He began to hate the works, to hate the smell of tar and gas, and to feel more and more oppressed by the high walls. In proportion his longing grew for the freedom of the old life, the sweet smell of the heather and the wild roses.

A crisis came. He horrified the whole community, and nearly ruined the provost’s social position, by one wild declaration—

“What for shouldna dogs and donkeys ha’e sows as weel as us? aye, and even fleas for that matter? They couldna bite in the next world.”

It was impossible for honest folk to receive gas in the manufacture of which a man of such terrible opinions had the remotest share. A meeting of the board of directors was called, and to attend it provost, bailies, and councillors were marching up the street, when they were startled by wild shouts and laughter.

A rabble of boys and girls were coming down from the direction of the gas-works, shouting, laughing, and scampering about in the most riotous manner. In their midst was Habbie Gowk, mounted on his donkey, flaunting yards of ballads over his head, and crying at the pitch of his voice his old song—

“I’m Habbie Gowk o’ Rowanden;
Here’s ballants for the maids and men,
I wrat ‘em wi’ my ain pen.”

Dubbieside and his companions were dumb with dismay and indignation. Habbie rode past them in triumph, shaking his ballads under their noses and laughing in their horror-struck faces.

He had broken bounds at last. Sunshine, moorland, and hills, the heather and the wild roses, had carried the day against the dull walls and a sure dinner. Habbie returned to his old nomadic kind of life, wrote his ballads and sold them as he best could, and took his chance with Beattie of bed and board wherever they wandered.

Nothing could ever tempt Habbie to try to be respectable again. In the first trial he had been utterly miserable. "I'd ha'e been fit for the worms in another week," he said, "and I was beginning my ain epitaph when Beattie came to me; syne I just louped on his back, tell't the gas and the provost to gang to the deevil, and awa' we came."

He was happy and contented in his way. He was much liked by the women, men, and bairns of the two counties in which he made his rounds—the women for his gossip and songs, the men for his news and usefulness, the bairns for his fantastic stories about witches, and brownies, and fairies. He carried letters and parcels from neighbour to neighbour; and although he rarely had a shilling of his own in his pocket, he was frequently trusted by the farmers of the outlying districts with large sums of money to deposit in the village bank. Drunk or sober, Habbie was never known to make a mistake in those monetary transactions.

He made his way to Dalmahoy and inquired for Maister Walter, but that gentleman was absent.

"I ken'd that fine," said Habbie, "but I just came to please the leddy. I ken where to find him. Would you no like to buy my new ballant, my braw lass? It's about the bonny leddy o' the Dee. She was just a quean like yoursel', and she was guid and bonnie as you are, and she married the laird's strapping son, and sae became the leddy o' his houses and lands."

"There's waur nor me has married a laird's son," said the lass, with a toss of the head and a twinkle in her eye.

"And that's true enough," said Habbie, nodding gravely, "for thae e'en of yours would tempt the duke himsel', let alone a laird's loon."

"None o' your havers!" cried she, blushing and pleased, as she bought the ballad.

After this stroke of business Habbie rode on to the Norlan' Head, singing or brooding by the way, just as the humour seized him.

CHAPTER THE FIFTEENTH. THE LAIRD'S VISIT.

"AND what should the Laird want with me?" exclaimed Teenie, inclined to resent the somewhat authoritative message inviting her to Dalmahoy.

"He didna say," was Drysdale's response, sitting in the gig, bolt upright and grim, "but I suppose he'll tell you when you get there."

He unbuttoned the leather apron at her side, and waited as if for her to jump in.

She hesitated—why, she could not tell—then she got her bonnet and shawl, and took the seat beside Drysdale. Ailie was proud of this new token of the Laird's regard, and called her a "saucy ted" for thinking of saying no to the invitation.

Drysdale said, "It's a fine afternoon."

Teenie said, "Yes."

Drysdale: "Grand weather for the crops."

Teenie: "Yes."

That was all the conversation. He was a man who spoke little, except on occasions when he had reached his sixth tumbler, and then he became loquacious about the "panoramy" and his Canadian experiences. She was at this moment in a somewhat fierce mood. Although she could not define the real reason, her spirit had rebelled at the air of patronage with which Dalmahoy had treated them on his visit to the cottage; and she had felt even more rebellious at the plain message delivered by Drysdale, "The Laird wants to see you immediately."

Had it not been for the visit, she might have interpreted the message as Ailie did—as another mark of favour. But she could not do that. She fretted and felt angry whilst she complied. She wished that Walter or her father had been within reach, as either might have saved her a good deal of vexatious wonderings.

Habbie Gowk had taken a short cut across the moor, and so he missed Teenie, or the letter he carried might have enlightened and encouraged her.

As she drove up to the big house, she had an uncomfortable feeling that her plain shawl and bonnet, and her homely dress, were sadly out of keeping with the grandeur of this place, of which by-and-by she was to be the mistress. She would have liked to go round the other way, and to get in quietly by the back door. But Drysdale, acting upon instructions, drove up to the main entrance.

The ostler took the horse's head; Drysdale and the footman offered their assistance to Teenie in descending, with a sort of stiff civility, as if she had been some lady of importance; but she ignored their proffered services, and sprang lightly to the ground.

She was conducted across the big hall, and there again she felt a shrinking sensation, as if there were something discordant about herself in association with this place. But that only made her feel the more fierce and bold in her outward bearing.

Dalmahoy received her in the drawing-room, a long narrow apartment, with high roof and heavy panels of oak, and crowded with dark stiff-backed furniture. It was an ancient, cold, and gloomy room, the furniture of which seemed to have been arranged by some painfully correct law of rule and compass. Every chair, table, and lounge stood as if nailed to its place, at an exact distance from the other, looking as if it never had been moved from its spot, and was never intended to be moved.

Poor Teenie felt inclined to shiver as with cold when the door was thrown open, and she was ushered into this uncomfortable-looking chamber.

The Laird advanced with the most stately manner imaginable, and quite in keeping with his surroundings, took her hand, and conducted her to a seat. She yielded, notwithstanding the wild desire which possessed her to turn and fly. She felt more and more chilled, more and more conscious of the incongruity between herself and this, to her eyes, awfully grand place.

The Laird had wickedly calculated upon making an impression of this kind, and he mentally congratulated himself upon the success of his scheme so far. He was painfully courteous in his manner of leading her across the room, as if she had been a lady of royal blood; she felt as if he were mocking her as he bowed low when she sat down on the couch, and expressed in a soft respectful tone the extreme pleasure he experienced in receiving her at Dalmahoy.

Teenie would have cried with vexation, only that was one of the arts of young-ladyism she had never acquired. So she only sat staring at him, somewhat fierce in herself, and wondering what it all meant.

He asked how she had been since their meeting; inquired for her father, and for his "good friend" Alison.

"What was it you wanted to see me for?" interrupted Teenie with her disagreeable frankness.

The Laird was staggered for an instant, but he was equal to the occasion, and with corresponding frankness he answered—

"Thank you, Christina; your honest nature relieves me of much difficulty. Now with ordinary ladies I would not have known how to approach the unhappy subject upon which I must speak to you; but you relieve me at once."

She did not know whether that was a compliment or not; but she nodded, and said—

"All right—go on."

Thought the Laird: "Good heavens, how coarse!"

Said the Laird: "Thank you again, Christina; and I will imitate your charming frankness by telling you what I want without the least circumlocution. It is about Walter."

"Yes," she said, very meekly now.

He drew a chair forward, seated himself facing her, and spoke in a quite confidential manner.

"You know he is very young; he is passionate, and not easily guided. It is therefore necessary that I, who have more than a father's affection for him, and knowing how poor I shall leave him"—he glanced round the room and at her, as if he could not expect her to understand how he, the master of that place, could be poor—"it is necessary, I say, that I should look anxiously to his future, and endeavour to save him, so far as in me lies, from the consequences of his own folly."

"Surely any father would do the same."

The Laird was staggered again, and again he rose equal to the occasion.

"My dear Christina, I cannot expect you to enter quite into my views at once; but let me tell you, most fathers would leave an obstinate son to pay the penalty of his own blunders. I, however, wish to make the way of the future smooth for my son; and I wish to spare him the humiliation of being the destroyer of an old and much-respected house."

He was so grand, and he was so sincere, that she could only say in a dazed way—

"Yes."

"Well then, let me take things in their due order—it is most painful to me, and it will vex you; but I believe you love Walter."

She moved uneasily; she drew breath with difficulty, and her eyes flashed upon him savagely. That was a matter he had no right to touch upon.

"Hear me," he pleaded very humbly, and that held her fast to the seat. "It is because I know you like him so much that I have asked you to come here, that I might beg of you to save him from the ruin of all his prospects, from the toil and misery which he must endure if——"

The Laird made a grand pause, which he expected to be effective. She only said in a quiet way—

"Very well, go on."

"If he marries you!"

She jumped up

"Please hear me—it is for his sake," he pleaded again, catching her hand and pressing her back upon the seat. "I am going to confess to you something that will make me appear very mean in your eyes, but it is for his sake. When I consented to your marriage, I believed that you were the heiress to the great Methven estate. I like you, I respect you, but—I will be perfectly honest—that was why I consented to the marriage; but for that mistake I would have refused my sanction as much for your sake as for his. You know that Grace Wishart loves him; she has wealth, and only you stand between them. That is why I have asked you to come here, that I might beg you to save me from remorse, which will make my few remaining years miserable—to beg you to save him from—from what must be an unhappy union. Will you help me?"

"In what way?"

"By refusing to marry him."

"Did he know about this fortune you thought I was to get?"

The Laird hesitated, and then he told a lie—

"Yes."

She was standing up, very cold, and fierce, and scornful.

"And does he wish you to say this to me?"

Dalmahoy also rose, agitated, hesitating, doubtful how far he might go without bringing upon himself open disgrace. He was on the point of telling another lie—for he saw that she was ready to yield—when a man stepped between them with one word, full of pity, shame, and reproach.

"Father!"

It was Walter. He had entered unobserved by either party, in the excitement of the conversation. He had overheard the last two or three sentences, and he guessed the rest: they were full of bitterness and shame to him.

He put his arm round Teenie, and kissed her tenderly.

END OF CHAPTER THE FIFTEENTH.

IN BAD COMPANY.

ONE November morning, a good many years ago, I sat at breakfast in a London hotel, and tantalised myself with the sight of a cheque for two hundred pounds, drawn to my order, not a penny of which was mine. I was one of the world's martyrs, an honorary secretary, doomed to take any amount of trouble, and get nothing for it but private abuse every day, and a public vote of thanks once a year—unless, indeed, this trip to London, with necessary expenses paid, on the association's business, might be considered remuneration. In fine weather, and with a little ready money of his own to spend, a young man to whom the life of capitals still has something strange and intoxicating about it, might so regard it. But in a sleety, foggy November, and with urgent necessity for economy, he would probably prefer to remain at home. Two hundred pounds! Supposing, I thought, it were only mine; I should be able to buy that mare of Montgomery's, who carried me so well with the fox-hounds when my own nag was lame. Montgomery would allow me forty pounds for the latter, that was hardly up to my weight. I could also get a breech-loader, a new invention then, but taken up strongly by the man over whose land I had my best shooting, and who grumbled so much at the line being delayed while I measured out and rammed down the powder and shot in the old fashion, that I began to fear for my welcome. And then there was a bracelet—

But it would be tedious to enumerate all the methods which occurred to me of spending the money I had not got, as I ate and drank in leisurely solitary state, ogling the cheque. They were so numerous that I came at last to the conclusion that as the two hundred pounds would not suffice for a tithe of them, it was not worth having, and returned the magic bit of paper to my pocket-book with the restored equanimity of the fox when he made his famous discovery about the grapes. Once upon a—but perhaps you may have heard the fable.

Day-dreams and breakfast over, I started to complete the business upon which I had been engaged, and as payments were to be made it was necessary to cash the cheque. The bank upon which it was drawn was in a narrow street near Cornhill, and it struck me that there was even a larger crowd than usual in the main thoroughfares as I threaded my way eastwards; or if not a larger, a more stagnant crowd, not ebbing and flowing in the ordinary buoyant way. I seemed for once to be in a greater hurry than other people, and felt very proud of the fact. I expect that if any acquaintance had met me, the business-like gravity of my features would have puzzled him, and he would have thought I must have a wealthy twin-brother in the dry-salting line.

However, no one who knew me appeared, and I reached the bank unaccosted—presented the cheque—said how I would have it—wondered, as I always do, how the clerk could hand over a sum exceeding his own income to a perfect stranger with such utter composure—crammed the notes into the inner breast-pocket of my coat—buttoned the coat up, and stepped with a sensation of even increased importance into the street. I had sometimes been worth robbing for a short period, but now I felt like worth murdering as I passed along a court into Cornhill, and so across the road, looking right and left for a cab.

Certainly there were more people than I had ever seen there before, and they moved about more slowly. The large open space in front of the Royal Exchange was literally filled. Endeavouring to make my way through, I found the mass increase in density, until at last I was fixed like a whaler in an ice-flow, amidst a motionless crowd, evidently gathered for some purpose.

What was it all about? A voice, the owner of which was invisible, revealed the mystery.

"One penny, the ole percession. Oo'll 'ave the Lord Mayor's Show for a penny?"

Of course, the Lord Mayor's Show was in November, and I had hit on the very day. No doubt it would pass that way presently, and I should have a chance of seeing it if I could only edge a little nearer to the front. It would have been better if I had not had so much money about me, but that could not be helped now, and no one knew it.

Thus I flattered myself at first ; but presently I did not feel so sure of that same desirable ignorance on the part of my neighbours. Where had these men all about me come from? Stray glimpses of such beings I had sometimes caught, but here was a swarm of them. Were they precocious boys, forced in hotbeds of vice, or gin-stunted men? They were small and lean, but seemed to expect to grow, for their clothes were made for average-sized adults. They were unkempt, sallow, and very dirty. Their gait was slouching, and so far they were not unlike a certain class of professional beggars, for whom, however, they could not easily be mistaken. The mendicant wears a conventional piteous mask, which is so obviously a mask for any one who can observe at all, that he knows that the fellow makes a grimace (of spite if he refuse ; of derision if he give) the moment his back is turned. But these men had vicious, side-glancing eyes ; earnest lines seaming their features ; cruel, relentless mouths. There was that look about them which characterises the beast of prey when hunted in his turn—a look of cunning and hatred. The motto stamped upon them seemed to be—"A short life, and a hunted one, with one spring for revenge." I did not suspect ; I was certain that they were thieves, and I could hardly doubt but what they were thus collected together, to the neglect of private enterprise amongst the watches and purses of the crowd, for some special purpose.

When it first occurred to me that I might have been watched receiving the money, and followed, I attempted quietly to withdraw. It looked easy enough, for the beings who excited my suspicions were after all but a small knot comparatively, and beyond them on all sides seethed a mob of roughs, who were not clean or beautiful indeed, but who in all probability were not criminals. However, directly my intention became manifest, a man hustled me, and immediately shouted out—

"Where are you a-shoving to?"

Second Thief : "Who are you, I should like to know?"

Third and Fourth Thieves : "Who are you, I should like to know?"

First Thief : "He thinks himself a [unpleasant term meaning very great] swell, a-knocking blokes about."

At this point unpleasant terms overpowered coherency of speech. The policy of the thieves was sound. By raising the shibboleth of class prejudice they had enlisted the sympathies of the roughs, and I found myself in a position the most trying to the nerves of any I have ever experienced. To stand in the midst of a threatening crowd, and see nothing but angry faces glowering at you, is a remembrance to haunt you if ever you have a fever years after. No doubt the police sometimes exceed their duty, but ever since that day I have felt inclined to make a very great allowance for them, and it irritates me to hear them villified and caricatured, for my position that day is theirs constantly. I too had laughed at them, but I would have given something for a glimpse of a broad pair of shoulders clad in blue at that moment. Fortunately I kept my temper and presence of mind. Without answering, without attempting to rush, I pressed steadily on through the surrounding mass. Buttoning my frock-coat still closer, I now kept my arms low, with the elbows square and the fists clenched, guarding that region of the waist so exposed to a disabling blow, and expecting attack ; for do what I would, I could not get clear of the thieves who clustered round me. Presently one of them sprang at me and made a snatch at my breast-pin. Being tall I was able to foil him ; but the attempt acted as a signal, and I was assailed on all sides, efforts being especially made to tear my coat open.

At this critical moment I saw an omnibus on the edge of the crowd, and about ten yards off, stationary, evidently drawn up as a stand-point to see the procession from ; and on the roof were a party of soldiers, with white bands round their caps.

"Coldstreams to the rescue!" I shouted as loudly as I could, forcing my way towards them. The cry attracted their attention.

"Don't let me be robbed under your eyes!" I cried.

From their perch they were able to see what was going on, and down they came in a twinkling. There was a surging and much swearing ; the dense rim of the crowd separated, and a fellow whose hand was on my collar went down before the flash of a red arm as though he had been struck by a battering-ram.

The guardsmen attempted no arrests, but they cut me out and bore me back to the omnibus in a twinkling. I had lost my hat, my clothes were torn, but the roll of bank-notes was safe, also my watch. The rogues had not even got my scarf-pin, nor were my personal injuries worth mentioning—a few bruises and a scratch, that was all. The guardsmen were immensely delighted with half a sovereign for beer—surely as small a salvage as has often been paid, especially as they lost their show, for the procession passed during the rescue.

Damage to the clothes is soon rectified in London, unless you are absolutely penniless ; and when I had once got a cab I was all right, transacted my business, and left town on the following morning.

I mentioned in my report the peril I had incurred, hoping to stir to gratitude the association of which I am honorary secretary. I partially succeeded. They held a special meeting, and voted me unanimously—a new hat ! LEWIS HOUGH.

MARGUERITE.

"HE LOVES ME WELL!"

"MARGUERITE picks an aster, and pulls the leaves out one after another, murmuring—
 "He loves me—loves me not!—[Picking the last leaf with delight—
 He loves me!"—Faust.

RAYED flower, my fluttering heart's fate tell :
 He loves me not?—he loves me well?
 A leaf I pluck from out your round —
 O startled look of quick delight

That flashed into his eyes, that night
 When mine his wandering glance first found!
 As sweet a tale, O last leaf, tell—
 He loves me well!

Another—be the fear forgot
That now I pluck—he loves me not!
Not?—loves me not?—and need I dread
Ah! as I brushed behind her chair,
His drawn to hers, they whispered there,
So low, I caught not what he said—
Nor she; would that could be forgot!
He loves me not!

Next picked, of sweetest hopes to tell,
Your sweetness says, he loves me well;
Yes, loves me well; why should I fear?
I knew, I felt him at my side,
My partner, not to be denied—
Not hers—as the next dance drew near;
O last-plucked leaf, come quick to tell,
He loves me well!

Hope—fear—each straight in each forgot,
Thrice-evil leaf, he loves me not?
Alas! alas! and is it true?
And did I see his laughing eye—
I on his arm—to hers reply,
As his to mine alone should do?
Come, last-drawn leaf, to tell me—what?
He loves me not?

White with my fear that petal fell—
O red last leaf, he loves me well!
Here let me pluck all sweetest thought;
I know his hand pressed mine—I heard
The tremble in his latest word;
What could be shown but what I sought?
Last leaf, I knew your fall must tell,
He loves me well!

W. C. BENNETT.

A RIDE FOR LIFE IN THE "B.O."

THE anecdote I am going to tell you is word for word true, written down as told to me by the principal actor in it. It is not a very sensational one, as sensation goes in South America; but I think it is interesting as showing what sort of adventures our "younger sons" and tamely-bred youngsters go through when transplanted to try sheep-farming in the far South. And first a word of explanation as to the title. "B.O." is the Anglicised abbreviation of Banda Oriental, as "R.A." is of Republica Argentina, the two being those large tracts of pastoral country on either side of the Rio de la Plata, the open uncultivated parts of which are called in English parlance the "camp," a free translation of the Spanish word "campo," or country, and answering to the Australian "bush."

It was a lovely morning in the depth of winter, one of those we so often see in those countries when a hard hoar-frost has fallen during the night, and the whole camp as far as the eye can reach is a sheet of pure white rime. Even the trees belting the Santa Lucia river were that morning lightly frosted over, an event of rare occurrence, and denoting an exceptionally severe cold. The effect was perfect; but I don't think I was quite in the mood to appreciate it. You'll easily understand why in a moment.

At the time I'm telling you about, the Revolution stirred up by the "Blancos" (the White or Conservative party) had been dragging on its "fight and run away" tactics for more than a year; and horses, considered by the wild and undisciplined soldiery of both Government and Revolutionists as "articulo de guerra," or any one's property, were getting awfully scarce. I had dwindled down to being the possessor of one solitary "mount," a very fair specimen of his kind, which I valued more at that time than all the "Blink Bonnys" and "Gladiateurs" that were ever foaled. You see I knew too well that without him my flocks would stray no one knows where; I should be unable to kill a cow or bullock for home consumption; or, in fact, save my life in more ways than one.

He was kept locked up right carefully in a room of my house every night; and out of that room I took and saddled him at sunrise of this eventful day, with the intention of sallying out in search of any waif or stray in the shape of horseflesh that it might be my good luck to come across (when a fellow has been robbed of all his horses, it's hard if he mayn't suppose that any odd screw he may find about is part of his missing property), with which to hunt back such of my cattle, or brood mares, as might have strayed too far into neighbours' land.

Up in the Sierras of Minas it had rained heavily some days before, and a large volume of water had come down the Santa Lucia river, which in its normal state is not at all formidable; but which, after the heavy rains of winter, shows a wonderful capacity for swallowing up any unfortunate individual who, not being much of a swimmer, dares to brave its strong current and curling eddies. In front of my house the fords were too deep and the currents too rapid for any one, not on a matter of life or death, to attempt passing over; so I mounted my horse, and quietly trotted up-stream over the long rolling hills, for six or seven miles, to a ford called "Paso de la Calera," which I knew would just be at a depth to allow me (kneeling on my saddle) to cross over on my horse-poaching expedition.

We carry out the adage of "All's fair in love and war" to the fullest extent as regards horse-flesh—that is, if the animal be not marked with a friend or neighbour's brand.

I got over safely, and dismounted to allow my horse to shake and partially dry himself before continuing my somewhat dangerous quest; for not having seen any acquaintances from that side of the river for many days, I was entirely ignorant as to what military forces might be down there, or whether they were Blancos or Colorados. I knew there was a small force somewhere about; for I had seen from my house groups of horsemen, varying from three to eight or ten, moving in the distance for some days past.

Naturally, I kept on the low ground—first, because I knew any animals would be most likely to be there; as the sweetest grasses grow in the low, damp ground near the river; and, secondly, because I could better avoid being seen by scouts, who are generally sent out from the encampment at dawn, to reconnoitre from the highest points for any sign of an enemy.

The slight breeze was quite chilly—although the warmth of the sun as it rose higher was gradually melting the frost—so, feeling that both myself and horse would feel the advantage of a little spurt, I set off at a gallop towards a bend in the river where I espied two or three horses evidently enjoying a feed of "granilla," the sweetest grass the country produces; and thinking I should make a good haul, I went right at them, when, to my astonishment, out of a clump of trees came a shout, "Alto, ahí!" (Halt, there), and I pulled up short on discovering a group of about twenty-five men. There was nothing for it but to trot towards them; and as I did so, I recognised them as Blancos, by the light blue ribbon round their hats; and to be a party commanded by Capitan Maximo Ramirez, who, being cut off from the main body of the Revolutionists, had escaped to the woods with his men, and there remained in hiding for three weeks, until an opportunity should occur for him to join his commandant and the Revolutionary army. His men had nearly all been in my service at one time or another, in the varied capacities of shearers, horse-tamers, shepherds, etc. etc., so I felt quite at home with them at once, and entered into conversation. They all had their horses saddled; and a few loose ones were straying about, ready to be driven on before them on changing their camping-ground (for these flying parties never sleep two nights consecutively in the same camp, and as often as not change twice in one night); and they were anxiously expecting the return of the "bomberos" (scouts) that Maximo had sent out at dawn.

These were two young fellows whom I knew well, cousins to each other, Damian and Tcnon Artigas, and who were nick-named respectively "Toco" and "Pelado." They had been born in the district, and lived in it all their lives; knowing every hole and corner in the woods and Sierras that could contain a sheep in hiding, much less a body of men and horses. I dismounted, and shook hands with several of the men, pulled out my cigar-case, well filled with "cigarritos de papel," and passed it round, continuing in conversation till one of the men observed that Toco and Pelado were so long returning that they must have found the coast clear, and gone to take "maté" at their aunt Anastacia's; and that if Ramirez saw no objection they might light fires, and do the same without danger, since the woods were dryish, and would not make much smoke. Maximo consented, and two groups speedily formed around the fires, the horses standing hobbled close by, and the lances stuck in the ground near each man's horse.

Half an hour might have passed thus in sucking "maté" (the native substitute for tea, partaken of through the medium of a hollow gourd and tube), the conversation being interlarded by bloodthirsty threats of what would be done should any unfortunate Colorado fall into their hands—threats of which a hand passed significantly across the throat was of the mildest type. Then the "caña" (white rum) bottle was passed round; and all were feeling uncommonly social and jolly, when a sharp cry from Victor Cejas made us spring to our feet.

"Ahi vienen, y apurados!" (Here they come, and in a hurry).

And, true enough, we saw the two scouts, Toco and Pelado, galloping down a long slope towards us, at a pace which showed it was not for pleasure, but for life they rode.

Jollity was over for the nonce.

In less than a minute every man had seized his lance and "tercerola" (carbine) and was in the saddle. Said I sweetly, "Adios, muchachos; I shall be seriously compromised if caught by any of your enemies; and to judge from the way Toco and Pelado are riding, such are not far off." With which, and shaking hands with Maximo, I turned my horse's head up-stream at a hard canter.

I had not gone three hundred yards when, casting a glance behind, I saw my friends tearing after me as hard as their horses could lay feet to the ground; and behind them, coming over the crest of a hill about three-quarters of a mile off, at a gallop, a body of men some seventy or eighty in number, whom I judged to be Government or Colorado soldiers.

No sooner did they sight us than, with a weird and strange yell, that came down the breeze with a music which sent a shiver up my spine, they appeared to hurry forward; and as I was by this time already mixed up among the stampedes of Maximo's men, I knew well my fate would be most uncertain, notwithstanding that I was a foreigner, carried no arms, and had no party insignia; for on occasions of this sort men get so absolutely ferocious that they would not hesitate to "ball" my horse, take potshots at me, put six inches of lance-blade under my ribs, or play any other mild and festive trick, ending with a slit weazand, and afterwards rejoice at having been able to wipe out a "gringo" (foreigner) with impunity.

Therefore I gave a chirrup to my horse, and away we went, a regular case of "saue qui peut" for one and all. I never looked behind, but picked out the best and cleanest galloping-ground to the Paso de la Calera, where I knew, if once across the river, I could run for Don Melitos Piris' house, and be safe; for if the Colorados did see me arrive there, it would not matter, he being a great Colorado partizan, and a staunch friend of mine.

The many rations of grain my horse had eaten during the winter stood me in good stead now, for I found that without pressing him I kept at the head of the scattered column; many of our party, badly mounted, gradually dropping behind, and slipping off their tired animals on the edge of the wood, where they ran into the scrubs on foot, leaving their horses and gear an easy prize to the enemy, and little caring for the loss of steed and saddle, so they could escape, swimming the river under cover of the night, and get to some friendly "rancho" with a whole skin.

Two men, Luis Flores and Victor Cejas, both equally well mounted with myself, came up, one on either side of me; and as we galloped upstream on the edge of the wood we came to a break, or open clearance, which led down to the ford called Paso del Bote, where the water was running down smoothly and placidly, but at a terrible pace. The river at this spot was somewhere about two hundred and fifty feet wide, and above and below the ford was confined between high banks covered with scrub and thorny "ñapinday," whose cruel curved thorns, conjoined with the slipperiness of the banks, made gaining the shore on either side a most difficult and painful matter to any swimmer who might miss the actual landing-place. Victor had been quickly undressing himself as we galloped along, making his clothes into a long roll in his poncho, and tying them round his horse's neck, preparatory to a trial at the Paso del Bote (so called, like most matters in the B.O., because there wasn't a boat there), and was endeavouring to persuade Luis and myself to do the same. I, however, hardly saw the possibility of the attempt, and preferred saving my "recado" (Spanish saddle), which was silver-mounted; for I was certain the stream would carry off my horse; and that even if I myself chanced to get across, it would be with the agreeable prospect of remaining in a hungry, half-drowned, and perishing-with-cold state the entire day, and part of the night.

No! Luis (a quondam friend and Fidus Achates of mine) and I determined to trust to horseflesh rather than water; so, as we were as yet pretty well in advance of our pursuers, we pulled in to a trot for a few seconds, and saw our friend Victor plunge into the turbid water, and swim beside his horse, holding on to the mane. They proceeded gaily enough for thirty yards or more, when the full force of the current turned the horse's head down-stream; and notwithstanding Victor's frantic efforts to head him up again by splashing water in his ears and eyes, he had to let go and swim for dear life to the opposite bank, abandoning horse and gear to the mercy of the stream.

Meanwhile the fascination caused by Victor's gallant struggle did not prevent us from keeping a weather-eye open on our pursuers, of whom some had remained behind, picking up the gear and horses left by those of our chums who had escaped to the woods. By good luck Luis saw six men, however, who, well ahead of the others, and thinking themselves hidden by the trees, were making for us with pistol in the rein-hand, lances well poised, and coming along at a pace that told us their horses were "all there."

"Ahora, si, Luis, vamosos de veras!" (Now, Luis, let's go in reality), said I, giving my horse a cut on the flank which made him bound at least three yards on his way; and then leaving Victor to his struggles, and with my faithful Luis at my side, we ran and were run for a matter of six miles, up and down hill, through swamp and over stones, "neck or nothing" (excuse the pun, for if caught our necks wouldn't have escaped), these wild demons giving tongue after us with fiendish shouts of "Ya! ya! ya!" and occasional long shots at us.

In a case like this the superiority of a grain-fed horse shows out so notably, both as to pace and "staying," that we were certain in the long run to last out half of our pursuers, and, could we reach the ford and get across safely before they caught us up, to make an easy stand, two to four. Indeed, more than probably they would not dare pass over after us, from fear of our having any protection on the other side.

One individual, however, splendidly mounted, kept gradually creeping nearer and nearer to us; and I was sadly afraid that, should he get within distance to use his "boleadores," I should be the victim, on account of being better dressed and having a silver-mounted recado; therefore I begged Luis to have his "facon" (long knife) ready to cut the boleadores from my horse's hind legs should it be necessary. His only reply was "No hay cuidado, patron" (Never you fear, sir); but, without fearing, I thought the event so likely that I overhauled my pistols, and saw that the chambers revolved freely, with the amiable resolve to hurt some one before I "caved in."

Meanwhile four of our most persistent followers had hauled off, and left the race two to two, all of whom were going their best, when suddenly we heard six or eight shots behind and to our left, and casting a glance backwards I saw Maximo, on his light grey horse, with two companions, exchanging shots with four or five Colorados, thus putting our two pursuers almost between two fires.

Luis was equal to the occasion, and shouted to me, "Stop, Don Pepe, let's turn round and let drive at those two fellows before Capitan Maximo gets away, and you'll see how they'll run."

As soon done as said. We charged straightway, I revolver in hand, and he with a huge brass-barrelled, bell-mouthed instrument, called a "trabuco," well loaded with slugs, old nails, and odd etceteras. He reserved his fire for close quarters, and both yelling out some impolite expressions, after the usages of the country, I fired a single shot, which had the effect of causing our valiant (?) pursuers to strike off to the left, dashing past Maximo and his friends, who, seeing we had made a stand, turned and faced the enemy also. These now consisted of several well-mounted fellows, who showed every desire to swallow us up, had they only dared to wait until the rest of their comrades came up—or we had been foolish enough to abide that moment. The soldier of the South American republics, however, is brave only when bravely led, or in single combat. Otherwise, in groups, without a leader, or with one of faint heart, he is nowhere; and such was the case with our present opponents, who, seeing we intended to make an effort and retreat with a determined aspect, or sell our lives dearly, merely hovered round us as we galloped on, turning every now and then to menace them again.

Thus we arrived at last at the Paso de la Calera; and my friends allowing me to pass over first, I galloped up to Don Melitos', thanking my stars that I had escaped with a whole skin, and vowing for the future never to attempt horse-poaching on debatable ground.

The results of this miniature "Bull Run" were that Toco and Pelado turned up at my house on foot at about 11 p.m., having swum the river and been in the woods till nightfall, and asked permission to sleep in my wool-shed. Poor Victor turned up at night at one of the shepherd's huts, in the costume of Adam before he was induced to taste that unlucky fruit. Maximo and the rest got away as best they could, with the exception of two poor fellows who were found some time afterwards in the woods, barbarously lanced, and with their throats cut from ear to ear.

Such is life in the B.O. for those who will attempt "gauchadas" like mine in revolution time; and to them my solemn advice, after twenty years' residence in the country, is the same as was given to the bachelor about to marry: "Don't!"

THE LABOURER IN LINCOLNSHIRE.

VER and above the usual landmarks of the Lincolnshire peasantry—"Caistor Palm-sun Fair," "Orncastle 'Oss Fair," and the like—one incomparably transcends the ordinary days of the year, and that is May Day. In the agricultural mind harvest alone can be compared with

May Day time. Perhaps more anxiety is caused to the farmer and his spouse by the latter epoch than by the former; for it is now possible, by the aid of machinery, to secure the crops in tolerable condition, whatever the weather may be, but year by year servants and labourers become more difficult to obtain and to manage, emphatically grow more "orkurd." By a curious perversity May Day in Lincolnshire does not mean, as a plain man would think, May 1st, but May 13th, this being "Old May Day;" just as some almanacs tell us January 6th is Old Christmas Day. However this may be, the Lincolnshire year for tenants, farm and domestic servants, begins on May 13th, and January 1st is completely disregarded. Consequently no slight amount of activity is caused in the county as often as May Day comes, some sketches of which, together with the usages of service there, we will endeavour to put on record.

Many farm labourers are engaged in Lincolnshire by the year, and they are then termed "confined labourers," living in cottages belonging to their masters. These men are not paid daily wages, but a fixed annual sum, thus escaping the inconvenience caused to the day-labourer by wet days, when he must remain idle. On the other hand, as he is a party in an agreement, the confined labourer is precluded from "striking" during his tenancy, as well as from the temptation of exacting his own remuneration at harvest time. Every May Day changes occur amongst these men. They must all leave their abodes on the 13th exactly, in order that the men hired in their places may enter into possession at once. Consequently one of the most usual sights of the county at May Day consists of numbers of waggons, lent either by the farmers engaging or those parting with the confined labourers, filled with a motley collection of household furniture, while the families to which these goods belong walk by the side. This Hegira of the old and sedate labourers with their children is very gravely and quietly performed, in strong contrast with the noisy proceedings of the younger men and women servants.

These invariably leave their places of service on the 14th, the women quitting house-work, and the plough-lads (who do not become confined labourers till they are married or arrived at, say, twenty-five years of age) leaving the foremen's houses in which they have lodged during the last year. They, too, it should be explained, hold a middle position in the scale of agricultural labour in Lincolnshire. Without the liability to loss of work on rainy days, like the ordinary labourer, they have not arrived at the dignity of possessing houses of their own, and freedom from surveillance, like their confined brethren. They sleep at their master's foreman's house, and are provided by him with victuals, consisting generally of unlimited supplies of bread, milk, and bacon, and a certain amount of beer each day. The foreman, too, sets them their work each morning, either to plough, harrow, etc., or to take gorn to the nearest market town in the above-mentioned waggons drawn by straining teams, and to bring back coals or linseed cake. Besides this their duty is to see to the horses of the farm, morning and evening, so that they are kept well employed.

It is astonishing, with so much open-air work and such good supplies of food, how a miserable starveling of thirteen, who perhaps leaves behind at his father's cottage a family of eight or nine little brothers and sisters, improves in appearance after his first year of such service. A strong spirit of restlessness pervades these lads, and unless an increase of wage sufficient to tempt them be previously offered by the masters, they all leave them on "Pack Rag Day," as they facetiously call the 14th. Like sailors just put ashore, or lads breaking up for the holidays, they are in the greatest spirits, and having money (their annual wage) in their pockets, naturally make their way to the nearest town, where plenty of dissipations and bad companions are on the look-out for them. But too often "A fool and his money are soon parted" is an adage then seen exemplified in their case. The public-houses are full, fiddles (the modern substitute for "the Lincolnshire bag-pipes" mentioned by Shakespeare) sound, and dancing, laughter, and horse-play abound everywhere—in the inns, the fields, the streets.

We cannot say that Lincolnshire is a pleasant county to live in during this annual Saturnalia. It lasts a week for the most part, the lads and lasses then entering upon their new places. Every poor family looks upon this week as the holiday of the year. It reunites brothers and sisters round their old hearths, and forms a complete break in the business of the farming calendar.

A natural incident of this general move of servants is a thorough cleaning of houses and furniture, before the old hands go and new ones enter. April and the beginning of May are thus the most disagreeable weeks of the year to all old bachelors, easy-going heads of families, or people desirous of their belongings being left where they can find them. Soap and water and blacklead are devoutly worshipped during these weeks as the fetishe of the Lincolnshire lower classes. The horrors of the Middle Passage are a joke to this dreadful spring cleaning. Be the weather what it will, it must go on, the natives think; and as unless it is thorough it is nothing, the right course is to turn everything in a house out of doors at once, to suspend blankets from windows, and lay the feather-beds next the flower-beds on the lawn. Fancy painters and paper-hangers at work in dining and drawing-rooms, and plenty of buckets of white-wash left in every dark passage for the unwary to fall over, and a stranger may collect a faint image of the agrémens of the Lincolnshire spring cleaning. It must last at least a fortnight, to be en règle, but in most houses it continues for the month preceding May Day. The males of each household generally fly the country during the infliction, and to make a call on a neighbour in April is esteemed the height of bad taste. It will serve such a boor right if the lady of the house herself open the door to him with a cloth fastened round her head, and her complexion improved by splashes of whitewash. When the men return home they can find nothing they want; whips, guns, books have disappeared. "What else can you expect?" the notable housewife will say, "everything must be rembled [moved] at May Day!"

For the fortnight preceding this august epoch, that blot of agricultural districts the Statute Fair is held in turn at the different towns round each village. It is scarcely necessary to depict the dangers which these statutory hirings bring with them to the young of both sexes who attend them. It always reminds us of a white slave market, to see the licence and roughness of manners which prevail at these "Mops." In many cases the clergyman has to grieve for the boy or girl hitherto steady at school and well-behaved on Sunday. The Statute Fair, with its flood of bad examples, and the strength of its temptations, too often sweeps away the modesty and orderly behaviour of youth, and then a false shame forbids the good habits of the past being resumed.

It is matter of great thankfulness to all who are interested in the social welfare of Lincolnshire servants, that even the farmers are now turning against the immorality and contagious vice which too commonly attend the Statute Fairs. They have been much reduced in number of late years, and it is to be hoped that the next generation at latest may see their extinction. Lads and lasses generally engage themselves at such fairs for the next year, and receive a "pheasant-penny," as they call it (i.e., a fastening penny), from their new masters. Of course this shilling often augments the gains of the "Blue Boar." That quiet hostelry at other times is now filled to suffocation with pushing noisy crowds of young men and girls. A fiddler or two have been retained, and dancing commences early in the afternoon, while the partners refresh themselves with huge mugs of beer, and eat ginger-bread and nuts in quantities which show what admirable digestions are engendered by constant open-air exercise. The brawls and disturbances which ensue at dusk may be left to the reader's imagination.

After a servant is once engaged, his or her master cannot in any subsequent fit of pique dissolve the contract. We have heard of a housemaid replying to her master who wished thus to dismiss her, while she refused to leave, "Nay, you have summered a bad cawf [calf], you may winter it now as well!"

It cannot be said that this annual holiday of May Day in Lincolnshire is fraught with many benefits to the county. Lasting as it does for a week (during which almost every farm-house is left empty of servants, and its owners congratulate themselves if they can secure the help of even an old woman from the village), it implants a general restlessness in the minds of the servants. May Day is their chief topic of conversation for months before it comes, and the notion of obtaining a new place and more wages thus familiarising itself amongst them, they are only too ready to act upon it. Where good places, it may be, have been left for some years annually by a girl or a boy, gradually they deem it necessary to give up their situation every year, enjoy their week's liberty (or licence), and know that they are tolerably certain to obtain a good place in a new locality afterwards. How fatally these unsteady habits react upon their work must be self-evident, as well as the bad effect this instability of character produces upon rural districts. All the influences which have been brought to bear upon the labourer during the year in order to teach him soberness, and even higher virtues, are at once overwhelmed by May Day, and the village philanthropist must begin his work afresh with a new generation of young men and women, certain that his efforts will meet with the same fate next year.

The general unsettling which May Day causes through the county can hardly be exaggerated, and the character of its natives is anything but improved by it. Gratitude must greatly die out when year by year all old ties are thus suddenly broken, and the strength of friendship itself is severely tried by the strain to which this Saturnalia exposes it. The good old relations which almost took the form of family ties as time passed on between farmer and labourer, are now rudely broken in upon, while mutterings and actual deeds of "strikes," and "higher wages," and "labourers' unions," effectually estrange the two, whose true interest it is always to work together amicably.

Another common sight of May Day in this county is a couple of young people (followed by two or three more pairs of friends of their own age—never by their parents) going to church to be married, or perhaps, if it be evening, walking with all their friends to their new home in the next parish. In consequence of the before-mentioned arrangements for hiring servants, marriages amongst the working classes in the county invariably take place at this time. Many other changes in life amongst them are then entered upon. Thus a tall stalwart labourer recently came to us at May Day, for a recommendation to enable him to become a policeman. Knowing him to be somewhat "corf-hearted" (as the vernacular calls "calf-hearted"), though his Stentorian laugh would shake the village when a good shot was made at the skittle-alley, we deemed it necessary to ask a few questions as a preliminary. "What would he do supposing he saw thieves running off from a house?" With a knowing smile, he replied, "Whoy, I should just let 'em run!"

This was speaking so "like an ancient and most quiet watchman," so like a man well furnished with Dogberry's philosophy, "The most peaceable way for you, if you do take a thief, is to let him show himself what he is, and steal out of your company," that he seemed an eminently discreet man for the post.

When it is considered that so lately as 1816 a book could be published on Lincolnshire called "Terra Incognita," and that even now Lincolnshire is more unknown to the rest of England than almost any other county, people having vague ideas of its being half fen and half huge drains, these particulars respecting its spring customs may not be deemed uninteresting. It is satisfactory to be able to add that its natives, even if they are the very people whom the poet had in view when he wrote of the penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos, are always as ready to give a warm welcome to any friends who may visit them from other shires, as they are to receive any enemies who should venture to land on their low sandy sea-board.

CHAPTER THE SIXTEENTH.

SHADOWS.

THE position was awkward, and there was silence for a minute. The Laird swung his glasses in pendulum fashion and regarded the others innocently, like a man who is aware that his conduct is liable to misconstruction, but whose conscious rectitude sustains him in the hour of trial; he was wishing he could discover whether or not Walter had heard that little fib, and he was in a manner glad that the second one had not been uttered.

Walter had heard it.

Teenie drew back a step, putting his arm away from her, looking at him with those clear far-seeking eyes of hers. She saw that he was very calm, although his face was pale. It was said of him by his brothers and sisters that he was most resolute and most unmanageable when he was quietest. But she was looking farther. She was striving to get a glimpse of that future which Dalmahoy had represented in such dismal colours. She was striving to discover what it was right for her to do after the appeal just made to her. Was she to ruin his prospects? Was she to make him unhappy? Was she to risk that?

Her heart craved for him in such a wild passionate way that she was ready to dare anything—but not if he were to suffer by it. She had never known anything approaching to fear until now, and she did fear; but it was for him, not herself. Slowly the sense of the utter change in herself dawned upon her; but how quickly the change had been effected! Her very love was the source of her new-born cowardice.

Was it the mistake about that fortune which had tempted him to speak? And was he going on with the engagement out of pity to her? She could and would do anything because she loved him, but she would not have anything for pity.

She put the thought—or suspicion—into words, and asked him—

"Were you thinking about the siller when you made me so glad?"

He took her hand, pressing it warmly. She could not doubt that his heart was in his words.

"You are my fortune," he said smiling.

He was ambiguous, but he could not tell her that his father had stooped to a falsehood.

"But the Laird says——"

He held up his hand, stopping her.

"My father is very kind to me; he is only anxious that I may have a successful career. You must not blame him, or be angry with him, if he has said anything to vex you. I have been up at Drumlilmount to-day, and the cottage will soon be ready for us."

Teenie had nothing more to say.

"Very well, Walter," said the Laird in an injured tone; "I have done my best to save you, and Christina would have helped me, but for you. I wash my hands of the whole affair from this day forth; and all I have to say is, that whatever happens, you cannot blame me. I regret having interfered."

Dalmahoy bade Teenie good-bye, somewhat pompously but kindly, and marched out of the room, glad enough to escape without any exposure, whilst he was satisfied that he had been doing only his duty.

"I wish I knew what to do," exclaimed Teenie.

"There is nothing for you to do but to get ready for our wedding, and to prepare yourself to settle down into the humdrum ways of the wife of a poor country minister."

"You say that just to please me."

"Of course I do, for in pleasing you I please myself."

She was not satisfied, but she could not argue with him. He proposed that she should see his sisters. He had told them of the marriage, and they were most anxious to congratulate the bride.

"No," said Teenie very decisively, "I will see no more of your folk to-day. I want to get back to the Norlan'."

She almost shuddered as she glanced from one end of the long dark room to the other. The shafts of light which penetrated it through the three high and narrow windows, served only to make the shadowy recesses and corners appear the more gloomy. "There should be fires here," was her mechanical reflection; her thoughts were far away from the subject.

He was sorry, but he did not attempt to persuade her; she had been too much tried and agitated already. He got the gig and himself drove her home. She was glad to have him with her, glad to feel that he was near her, although she scarcely spoke a word.

They found the skipper, telescope in hand, trying to make out the character of a brig which was passing far out at sea; Alison standing at the door knitting, and listening to Habbie Gowk, who, seated on a tub which he had turned upside down for that purpose, was busy explaining the comparative merits of Dorking and Brahma-poutra hens as egg-layers.

"There they are!" he cried, jumping up and almost knocking Alison over the doorstep in his excitement. "I ken'd I would find them together. They're a braw pair. They were just made for ither."

He hobbled forward as Teenie alighted.

"I wish you muckle joy, hinny, and a lang life,"

Grace's name confronted her at every turn, and made her feel angry without the slightest apparent reason. Walter was already reading his letter, and she could see that it pleased him very much, for he was smiling—admiration and gratitude in the smile.

Teenie went into the house.

"You ha'e gotten the brawest lass in the twa counties, sir—and the best, if you only guide her right."

"I'll try, Habbie, thank you," said Walter with a

"MARCHED OUT OF THE ROOM."

he said heartily. Then in an undertone, as if it were a secret of deepest importance, "I'm going to make the best ballant that I ever made for your wadding."

"Hoots!" cried Teenie, and was passing into the house—rather displeased than otherwise to discover that her marriage was already the common talk of the town and district—when Habbie begged her to wait a minute. After pulling out several bundles of his songs, scraps of dirty paper, and bits of cord, he at last found the letters.

"That one's for you, and that for you, sir—from Miss Wishart."

Grace again! Teenie was ready to crumple the letter in her hand without reading it. Somehow short laugh; but he did not feel so light of heart as he had done a few days ago. That question of guiding her right—of guiding himself right—was a very serious one.

Teenie was up in her room reading the letter; it was full of kindly, generous thoughts. It told her that the writer was coming to see her, to offer help in the arrangements for the wedding; warned her that she was not to be distressed if she found the Dalmahoy family a little cold at first, and implored her to think of Grace Wishart as her true and devoted friend under all circumstances.

If Teenie had only got that letter before her interview with the Laird, she would have been pleased by it; she would have appreciated the unselfish nature of the writer, and she would not have been so much depressed by the scene at Dalmahoy. But receiving it now!—she felt pity in every word, and she hated pity. She did not want to be pitied by anybody, and least of all by her! She was inclined to resent the letter as an intentional affront, and yet she could not forget the brave self-sacrificing spirit of Grace; she could not forget the affectionate welcome she had received from her, and she could not doubt her truth. But all this upset Teenie, and put her out of humour. She had been accustomed to find things so straight and plain in the life she had hitherto led, that she could not understand people saying one thing and meaning another; and yet that was what the Laird had done. Radiating from him, all the world seemed to be condemning her for agreeing to become Walter's wife. Well, why did they not say it outright, and let her understand the position? She liked Dalmahoy for one thing—he had spoken plainly at last. But sniffs, and sneers, and foreboding shakes of heads, she could not understand them, and she hated the people who used them.

She had cried out to Walter, "I wish I knew what to do."

In her blunt way she pulled herself up, and asked the question—

"Wouldn't it be best just to say that I'll no have him?"

And so end it all. End it all?—how her poor heart trembled at that! and how blank and weary the whole world looked under that light! If she could only reach that something beyond the present life, that mysterious something for which she had so often looked far across the sea, which she never found, and never yet realised in her own mind, she might have ended it all. But he had come and told her of his love, and that had seemed to be the something for which she had been craving, until these doubts and warnings made her sensible that she had not yet attained the mysterious something for which she yearned; yet her heart craved for him, and she could not give him up.

She would not give him up. The fierce spirit which rebelled against everything like coercion, rose within her, and she resolved to marry him in spite of every opposition and counsel. Then came the meekness, and to her strange cowardice, when she thought of him, and of the Laird's words, that he would ruin all his future prospects if he should marry her.

If he should marry her! It was very hard for her who loved him so, to decide how to act, when he was so persistent in declaring that his whole happiness lay in her hands, that she alone could make his future bright and prosperous.

What did he mean, if it was not what she wished him to mean? She beat her hands helplessly, against the air; she cried for guidance and for help; and then the burthen of the old song returned to her—she loved him, and she could not give him up.

All this time Walter was waiting patiently to see her before he should return home.

"Don't think anything about what my father said," he whispered to her when she came to him; "it is his anxiety to see me comfortably placed that made him speak. We'll go up and see the house to-morrow."

CHAPTER THE SEVENTEENTH.

DRUMLIEMOUNT.

THEY walked up the hill together, toward the little squat grey church at the top. There was still a shadow lying across Teenie's heart, and the brightness of the day did not dispel it. She tried to hide it from him, and failed. Walter was making an honest effort to win her back to the old free and fearless nature.

Above them, a pale blue sky, diversified with mountains of fleece, fringed with bright silver; behind them, the sea, glistening white and green, heaving gently, and singing its song, which is always merry or sad according to the humour of the listener; the scrambling houses of Rowanden, and the ever-changing group of men, women, and children on the shore; the wind sweeping up with its salt savour from the sea, and whistling coldly in their ears.

Before them, a yellow tortuous road, hedge-bound, and winding over a hill that would have been bleak and barren, but for the small plantation of firs and evergreens growing around the manse—planted there to protect the house from the sharp blasts of "the razor."

The cottage which the new minister was to occupy was on the opposite side of the road from the old manse, surrounded by a thick hedge and a few evergreens, but unprotected by any trees, except a few apple-trees in the garden at the back. But it was a pretty place, of modern construction, and with many conveniences: it had been erected by a retired officer, who had lived only a few years to enjoy his residence. It faced the sea, and the front wall was covered with roses and honey-suckle.

The lovers walked leisurely upward. Walter made fun of the winding road and the hill, playfully telling her that it was an emblem of their future career—always a toil up-hill towards home; but he would be quite contented if he might walk always hand-in-hand with her as they were doing now.

"Are you sure you will always be content with that?" she said, looking at him quickly.

"Sure?"—he was going to answer lightly, but he saw that she was very earnest; and so he spoke gravely and tenderly : " As sure, Teenie, as a man can be of anything in his own nature. I cannot foresee, because I cannot understand, any change in my views on this subject. This is what I desire, this is what I seek—a simple life with you and my books, trying to do well ourselves, and trying to help others to accept life and its troubles humbly, hopefully, and gratefully."

" Did your father say anything more about—about me ? "

He did not like the question ; but he answered it frankly.

" Yes, he took me to task again last night, and repeated a number of unpleasant counsels and possibilities which are no doubt true enough to him, but they are not true at all to me."

" Why ? "

" Because we look at things from entirely different points of view."

Silence. He did not think it necessary to tell her how his father had spoken of her and of the engagement.

" It is all very well just now," the Laird had said, " the heat of enthusiasm and calf-love is upon you. But I tell you, I know what the world is, I know what human nature is, and you will repent. You will be sorry for having despised my counsel, when it is too late. We have not got into the millennium yet ; and human nature is much the same to-day as it was yesterday, and will be to-morrow. You think I do not understand your character ; but I do, better than yourself. You are as ambitious as the devil, and six months hence you will find this girl a weight upon your wings, utterly preventing your rising from the ground, and you will hate her. What do you say to that ? "

" I would say that, in regard to us, it is extraordinary " (smiling incredulously).

" Much worse—it's true," said Dalmahoy sharply. " However, you know my principles ; I have bothered myself more than usual over this affair. I don't like to be annoyed, and I won't be annoyed by it any more. Do as you please, only don't blame me. I have done my best to save you ; I have asked Grace, and she refused to help me ; I have asked the girl herself, and she refuses, which she would not have done if she had cared for you in the ridiculous way you fancy."

" She acted very bravely and honestly, sir ; she would have yielded to you but for me."

" Quite so ; I have nothing to say against her. I have done with the whole affair. Only there's a lesson I have learned from it—one is never too old to learn—and by which you may profit in your new career."

" Yes, sir."

" It is that Methven affair which has taught me the lesson—believe nothing that you hear, and only half what you see ; and then there will be a chance of your getting on comfortably through the world without offending your neighbours."

With that sententious utterance the Laird dropped the whole affair, and satisfied that he was duly consulting the greatest happiness of the greatest number—he as usual being in the majority—he turned to his own enjoyment.

Walter could not repeat all this selfish counsel to her. He opened the little wooden gate, and they entered the precincts of their future home. The workmen were busy in the house, painting, papering, and carpentering. The grandchildren of the old bed-ridden minister, whose place Walter was to take, attracted by the bustle, were romping about the empty house. One chubby little fellow was standing near the doorway with a yellow basin and a clay pipe, earnestly blowing soap-bubbles to his own intense delight, and occasionally cheered by the approval of his brothers and sisters when they happened to be near him in the course of their game of hide-and-seek.

This was to be the parlour and dining-room ; that was to be the drawing-room, with the window opening to the garden ; and here in the corner, with the two windows, one to the road and the other to the garden, was to be his study. Upstairs were the bed-rooms, small but cozy. And so on.

After they had explored the house, and acknowledged the grinning salutations of the workmen, they went out to the garden. Behind the house they had a good piece of ground for potatoes and cabbages ; and if they required more, the neighbouring field might be rented. In front there was a fair space of grass for bleaching and croquet, and as much space for flowers as they were likely to require.

They sat down, she on a garden roller, he on the edge of a wheelbarrow. Before them, the slope of the hill and the glistening sea ; behind them, the rose-covered cottage, and the little fellow blowing his soap-bubbles.

" We will be very happy here, Teenie ; don't you think so ? "

Up went a bubble, wavering in the inconstant wind, gleaming with all the colours of the rainbow—then suddenly falling upon the ground, a drop of soap and water.

" Ay, Walter, I hope so " (she used to call him Wattie in the old days of childhood).

" You see that tower there " (pointing to the stunted square tower of the church, with its wooden slits to admit air and to let out the sound of the bell) ; " well, when the bell calls the fisher-folk up from Rowanden, and the farmer-folk from across the moors, I want to teach them to come gladly as to a merry feast, and you will help me to do that."

Up went another bubble. " Eh, but that's a fine one ! " cried the child.

"I'll do what I can, but I'm no sure that I can be of much use to you."

Her eyes were gazing into his so anxiously; she did not know how she was to help him in the work he seemed to be so bent upon, but she wished to help him, and that was everything.

"I picture to myself such a glorious life, with you beside me, always ready to cheer me when my heart fails, always inspiring me with new courage and hope when I am, in my weakness, inclined to falter and halt."

"Bonnier an' bonnier, bigger an' bigger!" cried the child as another bubble, larger than the others, went up, and his companions cheered its bright ascent.

"But it's out already," cried one of the children, with much disappointment and reprimand in the tone.

"I couldna help that," cries the bubble-blower; "look at this one!"

"Of course, we must expect to have trials, and difficulties to overcome; nobody can escape them," Walter went on; "but we'll try to make them light to each other by sharing them bravely, and by feeling that our love endures, although everything else should fail us."

"Tsha! that's no a guid one ava," exclaimed the audience of the bubble-blower.

Her eyes were fixed upon him, the clear truth and love that was in her heart shining like sunlight on his face, and filling his soul with gracious hope and pleasure.

"You may be sure of that," said Teenie in a very low voice.

"That's grand!" cried the chorus of children as another big bubble floated up gently and disappeared in the air. That was the most successful of the experiments yet made.

"Heaven bless you, Teenie, for those words," he said fervently; "it is not easy for a man to oppose all who care for him, and who cannot wish anything but his well-being; yet I have been obliged to do that, and I have been glad and proud to do it for your sake. But it is an immense relief and satisfaction to know that you are content, and that you are resolved to brave all the dangers of the future with me."

"You're making a botch o't," ejaculated one of the boys; "let me ha'e a try."

Teenie looked toward the sea; she was remembering the angry thoughts which filled her mind yesterday. Was she content? She did not know. She felt nothing but that she wished to be his wife—that she would be devoted to him whatever happened, and she could not realise any of the trials and difficulties to which he alluded.

"You'll wonder at what I am going to say, Walter; but last night it came to me, and I cannot get the notion out of my head," she said, looking straight at him. "Grace Wishart was brave, and set you free when she saw that it was best for you; ought not I to do the same, when I see that it would be best for you?"

He was startled by this proposal, made so quietly and with apparently such mature consideration.

"But you cannot see that," he exclaimed;—"the positions are entirely different; you would destroy, not help me, if you were to forsake me."

"I wish I was sure of that," she answered dreamily, again gazing toward the restless sea.

The boys were sending up the bubbles in quick succession; they flashed an instant many colours in the delighted eyes of the children, and then went out.

"You cannot wish to make me miserable."

"No" (as before).

"You cannot wish to make me turn away from all the hopes I have cherished—from the work I have dreamed of doing, with you beside me to help and cheer me. You cannot wish that, and that is what would happen if you were to leave me.—I would think the whole world bad, and life not worth having."

His voice was subdued; but there was deep passion in his tone—in his face and his eyes as he bent toward her.

"I will never leave you, Walter, until I feel sure that you will be happier without me—that is what made me think of it; but I'm no sure that I would have been able to do it, even if you wanted me."

She smiled at her own weakness; and he was proud of it. He would have hugged her on the spot, but he was checked in time by a blithe shout from the children.

"Then we'll not speak any more about these unpleasant things. We'll just be sensible, and set quietly about our arrangements, and we'll settle down into a douce cozy couple before the honeymoon is out."

"But your folk are so set against me——"

"Hush!—you must not think that; besides, you are going to marry only me, not all my folk."

"But that fortune the Laird thought I was to have?"

"For my sake, Teenie, don't let me hear another word about that fortune, or it will drive me out of my wits, as I think it has done half the people of the county. What is it to us? we want nothing but one another, and, having that, all the money in the world cannot add to our happiness, or take away from it."

There was such a beautiful bubble went up at that moment; the bairns hurrahed and danced with pleasure, and watched it till it disappeared.

He made her so happy, because he told her just what she wanted to believe; and at the moment she really thought that her doubts were satisfactorily answered—that the future was made plain to her, a long life of loving companionship, full of joy because their love was so sure and true. What indeed should she care whether the Dalmahoy folk were set against her or not? she had nothing to do with them. Grace Wishart, who was good and brave and generous, was her friend, and had told her that she was right; why then should she think of anything but the bright sunshine that was falling upon her? Why should she hear anything but blithe songs in the minstrelsy of the birds around her, and in the distant roar of the sea which the wind carried up the height, modulated and harmonised by its journey?

She found new pleasure in looking round the place which was to be her home—in settling various details of arrangement, and in trying to remember the countless little odds and ends which would be requisite for prudent and thrifty house-keeping.

They went into the house to pay their respects to old Mr. Geddies; but this was one of his bad days, and his widowed daughter—mother of the bubble-blowers—who was his housekeeper, thought they had better not see him.

So they went down the hill together. The complexion of everything and everybody had changed to Teenie since she had gone up to Drumliemount. She was so happy that all the world seemed gay, and Walter the best and bravest gentleman that ever lived.

END OF CHAPTER THE SEVENTEENTH.

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—THE QUEEN'S INCOME.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, B.A.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART THE THIRD.

IT remains to add that gradually, during the reigns of George the Third and his successor, the charges of the Civil Administration were removed from the Civil List. On the accession of William the Fourth, the House of Commons openly agreed that the Civil List should be applied only to the personal expenditure of the Sovereign, and the king accordingly received a Civil List of £510,000 a year, subdivided substantially in the same mode as that of Her Majesty, which we have already quoted.

Two sources of revenue, in addition to the voted Civil List, however, still remain to the Royal Family. The reigning monarch of these realms is also Duke or Duchess of Lancaster, and the eldest son of the Sovereign is Duke of Cornwall by birth. The former of these, the Duchy of Lancaster, has been vested in the Crown since the time of Henry the Fourth. It was his private property when he took possession of the throne, and it was then, and has been ever since, kept distinct from the other Crown Lands, which are now surrendered to the nation. There is a Chancellor of the Duchy, who is a political officer, and who looks after the rents and royalties of mines and quarries, and other channels of income which make up its revenue, and who pays over yearly to Her Majesty's Privy Purse the net profits of the duchy, amounting now to £30,000.

The Duchy of Cornwall has vested in the eldest son of the Sovereign since Edward the Third bestowed the duchy on the Black Prince. If there be no son, the revenues are paid to the Crown itself. The income of the duchy arises chiefly from coal and tin mines and quarries, and from a compensation paid out of the Consolidated Fund in lieu of certain old duties. Its affairs are managed by a permanent council. The profits of the duchy have been considerably enhanced by the judicious management of the late Prince Consort, and amount now to £60,000 a year. The nation actually reaps the benefit of this sum, for when Parliament settled the income of the Prince of Wales at £100,000 a year, £40,000 only was made chargeable against the public revenue.

Let us now endeavour to ascertain the practical working of the system under which the Crown is supported in this country. The first point to be touched upon is the extent to which all the arrangements are penetrated with the idea of constitutionalism. The nation desires that there shall always be harmonious co-operation between the responsible Government of the day and the members of the Royal Household. This is effected by making the great officers of the Household—the Lord Chamberlain, Master of the Horse, and Mistress of the Robes, etc.—removable with every change of ministry. The scandal and friction which would be occasioned if a Prime Minister's conduct were always the subject of adverse and interested criticism from officials in daily contact with royalty is thus avoided, and the independence of the minister secured. Again, the nation does not wish so to endow a monarch that, on the one hand, his wealth may be applied as mere caprice or tyranny suggests, perhaps to the detriment of the freedom of the subject. On the other hand, the nation would be disgusted at the spectacle of an avaricious or penurious Sovereign, who hoarded his income, and so proved himself a dwarfed and unworthy representative of the majesty of the State. To counteract both tendencies, the Civil List is, as we have seen, divided into classes, the object for which the total of each class is to be applied being specified by Act of Parliament. In this way the maintenance of the desired amount of State pageantry and magnificence is insured. Finally, the actual issues in each of the classes are subject to the examination of a Treasury official, the Auditor of the Civil List, whose business it is to see that the prescribed total is not exceeded.

But this system, however beneficial and constitutional, certainly imposes on the country some correlative obligations. If the Crown, after surrendering all its landed property, receives in return an income so divided as to place only £100,000 a year at its absolute disposal, the remainder being appropriated under conditions which render any considerable economy impossible, it seems but reasonable that the country should make special arrangements for special exigencies. Hence it has always been understood that the nation will grant a dowry to a son or daughter of the reigning Sovereign, and will bestow pensions on the various members of the Royal Family. There is much to be said on other grounds, for these practices. A royal marriage may be an advantage to the State, by strengthening a national alliance already existing, or effecting a new one; or it may be the occasion of all sorts of political complications and trouble. In either case, it is of the last importance that any proposed marriage should, if suitable, have the sanction of Parliament; if unsuitable, its veto. Now the granting or withholding of the dowry gives to the House of Commons exactly the needed power.

If now we are asked to ascertain the cost of monarchy, the task is by no means difficult. Her Majesty receives, as we have seen, a Civil List of £385,000 a year. To this we must add £31,000, the revenue derived from the Duchy of Lancaster, and £17,000, the annual cost of maintaining the palaces in the occupation of the Crown (such as Buckingham Palace and Windsor Castle), which is provided for in a vote of Parliament. These items amount to £433,000. The Prince of Wales has £100,000 a year, of which £60,000 is derived from the Duchy of Cornwall, and £40,000 from an annuity on the Consolidated Fund; the Princess of Wales, £10,000; the Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Arthur, £15,000 each; the Princess Royal, or Crown Princess of Germany, £8,000; Princesses Alice, Helena, and Louise, £6,000 each; the Duke of Cambridge, £12,000; the Duchess of Cambridge, £6,000; and the Princess Teck and Princess Augusta of Mecklenburg Strelitz, £5,000 and £3,000 each respectively. These annuities amount to £132,000, and adding this, with the revenue of the Duchy of Cornwall, to our former total, we reach a total charge of £625,000 a year. Now the Crown Lands produce a profit of £375,000, and the other branches of hereditary revenue about £13,000, which sums are carried to the Exchequer. Thus the net result of the system we are discussing is that royalty costs the British taxpayer less than a quarter of a million a year.

Now taking Professor Leone Levi's estimate that the taxation of the working classes amounts to 12½ per cent. of their taxable incomes, and calculating the proportion which the cost of royalty bears to the general expenditure of the nation, we arrive at this result, that in the case of a skilled artisan with a taxable income of £100 a year, the maintenance of royalty costs him ninepence a year.

Such, then, is the outcome of the Constitutional Contract the nation has made with its Sovereign. Its every feature bears the mark of that spirit of compromise which is so characteristic of the English nation—the spirit which finds its expression in the saw, "The king reigns, but does not govern"—which gives the monarch a veto he is never supposed to exercise—which, in short, desires every act of Government to be the act of the Sovereign, and yet is sincerely distrustful of any other intervention of the Crown than is implied in sanctioning an Act of Parliament. Of course, arrangements carried out in such a spirit as this cannot be expected to excite much enthusiasm; on the other hand, they certainly disarm criticism. And this is just what has been achieved by the Civil List Contract. It works without friction, is thoroughly constitutional, and, moreover, has made it altogether impossible for a republican to attack royalty in England on the score of cost. Many of the criticisms which have of late years been directed against the Civil List have demonstrated this. They were felt to be trivial and pitiful, and, as a contribution to the discussion of the relative merits of royalty and republicanism, worthless. A logical republican would object to a king even if the Crown cost him nothing; an ardent propagandist of Divine Right would, we suppose, kiss the sceptre though he were beggared in maintaining it. But once grant that constitutional monarchy, however illogical in theory, is desirable simply because it works well, and it is difficult to see how it could be maintained more cheaply or more agreeably than by the Civil List.

In short, in this as in other matters, the nation has aimed rather at practical utility than at theoretic excellence. The result has been undoubtedly satisfactory. To the ordinary Englishman, proud of his country, and prouder still of its constitutional freedom, the Queen may be nothing more than the hereditary chairman of the Cabinet which governs the nation ; to the myriads of that greater Britain on which the sun never sets, the "great Empress" is a potentate whose personal will environs their existence, and whose influence is felt in every event of their lives. And it is the highest achievement of our "crowned republic's crowning common-sense" to have thus developed a government which is in unison with the sober ideas of practical Englishmen, and which yet furnishes that embodiment in a person, essential for the more enthusiastic loyalty and the more exuberant devotion of Celt, Hindoo, or Parsee.

ODD FISHES.

BY GREVILLE FENNELL.

"When found, make a note of."

THE general disbelief of the present age in monsters of the deep has received a cruel blow from Mr. M. Harvey, a Presbyterian minister at St. John's, Newfoundland, who has sent to England the photograph of a prodigious "devil-fish," called by Mr. Harvey a cuttle, but pronounced by the editor of the Field, in which it is figured, to be a calamary.

Frequent allusions to these monsters are made by old naturalists—of their fearful doings in detaining ships, sinking boat-loads of sailors, and carrying men from off the sands to devour them in some cavernous snuggerly in the deep. One of the most ancient of these accounts that we can trace says in reference to the seas near Smyrna: "There is a fish called a pulp, which floats upon the surface of the water like a slimy scum, and when turned appears to be an animal, with many long legs like that of a spider, and at each leg a ball full of liquor like water. It is of different colours according to the season and nature of the soil. It catches its prey with its legs, and frequently drowns men who have the misfortune to meet with it as they wash in those seas ; for it not only holds them fast with its long legs, but by diffusing a venomous liquor from its bags, deprives them of motion, and raises inflammations in the part it seizes."

Victor Hugo, in his "Toilers of the Sea," alludes to a creature of this character, and his account, as well as that of all who have preceded him upon the same topic, appear to have been put aside as the chimera of dreamy romancers, desirous to draw equally upon their own imaginations and the credulity of their readers.

But Mr. Harvey's description of the animal in question far exceeds that of the great French novelist, or of any of the ancient writers whose details have been long consigned to the limbo of fiction, but whose store-rooms we are now somewhat entitled to rummage, at least upon this and kindred subjects, and bring the results into the light of day.

The capture of this monster was made by three fishermen residing in Logie Bay, Newfoundland, three miles from St. John's, it having been entangled in their net. With great difficulty they succeeded in dispatching it and bringing it ashore, being compelled to cut off its head before they could drag it into their boat.

The body alone is eight feet in length, and five feet in circumference. The arms, ten in number, radiate from the top of the head ; and it is totally distinct from the European octopus, so well known in our aquaria, it having ten instead of eight arms, two of which, exceedingly elongated, are furnished with suckorial discs only at the extremities. The body, instead of being globular as in the common octopus, forms an elongated cone, and has been named by naturalists Ommastrephes. The mouth of the creature consists of a strong horny beak, exactly like that of a parrot in shape, and about the size of a man's fist. The two longest arms measure each twenty-four feet in length, and are only three inches in circumference, entirely cartilaginous, very tough and strong, and at the extremity are covered with powerful suckers, the largest being a little more than an inch in diameter. There are about eighty suckers on each arm, which tapers to a pretty fine point. Each of the eight short arms is six feet in length, and at the point of junction with the head is nine inches in circumference. The suckers have a denticulated edge, with a membrane in the centre, which the creature can retract at pleasure, and thereby create a vacuum. Thus directly a prey falls into its fatal embrace, the first valve that comes in contact, the membranous piston is set to work, a vacuum is created, and as it struggles to escape, it is brought in contact with more and more of the discs, and dragged within reach of the monster's mouth, its fate being sealed by aid of the powerful beak.

"No fate," writes Mr. Harvey, "could be more horrible than to be entwined by these clammy corpse-like arms, and to feel their folds creeping and gliding around you, and their eight hundred discs, with their cold adhesive touch, glueing themselves to you with a grasp which nothing could relax, and feeling like so many mouths devouring you at the same time. Slowly the arms, supple as leather, strong as steel, cold as death, draw their prey under the horrible beak, and press it against the glutinous mass which forms the body. The cold slimy grasp paralyses the victim with terror, as the powerful mandibles rend and devour."

The brute appears to be quite as black as it is painted, within as well as without, for it is described to have two tubes or funnels connected with the body—one for ejecting the inky fluid by which the cuttle darkens the water around it, when it is attacked and desires to escape; or may it not be when it desires to mystify and enshroud its victim, for the more ready discovery of which its long and waving arms afford such facility? The other tube is connected with breathing organs, which it fills with water, and by the ejection is enabled to spring backwards with amazing rapidity, while by rapidly opening and closing the arms it can rise in the water with great force.

Prodigious as is the description, and horrible as is the character of this embodied nightmare, this specimen is declared in Newfoundland to be but an infant compared with some that have been seen around those shores.

It is stated, from sources considered trustworthy, that some time ago two fishermen in Conception Bay encountered a cuttle, the body of which was sixty feet in length. It threw two of its tentacles over their boat, and had they not on the instant severed the arms with an axe as they lay over the gunwale, it would have dragged them to the bottom. A tentacle of this monster is in the museum at St. John's, which is thirty-five feet in length, broadening out like the blade of an oar towards the extremity, where it is nearly seven inches in circumference.

Other cuttles, of forty, forty-seven, and one of the almost incredible magnitude of eighty feet in length have come ashore but lately in those parts.

Well may Mr. Harvey exclaim, "Oriental tales of cuttles sufficiently large to throw their arms over a ship's hull, and drag her under water, may therefore have more foundation in fact than naturalists dream of."

But let us dismiss this ghastly wretch and turn to another odd fish, whose amiable disposition, according to Pliny and other writers, was thus exemplified:—

The Lake of Lucrin, so famous in ancient times, is now no more than a little pond about a hundred paces broad and a quarter of a mile long; it was anciently joined to the sea, although now several miles from it. "Here a dolphin which frequented the lake was fed with bread by a boy that went every day to school from Baiæ to Puzzuolo, that the fish became at length so familiar with the boy that he carried him often on his back over the bay." Oppion tells us, "he was an eye-witness of it, besides many more that flocked from all parts to see it;" and Solon affirms that "at last it was so common that it was scarce any more regarded as an extraordinary thing."

Sir Thomas Herbert, in his account of the dolphins on the coast of Zanguebar, on the east of the Cape of Good Hope, with studied seriousness tells us that "they much affect the company of men, are nourished like men, always constant to their mates, embrace with true affection, and are so tenderly affected to their parents that, when they are three hundred years old, they feed and defend them against hungry fishes; and when they die, carry them ashore and bury them."

Are we to presume that the above, like the prismatic fable of the dying moments of a dolphin, is coloured too highly?

"There is a sort of crab-fish so large that a man's leg will go into his mouth. They live most upon cockles, and have a notable way to get the fish out of the shell; when they see a cockle gaping, which they often do, they presently, by their claws, slip a little stone into the aperture so that the cockle cannot close its shell; and they pick out the flesh, with a great deal of dexterity." The same old black-letter which contains this, likewise has the fact that "there is a prodigious oyster-shell amongst the rarities of Holland, weighing 130 pounds."

Singularly enough, some contemporary writers were very hard upon the oyster story, while they swallowed the crab-fish. The former, however, has been long confirmed as true, and two of the shells may be seen publicly exposed at an oyster shop in Maiden Lane, which have since given rise to the almost transatlantic witticism, that such an oyster would take more than one man to eat it whole.

Here again we are approaching the repulsive nature of the cuttle tribe. "There is on the shores of Labrador a water-snake of so strange a quality, that whatsoever it touches it sticks fast to it, and by that means it gets its living. It is of a vast length, but can contract itself wonderfully. So he comes ashore, lays himself down close, and whatsoever stumbles upon him is caught by his glewy skin; then he whips away with it into the sea, and returns to his natural length, which is equal to a large cable." Harris adds a note to this—"There is another large water-snake, generally twenty-five or thirty feet long, and a yard in compass. One of them was found dead, twelve yards and a half long."

We find traces of another fish that affects a love of mankind, although strangely misnamed. "There is a fish called man-eater, which uses both elements. Its fins serve for stilts at land, as they do for oars at sea. It delights in beholding a man's face, and is valuable for a stone found in the head, which being stamped, and drank in wine fasting, cures the cholick."

OUT OF THE DARKNESS.

"GAZING OUT IN THE MOONLIGHT."

I SAT by the fire last evening,
 And the flames were flickering low ;
 The shadows that played on the chamber wall

Grew softer and softer, and faded all
 In the last expiring glow ;
 And the ashes fell like a fun'ral pall
 That is white with winter's snow.

I thought of the years long faded,
Of the love which had burnt so bright,
Which had glowed with a flame so wide and strong,
It had thrilled my heart with a grateful song,
And flooded the world in light ;
Which I thought—Ah, God!—would endure so long ;
And crumbled to dust in a night.

I thought of the lonely wifehood,
Of the long sad summers of pain ;
Of the bold brow darkened which once was fair ;
Of the name I had been so proud to bear ;
And he had been proud to stain ;
Of that final hour of blank despair,
And forgiveness given in vain.

I thought of the baby laughter,
Of the soft cheek nestled to mine,
Of the dear little feet that knew no rest,
And the drowsy cooings on mother's breast,
And the eyes whose liquid shine
Had smiled their last as the sweet lips prest
To the passionate pain of mine.

And up in my heart's great silence
Rose a terrible cry, "Alone !
Not only to-day, but for evermore
Till thy feet have struck the Eternal shore,
And the journey of life be done,
And the cross that Jesus carried before,
Is laid at the foot of His throne."

And gazing out in the moonlight
Where the graves of my darlings lay,
I thought how fair in the silver air
God's holy angels were watching there ;
And a whisper seemed to say,
"What He hath taken beyond thy care
Was in mercy taken away.

"If thou, His child, hast forgiven
Through the sacrament of thy love,
The Father, whose mercy is greater far,
As His wrongs are deeper than thy wrongs are,
That mercy is sure to prove ;
For the wee white lamb and the fallen star
Are His treasures alike above."

THEO. GIFT.

THE POETS OF THE SOFTER SEX.

IT is a somewhat remarkable fact that until the latter half of the eighteenth century Englishwomen can scarcely be said to have aspired to a place in authorship, more especially as poets. Neither the classical culture, of which they partook so largely in the great Elizabethan era, nor the example of a Vittoria Colonna and her tuneful sisterhood* in Italy, induced them to enter the domain of letters. One woman, and only one, Lady Elizabeth Carew, seems to have shown herself capable of writing verses worthy of notice in that age so fertile in men of genius. Towards the close of the last century, however, we find that many ladies became ambitious of literary distinction. Their names are chiefly found in connection with the celebrated Blue Stocking Club, and the most remarkable among them was undoubtedly Mrs. Hannah More. This excellent woman is now best known by her numerous prose writings, and by these she aided powerfully in preading sound religious and moral principles. But her earlier efforts were in dramatic authorship; and through the friendship of Garrick her tragedy of "Percy" had some success. Her verses were highly praised by Johnson. They show a great faculty for observation, and much good sense, but are wanting in the essential characteristics of poetry.

Female authors now began to grow more numerous, and the present century has never failed to produce women possessed of that aptitude for poetic feeling and expression which might be expected from their natural powers of "sympathy and insight."

Two Scottish ladies, who lived about the time we have been speaking of, have each bequeathed to us a short poem worthy to be classed with the imperishable lyrics of Burns. Lady Ann Lindsay (afterwards Lady Ann Barnard) was the author of the well-known and pathetic ballad of "Auld Robin Gray;" and Caroline Oliphant (Lady Nairn) wrote the equally well-known, and if possible more pathetic song, "The Land o' the Leal." "Auld Robin Gray" was composed about the year 1771 at Balcarres House, in Fifeshire, the residence of Lady Ann Lindsay's father, the Earl of Balcarres; but its authorship was not acknowledged till 1823, when Lady Ann wrote to Sir Walter Scott, giving a full account of the circumstances attending its composition.

Besides "The Land o' the Leal," Lady Nairn was the author of the popular comic song, "The Laird o' Cockpen," and of several other lyrical pieces. She was a beautiful and accomplished woman, and ever ready to assist in works of charity.

Mrs. Barbauld, the daughter of Dr. John

* A collection of poetry published in Italy in 1559 included the works of fifty noble ladies.—Handbook of Italian Literature.

Aikin, and joint author with him of the well-known "Evenings at Home," was a voluminous writer, chiefly in verse of a devotional cast. Her "Ode to Spring" and her "Hymn to Content" show much capacity for lyric poetry. All her works contain passages remarkable for tenderness and for sustained dignity. The following lines in her poem on "Life" have been thought worthy of a place in Mr. F. T. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury":—

"Life! I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part;
And when, or how, or where we met,
I own to me's a secret yet.

"Life! we've been long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather.
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh—a tear!
Then steal away; give little warning;
Choose thine own time,
Say not good night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me good morning."

These lines were greatly admired both by Wordsworth and Rogers. The former said that he would rather have written them than any of his own.

Mrs. Barbauld wrote little during her married life. In her widowhood she returned to literary work. But had then begun that career of virulent criticism which culminated in the disastrous attack on Keats. Mrs. Barbauld, no longer possessing the elasticity of youth, was so disheartened by an article full of bitter personalities in this periodical, that she threw down the pen in disgust, and wrote no more.

—"the Quarterly, Savage and tartarly,"

The most considerable poem hitherto published by a woman was the "Psyche" of Mrs. Henry Tighe. It is written in the Spenserian stanza, and both in the style and in the allegorical nature of the subject may be considered as inspired by the "Faërie Queen." Cradled amid the exquisite scenery of the county of Wicklow, the authoress grew up deeply imbued with the love of nature. Her faults are those of a youthful and fervid imagination; and when time had matured her judgment, and taught her to adopt a more condensed and chastened style, she would probably have surpassed even this beautiful and pathetic poem.

One of Moore's most touching songs was written to commemorate the attractive qualities and the early death of his gifted countrywoman. Seldom has a lovelier character been portrayed than in the lines——"veiled beneath a simple guise,

Thy radiant genius shone;
And that which charmed all other eyes,
Seemed worthless in thine own,
Mary."

Mrs. Hemans has also paid a graceful tribute to Mrs. Tighe's memory in her lines on "The Grave of a Poetess."

Miss Baillie, whom Scott loved to address as "Sister Joanna," comes next in order of time. Her plays were intended "to delineate the stronger passions of the mind, each passion being the subject of a tragedy or a comedy." It is probable that the attempt to make each play an exposition of one ruling passion injured their dramatic effect. However this may be, they proved to be wanting in the qualities which insure success in the acted drama. Even with the aid of Mrs. Siddons and John Kemble, "Basil," one of her best tragedies, only kept the stage eleven nights. Nevertheless they will amply repay perusal. Written in a simple and vigorous style, they show close observation of nature and character, and abound in lines which are admirable for thought and felicity of expression, —"What custom hath endeared,

We part with sadly, though we prize it not."

Or speaking of the aged countess in "Basil"—

—"Her nobler mind
Procures to her the privilege of man,
Ne'er to be old till Nature's strength decays."

Touches of pure poetry are frequent, such as the comparison of the beautiful and wayward princess in the same play to —"vapour from the mountain stream,

Which lightly rises on the morning air,
And shifts its fleeting form with ev'ry breeze,
For ever varying, and for ever graceful."

Miss Baillie was less successful in the lyrical pieces with which her dramas are interspersed. Though pleasingly versified, none of them rest in the memory. In the "Legend of Columbus" the fine lines occur beginning—

"Oh! who shall lightly say that fame
Is nothing but an empty name?"

Many of her fugitive pieces are very graceful and pleasing. Among them may be distinguished the lines to her sister, Miss Agnes Baillie, on her birthday, and the "Verses to our own Flowery-kutled Spring;" those on the death of Scott, bearing testimony to the tried friendship of many years; and the playful and well-known poem of "The Kitten." Miss Baillie, who was the daughter of a Scottish minister, and born in Lanarkshire, spent the last years of her life at Hampstead. She died in 1851 at a very advanced age, having enjoyed the friendship and respect of all who knew her.

But during the great outburst of poetic genius that marked the early part of this century, there is no name among female writers which can compare with that of Mrs. Hemans. This lady may be regarded with some justice as a feminine and Christian Byron. It is true that the mental unrest which had previously found expression on the Continent in "Werter," in "Réné," and in "Obermann," and which colours so strongly the writings of her great contemporary, is tempered in Mrs. Hemans by a firm religious faith. This faith irradiated the sadness of her poetry with the light of Christian hope and resignation, while "the land of souls beyond that sable shore" only appeared to Byron as a dim possibility. There is no doubt that this tendency to sadness was intensified by the personal history of the poetess. A marriage of affection in early life seemed to promise much domestic happiness. It ended in an estrangement apparently not caused by any fault of her own, and she seems to have given utterance to the deepest feelings of her heart in the exquisite poem of "Properzia Rossi."

There is no rule so generally applicable to literary criticism as that which condemns very popular writers to a period of neglect and depreciation, before they are allowed to take their justly earned place among our classics. This is peculiarly the case with regard to those who have won their laurels with ease and rapidity. Byron, Scott, and Moore lost their prestige almost as rapidly as they gained it, and are only now beginning to be appreciated at their real value. On the other hand, Shelley, and still more Wordsworth, gained the public ear by slow degrees. If we come to our living poets, many begin already to decry Tennyson, while Browning will probably retain the place on Parnassus to which he has so slowly and resolutely fought his way, though he still addresses the British public as those "who like him not."

By the prevailing melancholy of her writings, Mrs. Hemans has unquestionably lost somewhat with the present energetic and hard-working generation. A more legitimate cause for adverse criticism is the quantity of verse she was induced to publish, in which she dwelt over and over again on certain favourite ideas, the freshness and power of her treatment lessening at every repetition. But it was not for want of rich poetic gifts that she fell into these errors. Many of her poems are unsurpassed in intensity of feeling and expression. It was the age of "Annals," and in writing to order she was often weak and diffuse. Still, if we take away all that is unworthy of her genius, there remains a large amount of imperishable poetry. Where, for example, shall we find a more magnificent dirge than "The Treasures of the Deep," or a nobler poem than "The Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers," in which the rich imagery and terse and vigorous expression are worthy of the moral grandeur of the subject?

"The Battle of Morgarten," and some others among her odes, stir the spirit like the sound of a trumpet. The terrible pathos of "Ivan the Czar," the steadfast heroism of "Casabianca," and the stately grandeur of the solemn night-march from out the walls of Valencia, headed by the lifeless form of the Cid, all bear witness to her success in ballad poetry. "The Forest Sanctuary," Mrs. Hemans' longest poem, is full of beautiful thoughts beautifully expressed, and so are many among the "Records of Woman." Nevertheless, it is by her shorter pieces that she will descend to posterity. Those we have already named and many of her miscellaneous poems will live as long as the language. Filled with intense religious faith, with ardent patriotism, with home feelings and yearnings for domestic happiness, they will never cease to be dear to the true hearts of her countrymen and countrywomen.

Like Miss Baillic, Miss Mitford, and other female writers, Mrs. Hemans essayed the drama. Her plays are fine poems, but they had no better success on the stage than those of others of her sex. The very general failure of women in this walk (Miss Mitford's "Rienzi" being almost the only exception) doubtless proceeds from their want of a sufficiently extensive knowledge of the world.

To those who believe in the influence of race on poetic genius, it may not be uninteresting to note that Mrs. Hemans, though born in Liverpool, was of mingled Irish, Italian, and German descent. She died in 1835, at the comparatively early age of forty-one.

In a critique on the writings of Madame Emile de Girardin, M. de Ste. Beuve characterises Mrs. Hemans as "an English poet of high distinction, profoundly moral, full of natural sensibility, always clothed with imagination and veiled in modesty" (toujours revêtue d'imagination, et voilée de modestie). He then gives a French version of one of her shorter poems, and contrasts it as a style of poetry perfectly true, perfectly sincere, with that which is not so, or is only partially so. If for Madame de Girardin we substitute Miss Landon, the remarks of the distinguished French critic will be equally applicable. This lady, whose untimely death on a distant shore excited so much sympathy at the date of its occurrence, had an undoubted poetic gift. Unfortunately, she succumbed to the temptations which we have already noticed as leading Mrs. Hemans astray, and adopted a tone of morbid sentimentalism which soon became out of unison with the growing taste for a more robust and healthy literature. The best passages in her most important work, "The Improvisatrice," bear a close resemblance to some parts of "Lalla Rookh." They are very melodious and pleasingly versified, but neither in this nor in her other poems is there much to insure them from falling into oblivion.

Another name belonging to this time must not be forgotten. Caroline Bowles, who became the second wife of Southey, and watched over his years of mental darkness, was a graceful, unaffected, and pleasing writer. Her poems are marked by a "spiritual undertone," which harmonises well with her simple style and genuine pathos. "The Pauper's Deathbed" is powerfully impressive, and its unadorned dignity is well suited to the subject. We have only space for the opening and concluding stanzas :—

"Tread softly, bow the head,
In reverent silence bow ;
No passing bell doth toll,
Yet an immortal soul
Is passing now.

"Oh, change ! stupendous change !
There lies the soulless clod.

The sun eternal breaks,
The new immortal wakes—
Wakes with his God."

The sonnets appended to "Robin Hood"—a fragment which was the joint production of Southey and herself, and published after his death—contain touching allusions to his sad affliction, and are very beautiful. The poem of "Walter and William," in the same volume, and many others among her tales, may compare with any of Crabbe's for their realism, while they have an ease and grace of diction and a simple tenderness all their own. DOGS AND THEIR MADNESS.

BY AN OLD FELLOW OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

THE last serious outbreak of "rabies," more commonly known as hydrophobia, in England was in 1866. In that year no less than thirty-six people died of the disease. Great alarm was caused, amounting to something very like a panic. Most stringent measures were taken, a large number of suspected dogs being killed ; and the number of deaths immediately fell to ten in the next year, and to seven in 1868.

It now seems as if we were threatened with a return of the epidemic. The disease first appeared in the northern counties some six months ago ; but it has spread with terrible rapidity. Mad dogs have been seen and killed in almost every part of the country, and several deaths have been reported.

Within the last few weeks rabies has broken out in London ; and the danger is so far recognised that Colonel Henderson has ordered the police to destroy all stray dogs.

Now hydrophobia is without exception one of the most terrible diseases with which we are afflicted, although fortunately it is comparatively rare. Its terror lies in the fact that it is absolutely mortal, and that the death of the sufferer is peculiarly agonising. It is consequently to be regretted—especially at a time like the present, when the appearance of the malady has caused such a widespread feeling of alarm—that so many popular errors and misconceptions should exist upon the subject. Some of these I wish to clear away.

The disease, as at present known, is always communicated by the bite of a rabid animal—usually a dog, but sometimes a cat, wolf, fox, jackal, racoon, or even a badger, for all carnivorous animals are liable to rabies, and it is amongst them that it invariably originates. But to communicate the disease, the animal must be itself rabid when the bite is inflicted. The old superstition that if a man is bitten by a dog, and the dog afterwards goes mad, the man is in danger of hydrophobia, is altogether absurd, and gives rise to much groundless alarm. We might as well suppose that if our friend leaves us for South America, and there dies of the yellow fever, we are ourselves in danger because we shook hands with him when he left Southampton.

The bite of a dog is always a nasty thing, painful, and apt to fester and heal badly. But the bite of a dog in health cannot possibly give hydrophobia ; the animal must itself be rabid ; and under ordinary circumstances there is no ground for any grave apprehension on account of a bite, no matter how severe it may be. Even those who are bitten by a rabid dog will do well not to be seriously alarmed. In the first place, the bite, even if not attended to, does not by any means always result in the disease. Statistics, indeed, would seem to show that the chances of escape are almost as five to two, only forty deaths occurring out of a hundred persons bitten. But, besides this original chance of immunity, proper precautions go far to decrease the danger ; and if the wound is attended to by a skilled surgeon, the patient may make his mind comparatively easy.

But what is most important, especially for those who keep a favourite dog, is that we should be able to recognise the premonitory symptoms of the disease, and so secure the animal before it can do mischief.

To be forewarned is to be forearmed ; and at a time when hydrophobia is prevalent, those who are exposed to any risk of infection cannot be forearmed too completely. The symptoms of hydrophobia are very characteristic, and it is unfortunate not only that they should be so little known, but that so much misapprehension should exist as to their nature. There is, for instance, a common notion that a rabid dog is a furious beast, which rushes wildly about, attacking everything that comes in its way. This is altogether an error. Rabid dogs have before now died quite tranquilly; and in any case it is only in the last few hours of the disease that delirium and frenzy set in. It is also a very common mistake to suppose that the mad dog dreads water, and that no dog is rabid which can drink. This is, indeed, a peculiarly mischievous delusion, as it leads people to imagine that because a dog will drink, he cannot possibly be dangerous. On the contrary, the dread of water (hydrophobia), which is so characteristic in the human patient, is often entirely absent in the rabid dog, and a mad dog will drink eagerly. Mr. Blaine declares that, after twenty-five years of large experience as a veterinary surgeon, he cannot recollect a single case of rabies in the dog in which the poor creature manifested any marked dread of, or aversion to, water.

Rabies in the dog commences with the ordinary signs of ill-health. The poor creature is dull and unhappy, its eye is dim, its nose is hot and hard, and its manner is listless and dejected. Indeed, a sick dog is in many ways like a sick child. It betrays symptoms of malaise, is downcast, and anxious to be caressed and comforted. Here, however, is one of the most fertile sources of danger; for from the moment that a dog begins to sicken for hydrophobia, its saliva is infectious, and there is consequently nothing more dangerous than ever to allow a dog to lick the hands or face. The deadly virus may be absorbed in the very slightest abrasion of the skin.

The first stage is soon over, and to it succeeds the second, in which the distinctive symptoms begin to show themselves. Rabies in the dog, as in man, is a disease of the nervous system, due to or coupled with a morbid condition of the salivary glands, the saliva itself, the fauces or throat, and the adjacent parts. Hence it follows that, as soon as the premonitory symptoms of general sickness and discomfort are over, the more definite characteristics of the disease itself are almost unmistakable. The poor animal suffers from an irritation of the gums and teeth that makes him—something like a teething child—bite and gnaw at everything that comes in his way. He will gnaw at his chain, and at the woodwork of his kennel, or at the mat on which he lies. He will take up in his mouth and champ stones, straw, and pieces of dirt or filth. His teeth apparently pain him, and he will rub and scratch at them with his forepaws, as if a fish-bone had stuck in the gum and he were trying to get it out. But most significant of all is the change in his voice, due to incipient inflammation of the throat and larynx. The bark of a dog in health is clear and sonorous; the animal barks with ease—as it were, each yelp yielding a distinct and clear note. A rabid dog, on the contrary, utters a bark which, once heard, can never be mistaken—a sort of strangled, stifled howl, lugubrious in its tone, and uttered with an evident effort. It is not, indeed, too much to say that a skilled veterinary surgeon can detect a mad dog by its bark alone; and that the moment a dog's bark is altered in its timbre, the animal should be carefully presented to see if other symptoms are not present.

Nor is this all. Besides the inflammation of the throat, there is also the cerebral disturbance, which leads to a set of symptoms of its own, equally important and significant. The rabid dog is uneasy and anxious. He roams from place to place, seeking rest and finding none. He starts up suddenly and snaps at the air, as if he were vexed by phantoms. He watches intently imaginary objects, following them closely with his eyes, as if meditating a spring. Above all, he conceives a violent dislike to his own species, and the mere sight of another dog will at once drive him into an uncontrollable fit of passion. Hitherto he will have been sufficiently docile and tractable, obedient to his master's voice, anxious for the customary caress, and, if anything, more than usually demonstrative of his affection. But towards the end his restlessness increases, and he seizes the first chance of straying away from home. Wandering out into the street, he runs recklessly and listlessly up and down; his tail between his legs, his hair foul and bristling, his whole look haggard and woe-begone. The evil fancies which haunt him grow on him. Soon he becomes furious, attacking other dogs, horses, cattle, men—everything, in short, that comes across his path. In this, the last stage, the disease is only too apparent; further doubt as to its nature is impossible. As a rule the poor creature is killed, although often not before he has spread the disease over an entire county. If not killed, he soon dies in the natural course. His rage increases, but he becomes weaker and weaker. His legs fail him, paralysis sets in, and he expires in convulsions.

Such, then, is the course of the disease in the dog. With regard to it we ought especially to notice two things:—(1) That dread of water is scarcely if ever present. A rabid dog will, on the contrary, lap water eagerly. It relieves the suffering caused by his swollen throat. (2) That until the very last stage of the malady, and often even in that, the dog retains all his affection for and obedience to his master—nay, more, seems to be aware of his miserable condition, and to crave for help and sympathy. Indeed, in this respect a sick dog is, as we have already said, strangely like a sick child.

The lesson to be drawn from this is very obvious.

The moment a dog appears at all ill he should be suspected, more especially if he should have been bitten by a strange dog, or have the scar of a bite upon him. It is as easy to tell when a dog is ill as to tell when a child is ill. A dog in health is bright and animated, runs freely about, and carries its tail erect; its nose is moist, its tongue clean, its coat clear and "satiny," and its eye full of light and life. A dog that is out of health is the very contrary of all this; and the dog that is out of health when hydrophobia is prevalent should be at once secluded. In a few days either he will be well again, or else the distinctive features of the disease will have shown themselves, and further doubt will be out of the question.

What then is really all-essential is that those who keep a dog should watch him most carefully, to see that he is bitten by no other dog. But they should also watch his health, and note any alteration in his habits, however slight.

"But how if I am bitten," the reader will naturally ask, "either by my own or a strange dog?" The answer is a very easy one. If you have the least reason for suspecting the dog to be rabid, do not lose a moment. Go at once to the nearest surgeon; do not wait to send for him. On your way keep on sucking the wound, taking care to spit out all that comes into your mouth. If the place is where you cannot get at it to suck it, then you must squeeze it, or sponge it, or do anything else to incite it to bleed freely. If it is on a limb, put on what is called a tourniquet with a pocket-handkerchief or a piece of string, and a walking stick or a bit of firewood; and as soon as you are in the surgeon's hands, trust to him implicitly, and remember the good old lines—

Than run the risk of a greater still."

If a surgeon is not within reach, there are two resources, and two only—the knife and the cautery. Few people probably have the requisite courage to cut out the bitten part for themselves. But I venture to say this, that if any one who had ever seen a hydrophobic patient die, as I have, were to be bitten himself by a mad dog, he would take out his pocket-knife and, if possible, cut the bitten part away without a moment's hesitation. The pain of a cut is no very serious matter after all. We all know what it is; and any surgeon will tell us that to cut out a dog's bite is not much, if at all, more painful than to have a big double tooth pulled out. We may take it for granted, however, that few people will ever do this, and that fewer still will follow "Shirley's" example, and burn the place out with a hot iron. But there is a quick method of cauterising, used by Americans for the bite of a snake, and which I much recommend. If a Carolina planter is bitten by a poisonous snake, he pours gunpowder on the wound, heaps it into a little pyramid, and then flashes it, repeating the operation some four or five times. The process almost always secures immunity; and the poison of a deadly snake is so much more subtle and rapid in its operation than the saliva of a mad dog, that I confess I cannot but think that what is successful in the one case would probably be successful in the other. But then gunpowder is not always to be got, and we consequently have to find a ready substitute for it. The best of these, to my mind, is the solid lunar caustic, or nitrate of silver. Chemists sell now, at sixpence each, little sticks or "points" of lunar caustic fitted up in a wooden case, not unlike a patent pencil. You can carry one of these in your waistcoat pocket; and, if you are bitten, you have only to pull out your "point" and to at once apply it freely to the bitten surface. I myself have kept dogs for years, and I make it a rule to "touch" with lunar caustic every bite that I receive. It is so infinitely the best to be on the safe side.

I will conclude with a word of warning, and a word of comfort.

The word of warning is—Trust to no so-called "cures" for hydrophobia. No cure is known. The broad facts of the case are simply these. Of those who are bitten by mad dogs, comparatively few take or "contract" the disease. Of those who are bitten and escape, it will be found that the majority have treated the wound vigorously—or, as doctors say, "heroically"—cutting it out, or cauterising it severely. But of those who contract the disease, all die. No single case of recovery is upon record. I do not like to use hard names, but I know what I think of those who pretend to have a specific for hydrophobia, and who are willing to sell it. Trust in no quack remedy. The danger is too terrible to be trifled with. Go to the surgeon at once, if you can. If a surgeon is not within immediate reach, then use knife, gunpowder, lunar caustic—anything that will burn out or cut out the wound, and that you have the courage to bear.

The word of comfort is—Terrible as the disease is, it is yet, fortunately for us, very rare. For the last fifteen years, the rate of mortality from hydrophobia in England has been only one for every 20,000,000 of the population. The risk of being bitten by a mad dog is in itself small, even at such a time as the present, when the disease is more or less epidemic. And even for those who are so unfortunate as to be bitten, the risk of death, serious in itself, is vastly diminished if bold and vigorous precautions are at once adopted.

Of police measures intended to stamp out the disease, I have not spoken. I have rather written for those who may be, reasonably enough, alarmed at the recurrence of this terrible epidemic, and who may wish to know how to best protect themselves, and what errors to avoid.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTEENTH.

WHAT FOLK SAID.

THE preparations for the wedding proceeded briskly ; but the event was (happily for those most concerned) deprived of much of the importance it would have obtained in local eyes, by the excitement prevailing in reference to the Methven fortune.

The news of the million which had been left heirless, had dropped like a bomb-shell into the quiet life of Kingshaven and Rowanden, burst, and spread frenzy, enmity, and bitterness of heart around. Claims the most absurd were suddenly discovered and advanced ; relationships were made out in the most ingenious fashion ; and even trivial services rendered to the deceased were suggested as titles to a share, in the enormous wealth he had left.

Men and women, hitherto contented and happy with what they possessed, became inspired with feverish excitement, utterly dissatisfied with their lot, and ready to stake their last penny in the effort to win the Methven fortune.

If George Methven had devoted all his genius to discover how he might most severely punish those who had been harsh and unkind to him in his youth, he could not have formed a more successful plan than that of dying without a will.

The provost quarrelled with the bailies, the bailies with the councillors, and the wives fomented the disturbance, besides getting up a pretty ado on their own account as to their respective claims. The humbler classes were not behind their superiors ; hard-working fishers, sturdy tradesmen, joined the halloo, forsaking honest work for that purpose, and paying the penalty in hunger and a vexed spirit.

The Methven family had suddenly become as large as that of Adam himself. Old friendships were broken off ; family ties only rendered disputes the more bitter ; faces which had been jovial became eager and suspicious ; hearts which had been open to charitable and kindly thoughts were closed against all comers. Honest, God-fearing people, who had been always ready to help a neighbour in distress, became spiteful and vicious, each blaming the other for advancing groundless claims to the property, and so confusing the title of the rightful heir, who was always the person making the charge.

The fortune had brought a curse upon them, and rich and poor alike were unhappy in their eagerness to clutch it.

The lawyers smiled, and made hay whilst the sun shone ; they warned their clients of the hopelessness of their claims ; but the clients paid the fees, and insisted upon the investigations and appeals proceeding.

"Did you ever hear the like of that ?" cried Mrs. Dubbieside, flopping down on the sofa ; "they say that the girl Thorston is the heiress, and she is to marry Dalmahoy's son on the strength of it !"

"I'm glad somebody has been found to heir it, for I'm sick of the whole affair," returned the provost, who was fond of peace, and had been very much badgered in regard to this subject. Eager as he was to have a share of the money, he had been so tormented about it, that he was coming round to the sensible conclusion that a man with his carriage and lamps should despise and keep clear of the squabbles which were raging throughout the district.

Mrs. Dubbieside's fat person shook all over with indignation.

"You give me a dreadful stitch—you're such a coward, Dubbieside !"

"Maybe."

"I wouldn't be surprised if you meant to give in ; yet you know that your mother was Jean Methven's aunt, and what claim could be clearer ?"

"We'll see what the lawyers say."

But whatever doubts the provost might feel at home, he showed none of them abroad.

"The provost's an ass," growled Dr. Lumsden, the bailie ; "he pretends to think he has a chance, when he knows that my grandmother was full cousin on her father's side to the auld wife Methven. Let them come nearer than that if they can."

And so the strife went on ; and the only interest felt in regard to Teenie's marriage was inspired by the question, was she or was she not the heiress to the Methven fortune ? The ladies of course found time to express their amazement that young Dalmahoy should have chosen such a wife.

"A wild thing, utterly uneducated, and cannot play the piano !" exclaimed the banker's partner, thinking of her own three daughters, who had acquired three accomplishments at an Aberdeen boarding-school.

"I dare say he will think himself lucky if she should turn out to be the heiress," said Mrs. Brunton.

"Her the heiress!—it's perfect nonsense to mention it!"

"As like her as anybody, for it seems that it all depends upon the kinship with the man's mother."

"Take my word for it, the Thorstons will not get it," and Mrs. Shaw nodded as if she knew more than she cared to tell. The banker's lady had acquired a reputation for sagacity at a very cheap rate—she predicted the failure of everything and everybody, and as there are so many more failures than successes in the world, she was able to say, became known that Dalmahoy was opposed to the match. Report said he was to forbid the banns, and to disinherit his son. The falsehood of the report gave it relish; it spread, and magnified as it spread. Details of a dreadful scene between the Laird and Walter were confidentially exchanged at tea-tables and supper-parties. The subject had a special value at that time, for it afforded the honest folk a space of ground upon which they might be agreeable, however much they might wrangle over the question of the Methven heir.

"WILL YOU MISS ME WHEN I'M AWAY?"

"I told you so," much more frequently than her neighbours. She now predicted not only that Teenie would not get the fortune, but also that "she had no qualification for a minister's wife."

Mrs. Brunton failed to see why the fact of her not being able to play the piano should be so fatal to the girl's future, and with much self-satisfaction she remarked—

"There's more folk than Thorston's lass cannot play the piano, and live very well for all that."

It was a cruel stroke, for Mrs. Shaw had not the least sense of music, and had once mistaken "Tullochgorum" for a psalm-tune.

Interest in the marriage was vastly quickened when, thanks to the charming widow Smyllie, it

At Rowanden, the fishers, men and women, were every one on Teenie's side; even the young fellows, who might have felt some envy in losing all hope of winning the prize themselves, joined her cause, and proclaimed her the bravest lady in the county. She would have been just the right sort of wife, they thought, for one of the old Norse kings, who used to sail the seas so bravely that the legends of their prowess stimulated the youths with courage, and inspired in them a fierce spirit of enterprise, which often told with good effect upon a night's fishing when storms rose dauntingly.

This scandal was very bad for the young minister, and he heard enough of it to make him smart keenly. Enthusiastic, earnest, seeing in the work he had undertaken great possibilities for the noblest efforts a man can make, the fact of being the subject of petty gossip was extremely disagreeable to him. That it was false afforded him little comfort, for he knew that a man entering upon grave duties, such as his were to be, would lose much of the influence he should possess if his name were bandied about as that of one who had acted perversely or foolishly, according to the world's estimate of conduct.

Skipper Dan had not yet made up his mind whether to be pleased or sorry. In his own way he grinned over the "clashes" which were going about. The marriage-day was fixed, the preparations for it were progressing steadily; whatever folk might say—and folk would always say something—could not alter that fact.

Rough, uncouth giant that he was, nobody could guess the woman's tenderness with which he regarded his child, and so nobody could understand that Dan was not thinking at all about the grand match his daughter was making, but only about the difference there would be at the Norlan' Head.

"She wishes for't," he kept muttering to himself; that was the one idea he had grasped when first astounded by the Laird's consent, and he clung to it as if it were the only sure thing he could find.

As the day drew near, he thought much about the whaling expedition he proposed to make.

The only person who was thoroughly happy in the arrangements for the forthcoming event was Ailie. She was never done praising the old and the young Dalmahoy, and promising to the bride a long and prosperous life. To her the preparations afforded a ventilation for much suppressed energy. The grand dresses and their trimmings were sources of great joy; the "providing"—which is the bride's contribution to the effects of the future household, and in Scotland a most important affair, including linen, blankets, etc.—was to Ailie a supreme pleasure.

The woman was as vain and proud as if Teenie had been her own child; and she was determined that Dan Thorston's lass should go to her husband with as extensive a providing as even the provost's daughter could hope to have. So from morning till night she was busy: pawky to those who might be expected to give presents; extremely civil to those who brought them; sharp and contemptuous to those who failed to pay this mark of respect.

Teenie looked on, helped a little, objected a great deal; then laughed, and submitted.

CHAPTER THE NINETEENTH THE BRIDAL EVE.

TEENIE was restless and inconstant, now singing as blithely as a bird, by-and-by silent, gloomy, and fretful—she did not know why. She was going to marry the only man she ever cared for—that made her happy. But, on the other hand, there were weary, vague forebodings, threatening her married life with sorrow—that made her sad and irritable. And she did not know why! She would not think of that silly book of fate about which Walter had seemed so vexed; she could not think that Grace had anything to do with this uncomfortable feeling, and she did not like to think that the Laird's blunder or the folk's clashes could be the cause of her uneasiness.

The Laird had said he would not attend the marriage, but being reminded of his guiding principle, he had half agreed to Walter, and was wholly decided in his own mind, to attend, in order to stifle gossip, and to have the opportunity of making a speech. He was always ready to sacrifice himself to the greatest happiness of the greatest number, and he thoroughly believed that he was always doing so.

The Laird's family numbered four daughters and three sons. Their positions in the register of the family Bible stood in this order:—

Helen—Miss Burnett—age, something under forty. She was tall, had a long neck, a long head, and very sharp pinched-like features; very thin hair. She professed an utter contempt for matrimony; she was in fact almost viciously eager to be married under any circumstances. Whenever she heard of the marriage of any of those youths and maidens whom she had known as children, her customary exclamation was "How funny!" That was a general phrase of hers, uttered without the least meaning of tone or look, no matter how grave might be the subject of conversation. Indeed, she frequently contrived to startle people by using it on the most inappropriate occasions. She was beginning to feel that she must give up hope, and she fell back upon the consolatory thought that she had been too exacting in her earlier days, or that no man had appeared worthy to win her.

Alice—a giddy young thing of thirty-five, held in severe subjection by her elder sister, who deemed restraint necessary to save her from conduct which would be very foolish, if not wicked. Helen was very fond of her all the time she condemned her giddiness.

Agnes Mary—quiet and studious, disposed to deep depression of spirits, owing to religious fears, and self-doubts as to her acceptance amongst the elect.

Walter.

Jane—a dark, cheery little creature, who always saw the silver lining of every cloud.

Archibald—a sturdy fellow, who had studied agriculture, and was now a coffee-planter at Ceylon.

Colin—a shy youth, who was spending a few months at home, previous to beginning work as clerk in a London bank.

The members of the family at home during this crisis were Miss Burnett, Alice, and Colin.

Miss Burnett at first positively refused to see the future bride, but at length—whether yielding to natural curiosity, or to the tears and prayers of the “giddy young thing,” Alice, who was ready to hug and kiss and weep over anybody who was going to be married—she agreed to visit the Norlan’ Head, and her future sister-in-law.

“How funny! I suppose we must show some regard to this fisher-girl for poor Walter’s sake,” she said.

She always spoke of her brother as “poor” Walter.

Teenie received them civilly, but without the least pretence of affection, which was rather disappointing to Alice, who was prepared to go into ecstasies over her new relative, as she would have been over anything new—the stranger it might be, the greater would have been her delight.

“I am so glad to have a new sister,” she cried, embracing her.

But Teenie shrank back; Alice stood in dumb amazement at her unsympathetic manner, and Miss Burnett exclaimed severely—

“Alice, you are much too demonstrative.”

Alice recovered herself, and looking pleadingly at her sister—

“But she is so bonnie. I don’t wonder at Walter being in love with her, and I shall be so fond of her.”

Teenie felt a little annoyed, for they spoke of her as if she were some curiosity, or some wild animal exhibited for their entertainment.

“Can we do anything to assist you, Christina, in your arrangements?” said Helen, secretly eager to have some insight into the preparations of a young lady for the married state; and although the offer was made in her grimly polite way, she really meant it kindly.

“Oh! do let us help you,” cried Alice; “I would like it so much.”

“I see no way that you can help me,” answered Teenie, smiling faintly, and blushing while her heart warmed towards Alice; “there is nothing to do.”

“How funny!” ejaculated Helen, “I thought you would have been overwhelmed with so many things to do.”

“What kind of a dress are you to wear?” asked Alice; “is it to be white?—and have you got any lace?—I am so fond of real lace.”

“I don’t know yet,” answered the bride, disposed to laugh at this enthusiasm about a matter to which she had given little attention.

“Don’t know yet!—oh, dear! what a strange body you must be. I have thought ever so many times of how I should be dressed, and how I should stand, and how I would answer the minister. I’ve gone over it in fancy a hundred times, and the only thing I have not been able to realise is the man. You see nobody wants to marry me.”

“Don’t talk nonsense,” said Helen severely, having a fear that the credit of the Dalmahoy family was being sacrificed by her sister.

“But it isn’t nonsense, Nellie, or I’d have been married half a dozen times at least.”

“You are such a giddy young thing, Alice.” That was the usual termination of their little disputes.

Teenie showed them her “braws”—dresses, presents, and providing. Miss Burnett was dignified, but expressed gracious approval of all she saw. Alice was in ecstasies of admiration; she began to look upon Teenie with a humble kind of awe, as one who was about to pass into the perfect state of womanhood.

Both sisters left the house with a much higher opinion of their brother’s bride than they had entertained previously. But Helen could not resist the temptation to be slyly satirical when she selected as her gift a pair of fish-carvers.

Grace had been with her several times—not often; and yet she seemed to be always at hand when help or advice was needed—very quiet, gentle, and always with that smile which was all the more tender because of the shade of sorrow lying behind it. She seemed to be gradually winning Teenie to forget that story Walter had told her—to forget the peculiar position in which they stood towards each other and towards him.

Only there were quick flashes of Teenie’s eyes upon the pale face of her friend when she thought the latter did not see, and these glances suggested that Teenie was not forgetting, but remembering the more acutely, the more the other’s devotion was revealed to her.

The day previous to the marriage: afternoon. Grace and Ailie had persuaded Teenie to try on her wedding-dress (the first time), and she was standing in the middle of the little room, face flushed, eyes bright, heart beating quickly, and conscious of an uncomfortable feeling that she was far too grand.

“You look beautiful,” said Grace simply.

“She does that,” echoed Ailie, standing with arms crossed, and each hand clutching an elbow; “there’s an auld fisher by-word that we say to lads when they’re going to marry—“Put your hand in the creel, Get an adder or an eel”— meaning that they’ll get a wife that’ll sting them, or one that will slip through their fingers; but Maister Walter will get just as braw a wife as he could wish for. But she’s no right yet; she wants that bonnie sash you brought, Miss Wishart—where is it?”

Ailie went off in search of it.

Teenie crossed the room, closed the door, and fastened it. Then she turned round, looking at Grace with such clear, honest eyes, but with an expression of distress in them.

"I'm no happy—I'm no content—I'll no be able to go on with it," she said agitatedly.

"With what?" exclaimed Grace, startled by her words and manner.

"You should have worn this dress," she went on rapidly, "the morn should have been your wedding-day—not mine."

"Teenie!" (reproachfully).

"I say it again, it should have been yours, not mine. I cannot believe it's so near; I cannot believe that it's real. I've been waiting every day for something to happen that would break it off—I've been almost hoping something would happen."

"But why should you hope for that?"

"Because of you."

"Me!" Grace drew breath, then softly—"That's hard, Teenie."

"I did not mean to hurt you," was the impulsive cry of the girl; "I'm always doing what I don't want to do. I mean that you would have been better for him—that you are suffering; and you are so kind, and that makes it the worse."

Grace was very pale, but after the first moment of sharp pain and surprise, she was able to understand the passionate feeling which prompted the girl's words, and to sympathise with it. She was calm apparently. Two steps brought her close to Teenie; she reached up her hand, and rested it on the girl's shoulder.

"I will not seek to hide from you, Teenie, that you have pained and vexed me; but it is just as well that we should speak out to each other at once, because I want you to be my friend, as I want to be yours, and we cannot be real friends so long as there is any doubt between us. You have been thinking about me, and you have forgotten Walter."

"I wish I could forget him, it would be easy enough then to run away from all this fuss and worry."

"Well, you see that you care so much for him, that you cannot run away from him" (laughing good-naturedly), "and so you are very cruel to him when you think he ought to marry somebody he does not care for."

"But he does care for you."

"I hope so, but not in the same way he cares for you."

"And you like him."

"Yes, very much, and always will."

"And I come between you, and vex you and his father, and all his folk, and by-and-by he will be sorry too."

"You must not say that—and you must not think that; if you were to leave him now, I could not accept a man who I knew wanted somebody else to be his wife. You would not do that?"

"No."

"Very well; and I, thinking of his happiness, like him well enough to be able to say, 'Marry Teenie whom you love, and I am content.'"

"I could not say that, and if I did say it I would be sorry after; will not you?"

Grace was taken aback by the directness of the question, and she began to feel her patience a little exhausted.

"I cannot answer for my future feelings; but I promise that you shall not be disturbed by them."

"I am sorry I have vexed you," said Teenie, beginning to take off her dress, "but it has been a sore trouble to me to feel that I have come between you and him, and that I have angered all his folk."

"You must think of him, Teenie, and not of others."

"I'll try."

They parted—an eager desire for friendship on both sides, and yet both conscious of something which rendered perfect trust and confidence in each other almost impossible.

Teenie threw aside her wedding-dress, and put on her ordinary gown. She went out, despite Ailie's desire to try the effect of the new sash; and seeing Dan, she called to him—

"Come, father, I'm going for a sail; maybe it's the last we'll have together."

The skipper followed her down to the bay. She shouldered an oar, and marched over to the cobbles. The tide was high, and the boat was floating. She sprang in, and used the oar manfully to push out from the shore. They passed from the sheltering arms of the bay, and the prow of the boat swung round to the tide. She shipped the oar, and leaning over the gunwale, her hands caught the waves at every dip of the boat.

The skipper stood up against the mast, arranging the sail, and the red rays of the setting sun fell aslant the boat, crimsoning her face, and the water where her hands touched it. Above were great mountains, with bright copper peaks and borders; in the west, the sun, a ball of fire touching the top of the Grampians; around them, the cold green sea, chequered with brilliant red lakes. The keen gusts of wind, and the plashing of the waters, rendered the stillness of the evening more palpable.

A boat passed them slowly, sailing into the harbour of Rowanden. Its occupants were three girls and two youths; they had been out at Davies Bay, seeking mussels for bait. The girls were singing a song common among the fisher-lasses, to a slow tune which kept time with the rise and fall of the boat:—

"Oh, gin I was married!
I've a' thing weel prepared.

"I've sax new chairs and a table,
A guid kail-pot and a ladle,
A braw new bed, and a cradle
To rock some wee body in."

The voices of the singers were mellowed by the wind and sea, and the commonplace character of the words was lost in the beauty of the surrounding scene.

The boat floated on, the voices faded away in the distance, and Teenie suddenly raised her head.

"I wish I was like them, father."

"What for?"

"They are so happy and content."

"Well, what should hinder you being the same?"

"I don't know; but I am not the same."

She was thinking what a simple life these girls had before them; to mend the sails and nets, to get plenty of mussels for bait, to have something tasty for the guid-man when he came home, and to see him safe in from a stormy night's fishing—that was all their care. With the usual blindness of people who wish to be something else than what they are, she did not think of the times when their guid-man did not come home safe from the storm, but some friend appeared with the news that the boat and crew and nets were all lost. She saw only the shadows of her own position, and did not balance them against those of others.

"Can we no sail out, father, and sail on across the water, and never come back any more?" she said, her hands playing fondly with the waves.

"What are you hawering at?" exclaimed Dan, amazed and puzzled by this whimsical humour.

"I want to get away to see the far countries and the strange sights you have told me about."

"You're a woman, and you're gaun to be married the-morn."

Dan mentioned that fact as an infallible remedy for all absurd fancies.

"I wish I was a man."

"What better would you be?"

She did not reply. The boat rose and fell lightly with the waves, which gurgled merrily against the prow as it cut its way forward. The sun dropped behind the distant hills, and in the gloaming the face of the water changed to dark green, and deepened in colour as the light faded. The copper clouds became black, and floated threateningly overhead. A distant sail crossed the horizon; a steamer, with its long-tailed comet of smoke, passed far out at sea. The lights of Kingshaven glimmered upon the water, and the lamps of the white tower showed brightly in the darkening night.

Teenie felt happy; the exhilarating breeze, the surge of the sea, the motion of the boat, and the solitude were very pleasant to her. They cleared her head, and made her forget all the petty doubts which had been afflicting her; they soothed the restlessness which had disturbed and frightened her.

She passed to the stern swiftly and steadily. Dan was steering and minding the sail at the same time. She "couried" ("knelt" scarcely expresses the movement) down at his knees, and peering up into his face in the uncertain light, she whispered—

"Are you sorry about the-morn, father? will you miss me when I'm away from the Norlan'?"

He dropped the rudder, and the rope with which he managed the sail; he gripped her by the arms, and the big frame of the man shook with emotion.

"My bairn!" he said hoarsely, "it's like rugging the heart out o' me to let you go; but you wish it."

"Then I'll not go."

"Havers!" he growled fiercely, catching up the rope and the rudder again; and, utterly ashamed of his own brief display of weakness, he was ready to be angry with her. "We'se baith gang to the bottom if you dinna take tent. We'll gang in now."

She rested her head upon his knee, and did not speak. Occasionally his rough hand touched her brow, and passed through her hair tenderly, whilst the waves plashed against the boat and the wind whistled in their ears.

They sailed into the bay safely in the dark.

CHAPTER THE TWENTIETH.

THE MARRIAGE.

IT had been agreed that everything was to be very quiet—no crowd, no strangers, and no fuss at the marriage. So the only guests were the members of the Dalmahoy family, the minister, and two friends of Thorston's—the one an extensive fish-curer, the other a ship-owner—both having business relations with their host.

But Dan could not allow the event to pass without making some sign to his friends in the village; so he had arranged for a substantial dinner at the inn, where the lads and lasses might eat and drink, and then "shak' their foot"—that is, dance until they were tired—in honour of the occasion.

Rowanden was deeply interested. The fisherwives and daughters felt that a special honour was being paid to them in the marriage of Dan Thorston's lass to the Laird's son; and the men were not behindhand in self-satisfaction.

A number of flags were hoisted in various directions, and the boats in the bay were similarly decorated. There was a very hearty desire to pay respect to the skipper—as well as to his daughter—who had been so long regarded by the simple community as a kind of chief. Work was struck for the day; and even if Dan had given the most unmistakeable signs that there would be a "good shot," not a man would have gone out on Teenie's marriage-day.

Notwithstanding the enthusiasm in the village, everything was to be done quietly at the house.

Ailie was glorious in a silk gown—the first she had ever possessed; and she had never dreamed of such wild extravagance, but Walter had presented it to her—and a new white cap, the voluminous frills of which shook with her intense enjoyment. The skipper was brilliant in a blue coat with brass buttons, and he was too much occupied by the many matters requiring his attention, to have time for regrets of any kind.

The sun was shining grandly on sea and land ; there was not a cloud to shadow the happiness of the party.

Miss Burnett was arrayed in the latest fashion from Edinburgh. She was dignified and condescending, and young as ever. Alice was younger still, and quite playful in the delight with which she occupied the position of bridesmaid. Grace Wishart was rather pale, but quiet and helpful ; several confused arrangements were put into order by her, and nobody knew there had been anything wrong. She was principal bridesmaid ; and of all those who wished the bride a happy future, none did so with more fervour than Grace.

Teenie was very silent, often looking at Grace, but showing no nervousness ; she rather displayed that kind of defiance under which people sometimes hide great agitation.

Walter was grave, as if he were sensible of the serious responsibilities upon which he was about to enter. His brother, Colin Burnett, was the "best man," and he was as cool as if he had served an apprenticeship to marriage ceremonies.

The Laird came in the carriage, was received with loud cheers by some loons who had gathered about the doors, and he was gratified. He entered the house, and was somewhat disappointed at the smallness of the company, although he had himself agreed that things ought to be done quietly, and although he saw that the little parlour was pretty well crowded as it was. He was, however, magnanimous as usual, and waived all objections of his own in consideration for the majority.

Mr. Hutcheson, the minister of Kingshaven—a bald-headed and long-bearded gentleman, who had seen much of the world, and had settled down here for the sake of retirement and leisure, which he did not find—performed the ceremony.

"Do you take this woman to be your wedded wife?"

"Yes," said Walter very decisively.

"Do you take this man to be your wedded husband?"

"Yes," answered Teenie firmly, and almost as if her teeth clenched upon the word to give it emphasis, indicating that all doubt and hesitation were at an end from that moment.

Then came the prayer and the exhortation, the signing of the register and the "marriage lines," which were handed to Teenie, and it was all over. How little there seemed to be to do ! what a brief space it occupied, and yet what a difference it made ! There stood the bride and groom bound to each other—for life.

Teenie did not know any difference ; she felt a little shy and a little anxious, but she was just the same now as she had been half an hour ago ; and yet there was the man standing beside her who claimed the devotion of all her future years.

"How funny !" exclaimed Miss Burnett.

"It's so nice," said Alice, "and so simple—I wish somebody would marry me."

"I salute you, Mistress Walter Burnett," said the Laird, kissing her.

"Faith, I'll do the same," cried Colin, who, in right of his position as groomsman, kissed the bride.

"It's beautiful !" cried Alice, laughing.

Teenie rather shrank from these marks of favour, and she looked at Walter—her husband ; she felt timid as she thought of that, and wondered if there ever could be any mysterious authority which he should exert over her, that would make her feel indifferent to her father, and to all the old associations.

"Dear wife," whispered Walter, putting his arm around her in the presence of all the folk.

"Toots !" she cried, and sprang away from him.

The carriage was waiting for them : they were to spend the first few days of their new life in Edinburgh, and they were to drive to the Kingshaven station. They made a pretence of eating somewhat of the substantial lunch which Ailie had prepared, and then took their places in the carriage.

They were surrounded by a crowd of the fishers, their wives, and daughters, who had come up to the house in spite of the skipper's injunctions, and hailed the bride and bridegroom with loud cheers and blessings. Habbie Gowk rode through the crowd on his donkey, much flushed, and much more excited than was apparently necessary even on this occasion. Most surprising of all, he had none of his ballads in his hand.

"Wish you joy, sir—wish you joy, mem," he said somewhat thickly, but with a peculiar assumption of familiarity, and with even a degree of patronage, which was extraordinary in him, whose good-nature generally extinguished every thought of self ; "and you may wish me joy too, for what do you think——"

He paused, not for a reply, but to give greater effect to his words.

"What do you think?" he cried, looking all round him proudly, and then nodding to the Laird. "It'll please you to ken, sir, as it will my friends here, lawyer Currie has just tellt me that I am the heir to the Methven fortune ; and I am gaun to gi'e the biggest present of any to Thorston's lass."

There were astonishment and laughter at this half-drunken announcement. Then cheers, blessings, and old shoes showered upon the newly-married couple, as the horses moved slowly through the crowd.

"Hurray !" for Dan Thorston's lass, for the Laird, for his son, and for the Methven heir, as the missiles flew after the carriage, and guns were fired, and everybody was wild with delight. That was how they managed things quietly.

A MAD SWIM.

FTERNOON in Central Asia.

A splendid afternoon in the beginning of July, just toning down from the destroying heat of midday, into that soft voluptuous warmth which makes the do-nothing life of the East so enjoyable. Half a mile below me, the low grey sloping mud wall of Fort No. 1 lies hidden behind a bosquet of trees—the only trees within sight. Behind me, a few soldier-colonists are at work on their hay, watched with quiet contempt by two or three Kirghiz who are loafing about, “as the manner of the Scythians is.” On the farther side of the river a little reed-thatched hut, in front of which the Cossack ferryman is angling composedly, outlines itself against the boundless emptiness of the Kizil-Koum Desert; and in the dead universal silence the hoarse sough of the current is plainly heard, as it rushes by to its grave in the depths of the “Out-lawed Sea.” It is four days since news came to us (by a roundabout route, it is true, we being off the telegraph track) of the fall of Khiva; and I, having been a prisoner at large for nearly three weeks, am sitting on the bank of the Syr-Daria, and mentally arranging my notes upon that thick, mutton-broth-coloured “Clean River.”

It is Sunday afternoon, although in this unpeopled waste, where even a Russian church has never been built, there is little difference between one day and another. Allowing for the difference of time, it is just eleven in the morning at home. Far away in quiet England at this moment church bells are ringing, and crowds gathering together to pray; and some few are praying even for me, while I sit here in the heart of the desert, cut off from it all.

We are now forty miles due east of the Sea of Aral, and the Syr-Daria, reforming as it nears its end, has lost for the time being its pernicious habit of branching off into lesser channels. Far as the eye can reach, the broad smooth stream flows unbroken, with a strength and swiftness matching the outburst of its headlong youth from the glaciers of the Thian-Shan. A few miles more, and the old worn-out veteran will degenerate into three or four shallow, marshy, reed-grown ditches, only one of which makes even a pretence of being navigable; but at this point his concentrated strength is sufficient to task (as I have seen more than once) even the engines of a transport steamer.

The breadth of the stream I have already ascertained; it remains to make sure of its depth, and the swiftness of its current. Of these points the residents, as might be expected, know nothing whatever, and the only method left me is—to swim across. Query—Can this be done?

The Cossack soldiers tell me that it cannot, but then they have never tried. The native population of the village pronounce it flatly impossible, but they evidently belong to that large class of persons who consider everything impossible which they cannot or dare not attempt themselves. Moreover, although in these parts I am not an Englishman* (“very much the reverse, in fact,” as the refugee of ’98 said when asked if he were an Irishman), there is still enough of the old Anglo-Saxon leaven in my blood to make me fly at the throat of every “impossibility” by instinct. Nothing is impossible till it has been tried; and I make up my mind to try.

Whatever happens, I am not likely to be disturbed by too many spectators. Except the solitary fisherman on the opposite bank, there is not a living creature in sight. The haymakers have struck work, and gone off to sleep in what little shade they can find; the lounging Kirghiz have retreated to their tents in order to do likewise; and for miles on either side of the river the vast treeless plain is silent and lonely as the grave. Having satisfied myself that my clothes are tolerably safe from passing marauders, I plunge in.

A mad undertaking, beyond doubt, but not without a certain method in its madness. One does not bathe thrice a day in any river for weeks together without learning something of the ins and outs of it, and I have chosen my ground well. Just at the point of my plunge, a long spit of smooth firm sand juts out more than a hundred feet into the soft muddy bed of the river, like a patch of macadam in the midst of a clay road. All along it the water is shallow and the current weak, and so long as this bank lasts my work will be easy enough. What may come after, remains to be seen.

So on I wade through the shallow water, heading right across the stream, with the ferryman’s hut as a landmark. I have as much chance of keeping that direction to the end as of standing against a cannon-ball; but for the present the current cannot get a fair chance at me, and I “make my bee-line.”

By the time I have got half-way out along the spit, I begin to take in the general outline of my problem a good deal more clearly. There is evidently a strong current in the middle of the channel, but it sets towards the farther bank (deflected, no doubt, by the angle of the spit), and will probably carry me thither without much trouble. As for getting back again, that is a minor affair.

Meanwhile my proceedings begin to attract the attention of the contemplative ferryman on the other side, who has hitherto ignored me altogether.

The mere sight of a man bathing is nothing new in these latitudes, where every man, Cossack or Kirghiz, is only too glad to get into the water as often as possible. But none of them are in the habit of coming out as far as this; and, moreover, it is evident to him that I am in no hurry to turn back, and mean to go farther before I do. On the whole, he seems to think my farther adventures may perhaps be worth looking at; and perching himself on a convenient point, with his hand over his eyes, he begins to reconnoitre.

Deeper and deeper grows the water—first up to the knee, then up to the waist, then up to the shoulder—while the increasing strength of the current more than once almost shakes me from my footing. At last the middle channel is reached. I feel the ground sliding from under my feet, and make a plunge into the full swirl of the current. The next moment I seem to be lying stock-still in the middle of the stream, while the banks on either side are racing past like an express. Already the fisherman's hut, which was right opposite only a minute ago, lies twenty yards above me, and still the other bank seems a very long way off. Evidently the sooner I get over it the better.

Accordingly I begin to strike out with all my strength; but, although I have the current with me to some extent, it is no easy work. The reflection of the sun upon the water dazzles my eyes; and the coldness of the stream, so refreshing at the first plunge, now begins to make itself felt in a rather benumbing manner. Why does the bank keep sliding away as I struggle towards it? and why has that ferryman grown so unnaturally small all of a sudden, as he stands up to watch my head appearing and disappearing amid the lapping swirls of foam? Harder yet, for there is no time to be lost! Already I begin to feel a kind of tightening in my throat, and a strange creeping numbness through my hands and feet, which I know well how to interpret. Hurrah! we are nearing the shore at last. The broad brown line of clay below the tufted grass gets plainer and plainer every moment; and now I can see the flowers on the bank, and now the very creases of the reeds as they sway in the evening breeze—but still my feet find no stay. What if it be beyond my depth even under the bank, and if I should be swept down (as I have been elsewhere more than once) within arm's-length of the shore? Bah! what is the use of thinking about it? Five strokes more and I am among the reeds, and, thrusting my feet deep into the soft rich loam, stand upon actual ground once more.

Even now, however, my situation is anything but a promising one. I am up to the shoulders in water, under the rush of a current that well-nigh bears me down; while upon the high, sheer, slippery bank above me, beetling over at the top, there is neither foothold nor handhold to be found.

Start back across the river from this point I cannot, for, judging by the distance to which I have already been carried, I should in that case come out (if I ever came out at all) beside the fort itself, and have to walk back half a mile—a promenade which, even in these unfrequented regions, is not to be recommended. There is nothing for it but to wade up the stream, and I go to work accordingly.

Foot by foot, with my shoulder to the stream in order to give it as little surface as possible, do I fight my way along, the soft clay yielding under my feet, and the water swirling around me like a mill-race. Little by little the diminished hut and the dwarfed ferryman grow into their natural size, till at length I come opposite my original landmark again, and see the lean brown face and small deep-set eyes looking down at me in blank astonishment. Then follows a curious piece of pantomime.

The Cossack looks inquiringly at me, and then at the opposite bank, where my clothes are lying like a tiny white speck upon the broad green belt.

I reply by an affirmative nod.

Thereupon the prophet of evil shrugs his shoulders, and gives a shake of his long narrow head, to which Lord Burleigh's famous gesture is as nothing; after which he disposes himself to watch the end, with the same cool scientific appreciation wherewith some experienced Valerius or Cornelius of the later Empire may have watched the Sec or coming up with the flying Retiarius.

And well he may. The current which helped me in crossing is against me now; and the river, not yet crippled by its periodical sinking, is running in full flood. I have already been long enough in the water to be almost benumbed; and the sand-bank that aided me at the outset will be left far above me before I am half-way across. However, when a thing has to be done, done it must be, so I set my teeth and fall-to.

And then follows a prolonged nightmare, in which I seem to be always struggling my hardest, without advancing a foot. Through the water that splashes up in my face, I dimly see the opposite bank at an apparently hopeless distance, and seeming to get farther with every moment. If I could only turn over and float a little, in order to rest myself! But there is no leisure for rest now. My fingers are cold and heavy as marble, my limbs numb, and every muscle feels stretched and swollen, as if water had been forced under the skin. The veins of my temples throb painfully, and every breath that I draw seems choked as by the gripe of a strong hand. Already I am growing sick and dizzy, and everything seems to whirl around me, when suddenly the pressure of the current slackens—a sharp spasm of pain runs through me—and I become aware that I have landed on the head of a mud-bank, and that the sharp point of a projecting root is sticking in the flesh of my leg.

THE BUTTERFLIES.

"WENT CHASING BUTTERFLIES."

WORE ever Youth a fairer guise
Than Psyche chasing butterflies
Beneath the sky of June?

240—VOL. IX.

Unflecked by clouds the day so rare—
Unmarred by grief the face so fair—
Face, sky, and heart in tune.

Youth at its brightest—pure and good,
 With nothing harmful in the mood
 That lures her to the chase;
 With tripping feet, that nimbly pass
 Through fern, and rustling heath, and grass,
 A wavering course to trace.

Now just o'erhead, now out of sight,
 Those painted wings take zigzag flight—
 Now nearer float—but yet,
 Trip she as lightly as she will,
 From flower-poised rest they dart, and still Evade her upraised net.

Grave Reason, with rebuking eyes,
 That see no sense in chasing flies,
 Stands half aloof the while,
 Too much inclined the whim to twit
 That led her from his side to flit,
 To greet it with a smile.

And when she saddens at his frown,
 And drops her net, and sobers down,
 He will philosophise,
 And tell her life is far too stern,
 Too full of thoughts that throb and burn,
 For chasing butterflies.

He has not learned—have you? or you r—
 How much of teaching sweet and true
 Such joyous hours bestow.
 The heart that always keeps its youth
 Will also keep its hope and truth—
 Those gifts of long ago.

Such hours as these will Faith renew,
 Just as in childhood's days we drew
 Its emblems from the sky,
 Or flower or moss that grew around,
 Or shell or fossil that we found,
 Or bird, or butterfly.

The world of late has grown too staid;
 Too much with earthy crust o'erlaid—
 Too much with greed of gold;
 Or bent on probing mysteries,
 To all appealing to the eyes
 Is careless, or is cold.

But Psyche, 'spite her frolic face,
 When youthful fancies must give place
 To stern realities,
 Shall prove as sweet and true a wife
 As if she never in her life
 Went chasing butterflies.

LOUISA CROW.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBERY.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

At the time that my father died—it was in the year 1832—I was but a few weeks old. My mother was poor, even very poor, and when she—out of consideration for her orphans, to be enabled to give them a better education—married again, she soon sadly experienced how her new husband, though a good and honest man, could confer but little towards the alleviation of their depressing poverty. The quantity of necessaries of life, in food and dress, meanwhile increased also, and it was quite natural that one thought of trying how far the wings of the family members, considered ripe for self-sustenance, could be trusted into the world for the benefit of the juniors.

I was twelve years old when my mother considered me at that stage of maturity to work for myself, in spite of my terrible disadvantage, a lameness since my third year, in consequence of which misfortune I had to use a crutch under my left arm up to the period just alluded to. Still I was sufficiently strong and healthy. Very simple diet, and even that sometimes not sufficient to satisfy my hunger, a scanty dress, and an unfamiliarity with comfort had steelled and hardened me early, arming me against all the vicissitudes of climate. I went—to say the most—only three years to any school, and as my schoolmaster found I had an excellent memory, being able to learn by rote anything—even the Latin—then not yet understood by me—I soon thought of studying, and longed to become a physician or lawyer, the beau ideal profession in the eyes of the country folk in Hungary.

My mother, too, wished something similar, but before such hopes arose the insurmountable ranges of poverty. I was forced to descend, and step down low, and was apprenticed to a tailor, who worked for ladies. I might have attained there to such skill as to be able to sew together some yards of cotton-ware; but the feeling was roused within my breast that Dame Fortune might have destined me for the production of superior work, worth sewing together; so I left the work-shop of this artist, and took an engagement at the house of an innkeeper, as tutor to his son.

The subjects which I was required to teach were the elementary but hardest lore of reading, writing, and arithmetic. I had at the same time to do sundry small services about the house ; for instance, to clean the boots of the family on a Saturday evening, sometimes also to serve out to the over-thirsty customers a glass of wine or brandy.

Though my age was disproportionate to the office fallen to my lot—how could the yet uneducated be an educator himself?—the treatment I received from my employer was still more disproportionate to that which a mentor should have received. Yet it was my pupil himself whose behaviour was the harshest towards me. The lad was two years older than myself, and as my professional eagerness carried me so far one day as to rebuke his want of manners, the animosity of the lad was roused to that degree, that he turned with pugnacious daring against me, and I had to thank the accidental arrival and interposition of his mother, that it did not come to a serious breach of domestic peace.

Thus the schooling that I had to give became a hard one to my own self ; still I kept spiritedly my time of agreement to its end, and sped from the island Schütt, where I spent my childhood's earliest time, now with my hard-earned eight florins in my pocket, towards St. Georgen, in the neighbourhood of Presburg, to commence there in the Gymnasium of the Piarist Friars my course of studies.

The money I brought just proved sufficient for the purchase of the necessary school-books. Benevolent people aided me further on. In seven different houses I received in the seven days of the week my chief meals free, in addition to which I obtained from each family on their day a piece of bread for my breakfast, and one for my supper. The wealthier students presented me with their left-off clothes. By dint of industry, and earnest application to my studies, as well as by an inborn quick comprehension and tenacious memory, I gained at the public examination of the very first Latin class the position of the second best scholar. I felt a hearty pleasure in learning ; and as I soon learned to speak Latin fluently, this drew the attention of my teachers ; in consequence of which, much begun with hardship, in the commencement of my battling with life, was eased for me by benevolence.

I finished at the school of St. Georgen my second Latin class, also with distinction. But now the desire for travelling flapped its wings within my breast. I longed for change. My desire pointed towards Presburg, where a higher school existed, which at that time stood in place of a capital, being the coronation town of Hungary, and the seat of Parliament. In spite of my secured existence in St. Georgen, I left it then ; and the year 1846, at the completion of my fourteenth year of age, dawned on me within the walls of the ancient town.

New struggles, new wrestling with troubles, new and gigantic exertions awaited me here in my efforts for existence. It became to me clear from the beginning that with the number of the population, and the height of buildings, increases usually the difficulty of forming acquaintanceship, and in inverse proportion decreases the sympathy towards our neighbours. I stayed here three years longer, partly as servant, partly as teacher of female cooks, servant girls, and other individuals of the lower classes thirsting after knowledge. There is not a stone in the pavement of this small and pleasant-looking town on the banks of the clear-waved Danube, that could not tell some sad story out of this epoch of my existence, could it but speak.

Notwithstanding all drawbacks, I proceeded towards my life's aim straightly and courageously. I studied in spite of all privations, and belonged at the end of the very first year to the best scholars. What astonishes me now-a-days most, while reflecting on these days of evil, is the reminiscence of my gay spirit, the humour accompanying me through all sad conditions in life, carrying me through, raising me above all difficulties. My indestructible health strengthened me also for the struggle, and did not allow my native good-humour to desert me.

In spite of the simple fare, consisting of bread and water, I kept my healthy rubicund complexion, amused my schoolfellows and comrades during our time of play, and as soon as a half-year in our school closed, I was sure to be the first who took his travelling-staff, lame though yet on foot, often without a kreutzer in my pocket, travelling wherever it chanced to lead, into the wide world. Thus I visited Vienna, Prague, and other towns of the Austrian Monarchy. If it came to pass that I got rather tired in my wanderings, a humorous observation to a passing coachman sufficed to get me a lift for part of the way. At night I made it a point to call at the abode of the clerical gentleman of the place, with whom my speaking Latin gained for me both favour and a few kreutzers travelling expenses ; while well-timed and kindly-received courtesy and compliments towards their house-keepers filled my knapsack with provisions, lasting for the next day's wants.

I found, indeed, courtesy and good-humour ready coins in all climes. They keep up their value in the eyes of old and young, men and women ; and whoever has the command of courtesy and humour may consider himself rich enough, even with empty pockets.

These wanderings were the preliminary exercises of my later dervish travels. Whenever the end of the summer holidays bade me put down again my wandering staff into the corner, I did not feel particularly at ease. Whether my needy position may have been the cause of this, or the attitude forced upon me to baffle continually for bare existence, I could not say satisfactorily, but I know for certain that living in towns never proved an agreeable task to me. My entering again the rows of many-storeyed houses, the confined horizon surrounding me there, compressed my youthful heart sometimes painfully; and but for the prospective delight that, after the consummation of another year's scholarly achievements, I should again be able to roam through the endless empire of unfettered nature, nothing would have assuaged the gloomy spirit which ruled over my town life.

It was in the year 1847 when I first thought of commencing, besides the usual studies of the Gymnasium—all of which at that date were of a very unsatisfactory kind—private studying, learning by my own exertions the most miscellaneous literature of travel, which I eagerly devoured, and thus commenced the French language also. Besides my national mother-tongue, I had learned previously the German. Nearly at the same time I made myself acquainted with the Slavonic tongue also, and as I had to learn Latin and Greek in the school, wherein I soon became sufficiently proficient, I saw myself at the comparatively early age of sixteen in possession of several languages of the great mart of the world, so as to make hereafter the acquisition of tongues nearly related to those I already knew a comparatively easy task.

In the beginning, the learning by rote had a peculiar charm. Youth had no foreboding of the natural gift for languages. When I succeeded in raising the number of daily-learned words of any new language from ten to sixty, even up to a hundred, my happiness felt no bounds. Yet I have to acknowledge openly that I had no presentiment of the result towards which my success, however flattering to my vanity, would carry me.

Thus it came that I stepped by degrees from French to the study of the other branches of the Romanesque family of languages. I endeavoured with equal success, according to the same plan, to master the Germanic tongues, where my philological thirst led me to the English, and beyond it to the Danish and Swedish languages; the same with the Slavonic dialects. As my eagerness of learning, overruled by a sober plan, advised me to read aloud, and to hold with myself imaginary conversations in the just-learned languages, I succeeded to such an extent, that my youthful conceit allowed me to believe I had acquired in all these different tongues a perfection, sufficient to raise my self-opinion to a not unimportant degree.

Vanity, mostly a dangerous failing, can notwithstanding often become a very useful spur and encouagement. This overweening confidence produced by youthful fancy induced me not to leave the hitherto followed path of studying by self-exertion, but rather to complete my individual education in accordance with my personal inner calling. But in what direction? for what particular aim? will the kind reader ask. Indeed, I was myself unconscious of a satisfactory answer to that. Nulla dies sine lineâ was my motto and principle for some time past, kept in view faithfully, and followed practically; and though in the country I had as private tutor to teach often during eight to ten hours a day, yet the still remaining time sufficed for me to make considerable progress in my private studies.

The plan of monotonous dry learning by rote of several foreign tongues, was soon resigned for the enjoyment of their literary treasures. I drew freely out of the rich and promiscuous well of the productions of nearly every European nation. The bards of Albion and the troubadours of Servia, the songsters of Spain and the spirited poets of Italy; Lomonosoff, Pushkin, Tegner, Andersen, Oehlenschläger—nearly every muse of the present and past age filled up in succession my leisure hours. I always made it a point to read loudly; I wrote also—whenever particularly carried away by enthusiasm, awaked by one or other superior passage in the authors I read—and I expressed my feelings in words on the margin of the respective book.

The simple-minded neighbours may have thought me well-nigh crazed for this habit of mine, and I lost indeed on one occasion my place of a tutor, in consequence of this prejudice against my ways. But what did a critique of such critics touch me when I, wrapt up in my youthful dreaming, saw before me in a charmed state the combat before Jerusalem, in the spirit of Tasso, the heroic deeds of the Cid, or Byron's heroes and heroines? Yet I have to confess that the scenes enacted in the Orient had a spell over my soul that was nearly exclusive.

Asia, then removed from my sight, yet hovered over my spirit, but in the richest gold-embellished, pearl-and-diamond-beset costumes. Who fares differently in youth who reads the "Thousand and One Nights?" How could it be different with me, who by origin and education am myself a semi-Asiatic?

Asia was known to me as the land of the most richly-coloured adventures, as the home of the most fabulous fortunes; and as I spent my early youth under adventurous circumstances, and already longed after fortune and success, what would be more natural than that my first longing for the far-off should lead me early in the direction of Asia?

To be able to satisfy this yearning soon and easily, I deemed it necessary in the first place to make myself acquainted with the languages of Asia, and commenced with the Turkish. This Turanian dialect placed, in consequence of its relationship to the tongue of the Magyars, less difficulties in my way of mastering it than to any other Western man. More difficulties beset me in learning the strange characters of the Turk without teacher and without explanations. Whole days long did I draw them with my walking-stick in the sand, until I grew acquainted with the importance of the points, the signs of discrimination, deciding the correct pronuaciation of letters and words.

Unluckily I had the disadvantage not to possess any dictionary; the high price was far above my means (Bianchi's was sold for well-nigh forty florins); and as I could fathom the meaning of single Turkish words only by the aid of a correct translation, it happened that I learned a whole volume of great dimensions (it was Wickerhauser's Chrestomathie) with wrongly supposed meanings, which I had to unlearn, and to remember afresh with the corrected sense. Such bitter and necessarily occurring misfortunes met my autodidactical endeavours more than once; but what difficulties—what hard tasks could ever baffle successfully youthful thirst for knowledge and enthusiasm?

By that time I had reached my twentieth year of age, and had, for all my surmounted troubles, a most rich recompense in finding that I was able to read and to understand the whole of a small Turkish poem—the first yet—without any aid of a dictionary.

It could not have been the spirit of the Oriental muse—which I could not have fathomed yet—that had inspired me so much; it was rather the first sweet fruit of earnest exertion which presented me with so rich a remuneration; and this became again an encouragement, that led me in my further progress to the conquest of learning in the field of Oriental science. All my thoughts, plans, and endeavours concentrated henceforward sympathetically in the Orient, enticing my whole being with thoughts of its brightness. My spirit, by anticipation, hovered already in the fairy fields of the East.

Travel in the East—a voyage to a land hundreds of miles distant—is for every one within Europe, who still has to battle for existence and daily bread, a very bold idea. I will not deny it, that even the more venturesome flights of youthful enthusiasm—the irrepressible desire to see foreign lands and customs—are stayed by the stumbling-block which poverty laid in my way; and it was for a long time that this image—the creation of my fancy—had to hover before my eyesight, ere I could think on the carrying out of this plan. But bold determination always appeared in my fate much like an avalanche rolling down from the highest pinnacle of an Alpine range; it ever required but a slight snow-flake, which, set in motion by a favourable breeze, soon increased to a mighty mass, when it crushed and burst every impediment besetting its path, and continued its course with uncontrollable might. Such a start was given to me by the patronage of Baron Joseph Fötvös, a gentleman whose literary genius was acknowledged throughout Europe. This noble countryman of mine was of slender means himself, but his influence gained for me a free passage into the Black Sea.

The baron himself most liberally spent on my voyage a modest "obolus," and a few laid-off garments; and I had, thus provided, soon my knapsack packed with books, and the steamer Galatz floated down with me on the mighty Danube, whence I continued my travel to Constantinople, the interim goal of my wanderings.

THE OLD WATERCRESS-WOMAN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EPISODES IN AN OBSCURE LIFE."

HUNDREDS of persons in London live on green-stuff—Nasturtium officinale. The statement has a startling look, and yet it is literally true. I do not mean that they eat nothing but watercress, but that if it were not for watercress they would have nothing to eat. Its consumers think of it only as a condiment, but to its itinerant retailers it means food, and everything in the way of subsistence. When I call this fact to mind, I look with respect on the pretty "cresses of the brook" I see flowering white in my country rambles—on the shallow, oblong, artificial cress-ponds to be met with round London, especially in the neighbourhood of the eastern section of the North London Railway. Watercress, speaking generally, is the support of the feeble. As a rule they are very old or very young voices one hears quavering, "Wa-atercrease, wa-atercrease—fine fresh wa-atercreases!"

In fine weather, in spite of the general squalor of the street-retailers, it is rather a pretty sight to see them flocking out of the great watercress market with their verdant basketfuls and armfuls, freshening their purchases under the sun-gilt water of the pump, splitting them up into bunches, and beautifying the same to the best of their ability to tempt purchasers. The fresh green and even the litter of picked-off wilted leaves pleasantly remind one of the country, in the midst of our dusty, dingy drab wilderness of brick and mortar; and there is something bird-like in the cress-sellers' cry as one after another raises it. It cannot compete in music with the Newhaven fish-wives' "Caller ou!" as heard floating about in Edinburgh at dusk, but still there is in it something of the same character.

But in bad weather, on keenly or dumpy cold mornings, when people who can afford the time struggle between the blankets as long as possible, making to themselves all kinds of ingenious hygienic excuses for getting up later than usual, and shirking their matutinal "tub," or at any rate "taking the chill off" its cold water to an extent which converts it into warm—on mornings when even those who have fortified themselves with a meal to face the outside air, and are sufficiently clad, hurry along snappish and blue-nosed, or stop to clap their hands across their breasts, and stamp their feet to warm their tingling toes—it is pity-moving to see the cress-sellers crawling to their markets through the raw glimmering-gas-lit gloom. Some have been shivering all night, others feel the cold all the more on account of the fetid heat of the filthily-crowded lodgings from which they have just turned out. How they huddle together like numb, dumb cattle—cluster round any spark of al fresco fire—even throng pale patches of the dismal gaslight on the pavement! How covetously they eye the white mugfuls of smoking-hot coffee that are being gulped—the thick slices of bread-and-butter that are being munched! How they wheedle to make their few halfpence of stock-money go as far as possible—how they beg for ever so little stock, as a loan or gift, when they have no stock-money! Although, as Herbert sings, what hopelessly toothachy viands do their goods seem on such a morning—what chilblainy work the splitting-up and tying-up! What a doleful castanet accompaniment the poor creatures' teeth play to their cry! I know that it is rubbish to rail at a man for enjoying the wealth which he or his fathers have somehow or other earned—at any rate got—but still when, on such a morning, I think of a self-satisfied, succulent, spotlessly appointed, well-to-do, middle-aged Englishman coming down, in fur-bound velvet slippers, a staircase kept at an "equable temperature" by double windows and warm-air pipes, from a luxurious bedroom and dressing-room to an abundant breakfast, aired newspapers, and toasting boots—and see at the same time a host of half-frozen scarecrows, young and old, scattering to try to get the barest crust by the sale of their green-stuff, I cannot help wishing that the snug gentleman referred to could, just for once in a way, be forced to change lots with a cress-seller—to open his eyes a bit—to teach him a little real human sympathy—to show him that he is not the marvellously liberal gentleman he fancies himself, simply because he subscribes a few never-missed guineas to well-advertised charities. Perhaps he considers it a duty incumbent upon his respectability to have family prayers. No blame to him—far the opposite—if he even only tries to be sincere, and not a pompous would-be-pious parrot.

"Most herbs that grow in brooks are hot and dry,"

On a spring Sunday morning, the heat of which would have been almost tropical, had it not been for a tempering east wind, I chanced to find myself in Regent's Park just after the bells of neighbouring churches had finished tolling in to morning service. Grass and leaves were out in virgin green. Enclosed corners blazed with big golden dandelions. White and purple lilac were in almost full blossom. Chestnut-trees, too, were spired with precocious pagodas, and the blossom-buds of the famous hawthorn-trees were bursting.

Dusky heavy-fleeced sheep stood grazing, lay dozing, or moved along lazily upon the wide sunny lawns, and the shadier green sloping banks of the brown canal, in which dogs, big and little, were splashing, swimming, or whining to be pulled out by the ears, or the nape of the neck—glossily-matted masses of moist misery. Other dogs, amongst them noble black retrievers, and fawn-coloured and brindled black-muzzled mastiffs, were racing hither and thither across the dry warm grass, some in bewildered quest of their masters, whose shrill whistles they heard; others simply to have a scamper, a roll upon their backs, and then a head-long gallôp back to their masters. The heat had excited some of the water-fowl also, for instead of gravely paddling about, the livelier ones rose from the water with a splutter, flew about calling one another, and then flopped into the water again with a splash and another “quack—quack—quack.”

A rumour was abroad that one of the elephants or a rhinoceros was taking a bath. A little rush was made to the railings of the Zoological Gardens. Little children were perched upon the top of them; small boys shinned up them; small men held on to them. Cabmen stood on the tops of their cabs, watercart-men on the tops of their watercarts, drivers of waiting waggonettes on the box-seats of their vehicles, and with craning necks peered into the gardens, from which the passer-by too lazy to cross the road could hear ever and anon an asthmatic snorting and a ponderous splash, followed by a high-mounting sun-gilt spray. Other sight-seers “on the cheap” peered into the gardens at the turnstiles, wondering how the few neither rich nor rare personages—not a whit better dressed than themselves—whom they saw wandering about within, got there.

Over the gate of one of those grounds-surrounded Regent’s Park villas, which make a country-loving built-in cockney break the tenth commandment—covet his neighbour’s nest-like house, and no mistake about it—hung a venerable man of twenty-five—a white-headed, white-stocked young footman, in full fig, conversing nevertheless, in his Sabbath morning condescension, most affably with a knot of acquaintances in Sunday best, but still in the footman’s eyes vulgarian mufti.

An open carriage, drawn by a pair of spanking bays—their assiduously groomed skins gleaming like horse-chestnuts fresh from the husks—drew near, and the venerable young man at once turned and fled towards the house, looking not unlike a startled white rabbit scurrying to shelter as his head, shirt, and calves glanced through the screening shrubs.

The friends in mufti dispersed more leisurely, and then turned to watch the dashing equipage dart in through the gateway about which they had been clustered. When they resumed their walk, there was pride in their port, as if they too, in some indefinite way, belonged to the aristocracy.

A few carriages, for the most part hired, ground round and round. A few equestrians pounded round on their hack chargers, with sad countenances. But most of the people in the park were on foot, or seated on the benches, or lolling on the grass, gazing, meditating, smoking, reading books and newspapers, love-making, or quietly enjoying doing nothing. There was a curious medley of people present—soldiers in gay uniforms; paupers in their snuff-coloured Sunday suits; servant-girls out for a holiday; nurse-maids and patresfamilias wheeling perambulators; sisters of orders; elder sisters of families; hard-worked mothers, in charge of frolicking little ones; old bachelors moping like herons; young foreigners walking four abreast, and talking and laughing loudly; hearty groups of working men, who met other groups, and saluted one another with such affectionate greetings as “Well, old Mouldy, and how’s yourself?”

But there were scarcely any of those hateful young roughs who do their worst to make places of popular resort in London hideous, as they roll or rush about, shouting out their obscenities and blasphemies and idiotic laughter at the very top of their harsh voices. It was too early for them, I suppose. They are as cowardly as they are unclean, and cannot pluck up courage to annoy until they have still farther muddled their confused faculties with muddy beer, or have dusk to cover their retreat when an attempt is made to make them pay for their outrages on the commonest decency. When I hear people “high falutin” about English civilisation, Christianity, fair-play-loving manliness, the shoals of young London roughs rise to my eyes, ring in my ears, and I preserve a non-respectful silence.

The park, on the whole, was sunnily silent. The people in it, if they were keeping their Sabbath in no higher sense, were at any rate harmlessly enjoying a morning of rest.

I had just taken my feet from a bench beneath a hawthorn-tree, and risen to go away, when an old basket-bearing dame, seeing the seat vacant, came up panting and placed herself and her basket upon it.

There was no begging ad misericordiam tone in her account of herself as we entered into conversation. Deplorably poor though she manifestly was, in spite of the neatness and the cleanliness which characterised her remnants of raiment, she looked as if she would be offended by a proffer of alms, or a simulated wish to buy watercress unsaleable according to the ordinary laws of supply and demand.

"Good mornin', sir," she said cheerily, when our little chat was over. "It does a lonely old body's heart good to have a decent word spoke to her, when there's nothing to be got put on it."

A week or two afterwards, I noticed that the decent old body cried her green shuff in the street in which I lived. Very likely she had cried it there for many a year, but I had not happened to notice her before.

If people far more worthy of notice, according to their own conventional notions, than my poor old watercress-woman, only knew how little they are noticed by their neighbours in this everybody-for-himself London—unless some accident makes their existence interestingly recognisable—perchance there would be a little less self-conceit in the world.

No extravagant outlay of capital was required to enable one to become a regular customer of old Peggy's.

I do not know why I called her Peggy, except because she wore a very faded neckerchief-like plaid shawl, such as those the Welsh milk-women in London wear; and I remembered having seen, when a boy, a Glamorganshire old Peggy milking ewes in such a shawl.

Besides her "creases," this old Peggy sold little bunches of worm-like radishes, tiniest posies of wall-flowers and stocks which some benevolent gardener had enabled her to make up out of his refuse, and mittens and patch-work kettle-holders of her own manufacture.

She was always neat, clean, cheery, reticently "independent," and very fond of children, who were very fond of her. She wanted to give her posies to them, instead of selling them.

When my little ones noticed her tired look—they always swarmed to the front door when they heard her cry—they wanted her to come in "to have something;" but a glass of water for herself, and a freshening for her "creases," was all that even those little wheedlers could prevail upon her to take.

One foggy day in November, however, when she called, she was so faint and chilled that she nearly dropped upon the doorstep. The youngsters then fairly lugged her in, and carrying her off to the kitchen, took possession of her. They could not manage to lift the kettle, but in other respects they "made tea for her all by themselves," pouring out and carrying to her the tea, making and buttering her toast, and so on. The poor old soul, who had been overcome by hunger, fatigue, and cold, recovered, and after a time chirped away as cheerily as ever.

"Yes, dears," she said, "your papa is right, I am a Welshwoman, and little did I think when I came up to make my fortune in London, before ever you were born or thought of—or your papa either, almost—that I should ever be as lonely as I am now. But God has been very good to me. I've had a good husband, and good children, and I've nursed their little children. But they're all gone now—to heaven, or else beyond the seas. But you see God is so good, He gives me kind friends yet, like you, my sweet pretty pets. I must be goin' now. I don't know when I shall want to eat anything again, after such a tea as you've given me; but, you see, if I don't sell my creases, I shan't have any stock-money for to-morrow."

The children would fain have cleared out her stock, paying for it "out of their own money-boxes," but this she refused to allow. She would only sell the number of bunches she had been accustomed to leave at the house, and then took her departure. Her cheery face was never seen in our street again.

In the spring, noticing a strange cress-seller there, I asked her if she could tell me what had become of her predecessor.

"Oh, Mrs. Griffiths, you mean," exclaimed the new watercress-woman, when I had described the old dame. "Dead an' buried afore Christmas, pore ole thing. She went to the markit one bitter cold mornin', an' the cold struck to 'er 'eart, an' she jest come 'ome an' died. Not a friend she'd left—lived 'em all hout. I mean as belonged to 'er, for heverybody as knew 'er was well disposed to 'er, pore ole thing. Though she 'adn't a penny in the world to bless 'erself with, she'd do a good turn for anybody."

SILVER AND GOLD.

EVER a word said you or I,
Never a thought we told;
Surely if speech be silver, love,
Silence is pure, pure gold!

Silent as we could be we stood,
Love in our eyes unbidden

Came, as each looked in the other's face
Thrilling with something hidden;

Thrilling with something ne'er to be said,
New and yet centuries old;
Speech may be silver ever, love,
If silence like this be gold!

IN HONOUR BOUND.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIRST.
THE DIVERSION.

THE fishers gave one grand cheer for all the bonnie ladies of Dalmahoy and Craighburn, which was cunning bands, or rolled up in the familiar knot at the back, and tied with a bit of bright ribbon. They were singing the "Boatie Rows" in capital marching time, arms linked in arms, bodies and acknowledged with smiles and gracious bows—Miss Burnett crying in high falsetto, "Oh, how funny!"—Alice clapping her hands in ecstacy, and begging to be allowed to follow the folk wherever they were going.

Then the crowd moved off in an irregular procession toward the inn. Habbie Gowk led the way, bestriding Beattie with a jauntier air than ever the provost himself displayed when whirling along in his carriage and lamps. He was followed by a group of youths and maidens—the former in loose blue trousers, coloured shirts, and sparkling neckerchiefs; the latter in blue or red striped petticoats, little tartan shawls worn with a certain coquettish grace, and bare heads—hair plaited in steps swinging to the tune. The next group were busy "daffing" (jesting), and hauling each other about from one side of the road to the other in a wild way.

"Let me be," cries strapping Peg Johnstone, as a stalwart young fisher gripes her round the waist, and kisses her without the least regard to observation. She whirls herself good-humouredly out of his grasp into the arms of another swain.

"Do you no wish it was your wadding, Jean?" says Gleyed (Squinting) Tam, leering at the bright girl beside him.

"Deed do I, so bein's it was the lad I wanted," replies Jean frankly.

"Wouldna I do for you?"

"Whan you ha'e gotten rid o' your gleyed e'e, and whan you're skipper o' twa boats, speir then," says the qucan, with that characteristic frankness which would be accounted rudeness elsewhere, but which here only provoked a hearty laugh at the expense of the lad.

He took it in good part, and, joining in the laugh—

"The boats I'll manage, but what has a gleyed e'e to do wi' 't?"

"I would never ken when you was looking at another lass, and when at me."

"Oh, but you would make my e'en grow straight, they would sit so steady on you."

"Will you sweer to that?"

"I'll try," was the somewhat cautious answer.

"When's your day to be, Tibbie?" says Tak'-it-easy Davie, reputed to be the laziest fellow in Rowanden.

He left his patch of garden entirely untended one season; but it happened that in the previous year he had so carelessly "lifted" (dug up) his "tatties" that he had left more than enough in the ground to form seed for the coming season. Consequently, without having put a spade in the ground, he had an excellent crop of potatoes. The neighbours were amazed; but Tak'-it-easy Davie simply observed, "There's naething lost by laziness." Another of his sayings was, "Procrastination is the mother of invention!"

To his question, Tibbie, a somewhat dowdy girl, with a rather severe expression, replied—

"My day?—the-morn come never."

"That's a long while."

"Is't?—but though, it's nae longer than when you'll bring hame a guid shot."

"That's because the shot turns out as the Lord wills, guid or bad."

"You lippen ower muckle to the Lord's will, Davie, and do ower little yoursel'."

"It'll no be sae wi' you, Tibbie, if you're to get a man—you'll ha'e to do a heap for yoursel'."

The girl tossed her head, cast a look of scorn upon the jiber, and pushed her way forward into pleasanter company.

The groups which followed were composed of older but not a whit sedater folk. Sturdy matrons whose backs had become bent with years of creel-bearing—creels full of fish to sell to the farmers roundabout, or creels full of mussels for bait, carried up from the rocks and sands of distant bays, and then patiently "sheeled" (taken out of the shell) for the guidman—were as brisk and merry on this day as if they had travelled backward in the path of years, and found themselves young and marriageable again.

The jokes were not quite so simple or quite so modest as those of the younger folk; the elders were bolder, and ventured on many coarsenesses which an unwedded lad or lass dared not have uttered. The freedom was not vicious, however; it was thoroughly good-natured, and it was mingled with serious discussion as to the price of fish and of provisions generally, with sad references to the loss of tackle on the fishing stations, a grumble at the water-bailies, or at the deficiencies of the harbour, and an occasional exclamation of good wishes for the couple whose bridal they had met to celebrate.

As the last of the crowd descended the hill, Skipper Dan turned to the Laird.

"You might come down and see the folk at their diversion," he said; "it would please them, and it'll do you nae ill."

"With pleasure," exclaimed Dalmahoy; "it is one of my greatest delights and privileges to share in the amusements and daily concerns of the people."

So when the ladies had been satisfactorily settled in the gigs—Grace drove herself—and had started homeward, the Laird and the skipper, Colin and the minister, proceeded to join the fishers at the inn. Ailie followed, after hastily putting things a little to rights in the cottage.

The scene was homely; it was made bright and happy by the spirit of thorough enjoyment which prevailed. The pleasure of the moment was the dominant power in every heart, and voices were loud and faces were full of smiles.

A long room—or rather two rooms in one, for a wooden partition had been removed for the occasion—was divided by a long table, which was laden with huge rounds of roast and boiled beef; greens and potatoes, and a favourite dish known as "scratch" (chopped potatoes boiled with suet, and mixed with oatmeal); bottles of whiskey side by side with bottles of "sma' yull"—a thin pungent liquor, very different from the washy stuff generally sold as common beer. The order of drinking was to take a glass of the whiskey neat, and to wash it down with half a tumblerful of the ale. The most frequent demand at the inn was "half a mutchkin" (of whiskey) and a bottle of sma' yull.

The room had a low roof crossed by strong beams. The walls were covered with a dingy brown paper splashed with flowers, which had been once brilliant yellow and scarlet, but were now oppressively dull. Above the mantelpiece was a painting—"The Port of London." It was a busy scene, crowded with ships and smacks, all nicely balanced one on top of the other, and looking as if in imminent danger of toppling over. The sky was a rich washing-blue, the water streaky blue and white. But the genius of the artist had been concentrated upon one grand effect, the representation of a man standing up in a small boat, his shadow reflected in the water. It was wonderful how he stood on his head, for you saw as much in the water as out of it, of the man, the boat, and the oar, which nobody held (the man had no doubt dropped it when he stood up to display the shadow); the whole suggested that the artist, moved by an inspiration, had turned the canvas upside down, and so produced this marvellous effect.

There was another picture, an old engraving of Buckingham Palace—the glass broken, so that the paper was black with dust. The walls were further ornamented with the glaring show-cards of different brewers, indicating that there was no partiality on the part of the landlord. The ale which he supplied was from a local brewer who had no show-card, but it was very good ale for all that.

Places were scrambled for and taken without the least regard to precedence, except that certain lads wanted to be beside certain lasses, and that the skipper, Dalmahoy, and the minister occupied the head of the table, whilst Habbie Gowk took his seat at the foot, thus electing himself croupier, or vice-chairman of the feast.

One ruddy-faced dame, who felt weak after the excitement of the previous proceedings, helped herself to a glass of whiskey, muttering at the same time—

“Whatsoever we eat or drink, may we do it all to the glory of——”

She swallowed the remainder of the sentence and the contents of the glass. She was perhaps a little hypocritical, but she was not in the least ribald in asking a blessing upon her dram; mere habit had more to do with it than anything else.

The minister asked a blessing—he had discretion enough to be brief—and the company proceeded to pay the highest compliment to their host by eating with good appetite, and with much relish, if somewhat noisily.

“Choots, man! your fingers are a’ thumbs—gi’e me the knife,” cried Red Sandy, snatching the carver out of the hands of the young fisher, whose mind was too much occupied with Peg Johnstone to permit him to pay proper heed to the joint before him.

Half a dozen smart girls waited at the table, and the guests helped themselves so freely that they were speedily served.

“Gie’s a whang o’ beef here,” was the most frequent exclamation, and the business of eating progressed rapidly, amid much clatter of knives and plates and palates.

The eating finished, steaming toddy was served round in yellow jugs. Glasses were filled, and there was a general health-drinking, which necessitated the rapid and repeated filling of the glasses—much to the satisfaction of the company.

“Here’s to ye, skipper,” shouts Habbie from the foot of the table, adding with the air of a man who felt that he was the equal of any other, if not better, “and here’s to you, Laird—and to you, minister; may nane o’ us ever see a waur day than this.”

That was a toast in which everybody joined very heartily.

“And here’s to the new minister o’ Drumlie-mont, and the bonnie lass he’s married,” cries Habbie again, pleased with any opportunity to refill his glass; “may they ha’e many bairns, and never ken an empty pot or a cauld hearthstone.”

There was great enthusiasm at this, and sly interchanges of the sentiment between the lads and lasses at the table. The skipper nodded and drank, looking pleased. The Laird felt that it was incumbent upon him to say something, and he rose to his feet.

“What’s wrang noo?” whispered several voices.

“Whisht! the Laird’s going to gi’e us a toast,” answered others; and there was silence.

The Laird cleared his throat, and was distinctly heard in every corner of the room. He spoke with much suavity, a little becoming hesitation, and with some degree of gracious condescension to equality, behind which lay a sense of personal superiority that nothing could affect.

The present was an occasion of very great importance to him, and of very deep interest. In the first place, his son had that day gone through the most solemn and most binding ceremony of life—in fact, he had been married, and married to the most charming and most winning girl in the county, the daughter of his good friend Thorston. [Boisterous cheers and Hear, hear’s.] Although his own conduct in this matter had been somewhat severely criticised—nay, condemned by certain members of his family—

The Laird smiled and bowed.

He had no doubt that he would get over it; indeed, he was sure he had got over it, for he hoped—nay, he believed—that the people of Rowanden, whom he had had the pleasure of feasting with on this auspicious day, and whom he had now the pleasure of addressing—he believed that they would regard his conduct in this affair as another of the many proofs he had given that he trusted and respected the People, and that he adhered firmly to the principle with which he had begun his career—of the usefulness of which they were the best judges—that the greatest happiness of the greatest number ought to be the ruling thought of all action, social or political, public or private.

There was vast enthusiasm evoked by this noble sentiment; the cheers and the clatter, and clinking of glasses, were loud and prolonged.

The Laird was profoundly gratified, and proceeded with even more satisfaction than he had begun with.

"Thank you, my good friends all; but I must say something which will displease you, because it tells against yourselves—or rather against human nature generally."

"Let's hear't, let's hear't," was the general cry.

"Well, you know that I disapprove of class distinctions [Hear, hear], and especially of that distinction which is broadly indicated by the words Rich and Poor. What are riches? What is poverty? The honest man is rich although he may not have a penny; the dishonest man is poor although he possess millions!"

"I'm no sure but I'd like to be the dishonest one in siccan a case," muttered Davie.

"Whisht!" growled his neighbour; and Dalmahoy went on.

"Now, what is it makes a man—or really rich or poor? Why, the possession or the want of happiness! Life is a mere question of happiness, and whatever makes us happy makes us rich. We have ourselves to blame, then, if we are not rich. What makes us unhappy but selfish envy—the bitterness with which we question the right of others to more wealth or pleasure than we possess? 'What right have they,' we cry, 'to more than us? Why, indeed, should not the positions be reversed?'—which is, in fact, what we desire. We do not envy those who have less than us—we do not suffer any pangs at sight of them. I have seen the millionaire rolling along in his carriage, and envying the sturdy peasant in the field—but it is his wealth of health that he grudges him. 'What right has this fellow,' he cries, 'to a sound digestion and steady nerves, when I am as I am?' The peasant pretty generally returns the compliment, and grudges the poor millionaire the fine dinners which he cannot eat. We rarely thank Heaven for being as we are. When the fit of gratitude is upon us, we only say, 'Thank Heaven we are no worse than we are!'"

He made a deliberate pause, and there was a hesitating cheer, as if the folk were doubtful whether or not he was making fun of them, or preaching to them, which was quite as bad.

"My desire has always been to make people happy," the Laird resumed, "and that is why I have turned a deaf ear to the objections already alluded to, and that is why, sinking all distinctions, I gave my willing consent to the marriage which has been celebrated this day. I hope and pray that the result will be a happy one for all parties concerned. [Loud cheers and "So say we."] I drink your health, ladies and gentlemen, good matches for all the bonnie lassies I see before me, and a good fishing season to all."

The speech was a great success, and the Laird discreetly determined to leave at the moment when he was most popular. As he made his way out, amidst loud and hearty congratulations, he halted beside Habbie, and said in an undertone, but quite carelessly—

"I would like to see you up at Dalmahoy. Habbie. I have some interest in this Methven business, and if you are the heir——"

"If I am the heir!—there's nae doubt about it, Laird. Writer Currie told me, and gi'ed me two pounds erls to let him take up the case for me, and you ken he's no like to part wi' siller for nothing. There's no a doubt o't; and I'm to get out a vollum o' my poems on the strength o't."

That had long been Habbie's favourite dream and ambition—to see his vagrant sheets neatly bound up in blue and gold—preserved for posterity!—to look at the volume in the windows and on the counters of the book-shops—to hear the folk speaking about it—to know that they were looking at him as somebody "by-ordinar"—and to read the notices in the papers. Ah, it was worth coming into a fortune for that! So cried the simple vanity of the man.

"Put me down for half a dozen copies," said the Laird; "but I'll be glad to see you any time about the Methven affair. I may be able to help you."

"Sang about noo," was the general cry, on the departure of Dalmahoy.

"Come awa', Habbie; gie's a new skirl," says Ailie.

The poet sang "Cuttie's Wedding," in a somewhat cracked voice, but with a geniality which covered all deficiencies. Every word was associated by the audience with the event of the day, and the rollicking chorus which followed each verse was taken up vigorously and loudly, in tune and out of tune, bodies swaying to the rhythm of words and

"Now then, Tibbie, let's ha'e the 'Flowers o' the Forest,'" commanded Habbie, it being his privilege to call for the next song.

"Man, I'm that herse, there's no a sang in my thrapple."

"Take a dram, and that'll clear the pipes."

She did so, saying at the same time—

"Shut your e'en, neighbours, and you'll no hear me."

She knew very well that she was accounted one of the best singers in the village, and so she could make pretences which would have been mercilessly ridiculed if made by any less favoured one.

The song went round. Muckle Jean Houston—a man in stature and muscle—had a harsh voice and no sense of tune, but she obeyed the order of the day, and sang "My Love's awa' for a Sodger"—a very pathetic ballad, which was not altogether spoiled even by her voice.

It was Tak'-it-easy Davie's turn next

"I canna sing," he said.

"You'll ha'e to sing or tell a story," shouted Habbie authoritatively.

Davie's eyes danced with fun.

"I canna sing," he repeated; "but if I maun tell a story, I'll just say that I would like to hear Muckle Jean sing that sang ower again."

Muckle Jean threatened him with her fist; and Davie kept out of her way for a week afterwards.

The tables were removed, or thrust into corners, in order to make room for a dance. Habbie got his fiddle, and whilst he was scraping and screwing it into tune, partners were chosen for the reel. Ailie was amongst the first on her feet; the old woman looked as if she had grown young again, so light and firm were her movements.

"Come awa', Wilkie," she said to a hoary-bearded giant, who had been steadily and silently applying himself to the toddy-jug; "your mistress says ye've grown a stiff-kneed old sot; but I never saw ye leave a boat's christening or a wedding, without letting the young folk see how ye could shak' your foot, and you'll surely no be ahinthead at the wedding o' Thorston's lass. Come awa'; let the wife see that you're no sae useless as she thinks."

"I'll dance the Reel o' Tulloch wi' ony ane in the room," said Wilkie, with the gravity of a precentor on his trial. "I'll do't on the table there wi' a' the glasses standing—I ha'e done't many a time."

"I ken'd there was go in you yet."

The old man got up solemnly, balanced himself, and then took his place in the reel.

Habbie struck up "Miss Johnstone," and away went the dozen sets with lusty "Hoochs!" and nimble legs. The animation and enthusiasm would have made a sick man well. Old Wilkie forgot his rheumatism, and danced like a youth, whilst Ailie was as fresh as she had been in her teens.

Habbie changed rapidly into the "Marquis of Huntley," "Tulloch," "Bob o' Fettercairn," "Miss Parkes," and "Brechin Castle;" and at each change the reel became more furious, the voices louder, the springs higher, and the general action wilder and more reckless.

And so the fun goes on until twelve o'clock; then the "hood-sheaf," or parting glass, is served round—to keep out the cold; all join hands and sing "Auld Lang Syne," most of the singers regretting that the diversion is over, and that the round of work and worry begins again. Those who are able to walk home, do so; those who are not, are assisted by their friends.

Several lads and lasses dated from that day the beginning or the conclusion of their wooing. Half a dozen weddings took place within a month.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

OLD LETTERS.

GRACE WISHART was sitting in her room by the fireless grate; on a little table by her side was a lamp, and an open desk, the contents of which were tossed about in a confused way, very unlike the orderly owner.

She was still in the dress she had worn at the marriage; her hair long and luxuriant, had been loosened, and was hanging over her shoulders and down her back; her elbows rested on her knees, and in her hand she held a bundle of letters.

They were Walter Burnett's letters; innocent enough in all conscience, beginning with the rude school-boy scrawl, in which he had asked her to help him in some trick or out of some scrape; passing into a less distinct but more decisive form during his studies in Edinburgh, whence he wrote descriptions of his college-life and friends; then developing into serious expressions of his faith, opinions, and hopes of the great work he might be able to do. There were many words of affection in the letters, but not a word more than a brother might have written to a sister. Yet she had magnified the value of those words, and treasured them. She had been made aware of her mistake, and still she had preserved the letters. He had not thought of asking for them—he valued them so little; that was hard upon her who valued them so much. But, inconsistently, she was glad he had not asked for them; she wished to keep them as the tokens of an old and very sweet dream. She had thought more than once of destroying them; she felt that it ought to be done; and yet the old dream lived so much in her heart that she found it very difficult to sacrifice these memorials of it.

To-day she had resolved that the sacrifice must be made—for her own sake, if for no better reason, in order to remove all palpable sign that the realisation of the dream had once been her brightest prospect. She thought that it was wrong to keep these letters now, unless Teenie had given her permission; and for that, of course, she would never be able to ask. With a sore heart she gathered them together, determined to burn them.

She looked over them for the last time, and cried. A word here, a line there, bore such a different meaning now from the interpretation she had put upon it long ago. Strange, that the same words could assume such different shapes. They were very precious to her, notwithstanding, and she lingered over them tenderly. Then she remembered that the man was Teenie's husband, and she placed them in the grate—very fondly, as a mother might lay a dead child in its coffin. She set her teeth and lips close, struck a match, and applied it to the papers.

How slow they are to ignite—how they resist the effort to destroy them, as if they were possessed of life, and accused her of ingratitude base and cruel!—so she thinks. How often they overcome the fire, and lie with blackened edges, twittering into silence, their scarred faces appealing for redemption!

But she must be resolute. No mercy; the command has been given; they are doomed. She separates them—shakes them apart ruthlessly, and applies the light again. A bright flame shoots up, as if, grown spiteful and angry, those voices of so many pleasures and pains had resolved to meet their fate. Now a wrathful twittering, and through the flame the black and white films shape themselves into the familiar face she loved so well, suggesting memories of the dear hopes now dispelled, of golden visions now proved vain.

She stirs the ashes, and still some fragment with dark brown centre, branching off to black and rugged edges, shows a word, or part of a word, scarcely legible, yet how suggestive of days and thoughts which trouble the memory, in spite of this effort to annihilate them all!

She turns away with a sigh, and would fain forget. The ashes will be swept up by the housemaid, and disappear in the dusthole; the memories will linger and recur at unexpected corners of life, filling the soul with sweet and bitter reflections.

Grace was a long time looking at the white ashes in the grate. Life seemed to her at that moment very hard—it seemed to be spent in getting out of one trouble into another; a year of sorrow for a moment's pleasure appeared to be the condition under which she existed. She wondered if it were different with others; how sad they must be if they were like her!

But having made the sacrifice, she was not going to mope or whine over it—she disliked people who whined and wasted life in wishing that the moon were green cheese, and that they might have it to eat. She liked people to take things just as they found them, and to do cheerfully whatever they felt to be right and best under the circumstances.

She meant to do so, she was determined to do so, but fate had been very hard upon her, and it was not easy to submit to its decrees in her case without some cry of pain. She had felt that it was right to release Walter from his engagement; and she knew that, having done so, it was also right and best that she should love Teenie, and try to make her happy. But although she tried to do all this with a cheerful face, she could not help the sad heart. One knows so much more than can be realised; the path may be very straight and clear before us, and yet difficult to take, when it compels us to turn away from all that is dearest to us.

Well, she had made one step forward in the new path; she had burned the letters, and so destroyed all material sign of the old life and the old dreams. She must turn away from them altogether; and still she lingered over them, stirring the filmy ashes, and wondering if he would ever think, or ever understand, how very much she had sacrificed in order to insure his happiness according to his wishes. Would he ever think of the old time when she had been his promised wife? Would he ever regret that he had chosen another?

But this was altogether wrong and wicked. He was now Teenie's husband, and she must not even think of him otherwise than as a brother, and of Teenie as a sister—all the dearer because there was the danger of regarding her as the cause of the present suffering, and of hating her for it.

That was the theory of the position; but then weak woman's nature asserted itself, and poor Grace cried herself to sleep because the moon was not made of green cheese, and she could not have it to eat. There is such a difference between seeing what we ought to do and doing it.

She got up in the morning, however, quite resolved upon following the path before her, humbly and bravely, without ever casting a look behind, or ever giving a thought to what might have been, if she could help it. There were duties enough for her to attend to, and, perhaps, more zeal in discharging them would prevent her thinking about the past, and so help to cure the wound which Walter had caused.

She attended to her mother's comforts first, as usual; and then she went out to see some of her pensioners in the village. Her first visit was paid to Buckie Willie, who had been lying for some weeks under the affliction of acute rheumatism, and cursing fiercely all the time in his pain. The dram was the only thing which gave him relief, so he declared; he scoffed at medicine and blisters, and kept calling for the dram in the intervals of his swearing at the pangs with which he was visited.

He controlled himself to some extent when Grace appeared, and endeavoured to show his respect for her by restraining the oaths with which he saluted each pang. She had brought brandy; a dose was administered to him—a very moderate dose, he thought—and he declared himself so much better that he would like another, to be made quite well.

Grace promised the second dose by-and-by, and he submitted—until she should go away; but the pain seized him again.

"I'm sorry to see you suffering so much still, Willie," she said in her sweet voice.

"Suffer!—it's no possible that—ye ken the place—can be waur nor this. I'd be glad to try."

"Hush!"

She could not help smiling, although she was shocked.

Buckie Willie composed his features into a seriously calm expression.

"Noo, what could the Lord mean when He invented rheumatics," he said quite gravely.

"Like other ills of life, Willie, to chasten us."

"Chasten us!—it's a heap mair like to make deevils o' us! When the Lord made rheumatics to chasten us, it's a pity He didna learn us how to appreciate it."

"You must not speak that way, Willie, or I shall not come to see you again."

She was startled by the fierceness and irreligious exclamations of the man.

"You maun forgie me," he groaned; "it's no easy to mind the carritchers wi' the rheumatics stanging me in this way. Say you'll forgie me, Miss Wishart, and I'll try to be quiet, though it's no easy."

He clenched his teeth in the bitter effort to restrain his cries of pain, and she granted her forgiveness. How strangely like her own suffering was this, although expressed in different fashion!

END OF CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

FISHED FROM THE SEA OF HISTORY.

BY GREVILLE FENNEL.

AN old author says: "There is a sort of large cockle, that is called the black gaping cockle, which has the same epiphysis as the long gaping cockle, by which the shells are tied together; to this some of the muscular parts of the animal are fastened, to restrain the shell from opening too much. This sort, when the south wind blows, rise up to the top of the water; and setting their two shells wide open, the one under them as a boat, the other on one side as a sail, they scour along." Dr. Grew quaintly adds: "The long gaping cockle hath not this same property, though somewhat larger; its length making too much sail, which would overset the vessel."

"The eel," says Aristotle, "does not float when dead," and he gives as a reason the absence of fat. "This," he says, "is confirmed by the swimming of the bodies of lampreys, congers, and murenas, for they abound with fat." It is remarkable that several other naturalists after Aristotle's time adopt this notion, which is one we must either reject, or conclude that the eels of the present day are better fed than of yore; for, indeed, Kitchener suggests that to get rid of an excess of fat the cook should throw the creature on to a brazier of burning charcoal while alive!

We would now approach the mermaid with the utmost gallantry.

Mr. Meyer assures us that "in 1403 a mermaid was cast ashore near Haarlem, who was brought to feed upon bread and milk, taught to spin, and lived many years." John Gerard, of Leyden, whom we find often quoted as a reliable authority, adds that "she would frequently pull off her clothes and run towards the water; and that she imitated speech, but it was so confused a noise as not to be understood by anybody. She was buried in the churchyard, because she had learnt to make the sign of the cross. He speaks this upon the credit of several persons that had seen her."

The ancient writers paid great court to the mermaid, and by all their accounts they were quite the reverse of those occasionally presented to us in a dried shape, so artistically and deceptively got up by the Japanese, with the body of an ape and the tail of a fish. The Philippine Islands appear to have been a favourite resort of the Eastern model, for "there is frequently seen a sea-monster about the bigness of a calf, which resembles the ancient Syrens; the English term it the woman-fish, because its head, face, neck, and breast are like those of a woman."

The whole literary sea of black-letter is no less prolifically peopled with mermen, traditions of which live and are revered to the present day in various parts of the globe.

To come nearer home: a curious story, perpetuated in Murray's Suffolk, is still rife at Orford in that county. It was originally told by Ralph of Coggeshall (abbot of the monastery there in the early part of the thirteenth century). Some fishermen on the coast (A.D. 1161) caught in their nets one stormy day a monster resembling a man in size and form, bald-headed, but with a long beard. It was taken to the governor of Orford Castle, and kept for some time, being fed on raw flesh and fish, which it pressed with its hands before eating. The soldiers in the castle used to torture the unhappy monster in divers fashions, to make it speak; and on one occasion when it was taken to the sea to disport itself therein, it broke through a triple barrier of nets, and escaped. Strange to say, not long afterwards, it returned of its own accord to its tortures and captivity; but at last, "being wearied of living alone," it stole away to sea, and was never more heard of.

The Roman authors tell a story about a fish in the seas of Ephesus, which "appears above water like the figure of a man; perhaps it is the erman; but the learned call it Pistris, and say that such a fish was the cause of the siege of a fortress on that coast being raised, and the inhabitants relieved. Lucullus not being able to land his men, because the enemies' ships lay in the way, sent a message to the besieged, requiring them to hold out a while, and he would be with them presently. He then secretly filled two bags with wind, and placing them beneath his arms, entrusted himself to the deep, making his way in the night amongst the enemy, who, taking him for the Pistris, let him proceed; and when in the town, he encouraged the people by his presence; and the fleet, becoming weary, shortly drew off from the place."

It may be here stated that the monk-fish has no resemblance to a man, it being simply called so from the hood it wears having a suggestive resemblance to a monk's cowl.

In the Moluccas we are told of serpents thirty feet long, which eat a certain herb, then get up the trees on the banks of the sea or rivers, and throw back the herbs, to which the fish gather, and are intoxicated, which makes them float on the water, and become the serpents' prey.

"One thing is very remarkable concerning the skins of sea-wolves, that pouches or girdles made of them relax and lie flat when it is ebb-tide at sea, whereas they are stiff and bloated when the waters flow."

"At Chang-he, in China, there is a sort of fish that cries like a child when taken, and resembles a small crocodile. Its fat is of that nature that when it once burns, neither water nor anything else can quench it."

"At Chaoking, likewise in China, there is a fish called the swimming cow, which comes sometimes on land and fights with other cows; but when it stays any considerable time out of the water its horns soften, and it is obliged to return to the water to recover their hardness."

The flying fish, so plenteous in many seas, was once denounced as apocryphal. It should be known that its coming on board ship uninvited is not the least of its claims to the navigator's hospitality, as it is stated by epicures to be the finest-flavoured table-fish that swims—far superior to the john-dory.

The herring, although so familiar to our shores, might be classed as an odd fish, if the old saying were true that it dies instantaneously upon being taken out of the water. But this is simply a vulgar error, the popularity of which even led M. de Lacépède into the endeavour to explain the reason physiologically. It is nevertheless true that the life of the herring, though perhaps less tenacious than that of the eel, flat-fish, and others, is prolonged much more than is commonly believed. This error has doubtless arisen from the mode in which the fish are captured, the nets not enclosing them, but forming a wall in the sea, against which the shoal of herrings drive their heads, and, caught by their gills in the meshes, are literally strangled, and hang in the water sus. per coll. M. de Valenciennes took considerable trouble to refute this prevalent notion, and in addition to his own investigations to disprove the popular fallacy, he quotes the following witnesses:—

M. Neucrantz watched a herring live more than half an hour after it had been placed, without extra care, upon a conveyance with other fish. Sagard, a Canadian missionary, noticed herrings leap upon the deck when taken from the nets, and continue doing so for a considerable time. Noël de la Morinière, inspector of the fish markets of Rouen, writes that he has seen herrings live two or three hours out of the water; and that he has held them in his hands, when they lived for upwards of half an hour. He relates also a variety of experiments he made to demonstrate their tenacity of life—cutting off their fins, and otherwise mutilating them. In a word, as the writer of this paper has proved to the credulous fishermen of Yarmouth, the majority of the shoal are either choked by the mesh, or stifled on deck and in the hold by the superincumbent mass of captured fish. The fact is we only get one half of the phrase which has given rise to this belief that the herring has not got as much courage in death as its fellows, the whole of which runs—

"As a herring, dead—That's when 'tis red."

But those who would continue their researches into the wide domain of strange fishes beyond the area at our disposal should consult Aristotle, Ælian, Pliny, Aldrovandus, Rondolet, Saliran, Gesner, Johnston, and Willoughby, and they will find much earnestly recorded to excite their wonder, if it fails to arrest their belief.

"DARKEST ERE DAWN."

HE night that great sorrow came o'er me
My spirit was bowed down in grief,
And deep was the darkness before me;
In vain I looked round for relief.
Then out of the depths of my anguish
I cried, in a passion of prayer—
"Oh, leave me not, Father, to languish, Nor suffer my soul to despair!"

In heaven, not a star broke the glooming
Of dark desolation with light;
On earth, a black shadow was looming—
The pall that fell over the night.

At last, as I gazed in my sorrow,
I saw in the east, far away,
The light of the slow-coming morrow,
And knew 'twas the dawning of day.

Then over my soul came a feeling
Of calm in the midst of my care,
A spirit of hope and of healing
That told me men should not despair.
The morning grew radiant with gladness,
The birds carolled loud from each spray—
There is comfort from deepest our sadness,
'Tis darkest ere dawn of the day!

SHADOWS.

"THE WIFE IN HER HUSBAND'S SHADOW."

DID you ever look at your shadow
Stretched out before the sun,
And think what a fine straight fellow

You were when all was done,
And torment some slenderer shadow
By blotting the two in one?

Did you say with a jest and laughter,
 'So, love, it still must be ;
 The wife in her husband's shadow
 Should hide entirely,
 As a thing flung out of the sunlight,
 Too sacred for men to see ?"

Did the lesser shadow resent it ;
 Or closelier press with thine,
 As often a sweet little shadow

Has swept along with mine ?
 Now, the shadows have faded together,
 And the sun has ceased to shine.

New suns will arise in the heavens,
 And shed as bright a ray ;
 But the shadow that with my shadow
 Had glided day by day
 Is the shade of a cross in the churchyard,
 And it shadows all my way.

THEO. GIFT.

A LITTLE BIT OF HISTORY.

CLIPSES, comets, and extraordinarily high tides can be predicted with accuracy ; there even seems to be a probability that in time the weather will also strike its flag to science, and that means will be found of disentangling the conflicting influences which send an aneroid up and down. But in the art of foretelling the probable current of public enthusiasm there is no sign of progress. The keenest observer of human nature can no more guess whether the career of any particular suitor, warrior, explorer, or criminal will simply appear in the newspapers and excite no more attention, or will be generally taken up as a matter of national importance, than the merest tyro can. It was more than a million to one that Robert Jeffrey's wrongs would remain unnoticed, or raise but a feeble and passing interest. He became a popular idol, however—a representative victim of the press-gang system, and the tyrannical customs which naturally grew out of it, and so a very curious story has been handed down to us.

In 1807 a privateer named the Lord Nelson was fitted at Polperro in Cornwall, a place famous for its hardy race of smugglers, the entire population being brought up to look upon coast-guardsmen as natural enemies, who might be killed with as good a conscience as though they were Frenchmen. The profits of privateering were often greater even than those of smuggling, and the Lord Nelson had no difficulty in gathering together a first-rate crew. Amongst them was a man who had been brought up as a blacksmith, but had found both excitement and profit in an occasional sea-trip, and indeed was as good at the tiller as at the forge, perhaps a trifle better. The name of this amphibious Cornishman was Robert Jeffrey, and his career as a privateersman was a short one ; for the Lord Nelson, at the very commencement of her cruise, was forced to put into Falmouth, where she was boarded by a press-gang. It was a perfectly illegal proceeding ; the press-gang had no more right to take a man out of the Lord Nelson, than you or I have to break into a house and take the plate-basket. But at the commencement of this century private rights were very little respected where the public service was concerned, unless the person whom it was proposed to injure had plenty of money or political influence. Robert Jeffrey had neither, and he was carried on board H.M.S. Recruit, and converted into a man-of-war's-man quite against his will, and in defiance of his clear and undoubted protection.

The commander of the Recruit was a young officer at that time well known in the navy as a reckless, self-willed, passionate man, the foibles of whose nature were forced and exasperated by despotic powers and drinking habits. As if his normal thirst were not enough, he was now sent to cruise in the Caribbean Sea, where the heat of the sun whetted it to such an extent that he was seldom or ever sober, the mildest potation that he used to quench it being spruce-beer, of which he kept a cask always on tap in his private cabin.

Before he had been on board many days, Jeffrey's proficiency as a smith was discovered, and he was made armourer's mate. So that there was a fair chance of his making his enforced trip pretty comfortably, and returning after a few months to his native place with a pocketful of prize-money after all. But an unfortunate group of circumstances got in the way. The captain was not the only thirsty man in the ship ; his armourer's mate, for example, occasionally had a drought upon him, which was considerably aggravated by the extremely hot weather and the small allowance of water served out daily, for the ship was running short of that treasure which we never prize while we have it. During this state of affairs, Jeffrey was sent to execute some job in the captain's cabin, and being left alone with the barrel of spruce-beer, he began to ogle it. There was a drinking-cup, which had been used, lying very handy ; the captain was on deck ; no one could see him ; he was very thirsty! He snatched up the cup, and desisted from his work a moment to draw off half a pint and toss it down. Very good it was, and very refreshing: if stolen waters are sweet, what must purloined spruce-beer be? Presently another drink was taken, with equal success. A third, however, was spoiled by the thick and wrathful voice of his captain, who had come below unheard, unnoticed, in time to witness this outrageous act of daring presumption. It would burn a hole in the paper to write down Captain Lake's remarks upon the occasion. Seventy years ago, all gentlemen swore a little; naval officers swore very much, increasing in vehemence as they rose in rank; men in liquor swore, as at the present day, hardest of all. You may imagine, then, what the language of a drunken sea-captain must have been, when he saw his beloved spruce-beer flowing down the throat of a common armourer's mate! That audacious wretch was clapped in irons presently, while his infuriated commander, having refreshed himself, returned to the deck, which he paced with unsteady steps, revolving in his mind what punishment would be sufficient for a crime so heinous. It ought to be something unusual, startling, appalling as the act which it avenged. Suddenly his eyes caught sight of a small island, now turned into a jewel by the rays of the sun, which was sinking in the west, and the inspiration came.

"Lieutenant," he cried.

"Sir?"

"Man the gig, and send for that fellow I have had confined."

It was done, and then, to the lieutenant's horror, his superior officer ordered him to take the prisoner, land him on the barren rock, and leave him. "I'll have no thieves on board my ship," he said.

The captain was evidently the worse for drink, and his lieutenant hesitated.

"Do you hear me, sir?" thundered the astonished commander; and discipline prevailed. Deeply as he loathed the act, the lieutenant had no option but to obey; the crew, though they murmured, did not mutiny, and Robert Jeffrey was put ashore without food or drink. He had his knife, and one sailor gave him a handkerchief, and another a long stick which he had thought to throw into the boat as they shoved off, for the deserted man to signal with. By this time the sun had sunk, and when the boat returned to the ship it left the poor fellow behind, alone, in the dark.

He fully believed that the captain only meant to frighten him, and bore up pretty well through the night with that idea. But when the morning dawned the Recruit was a mere speck in the distance, which slowly but surely passed away beyond the horizon. Then the unhappy man realised that he was a castaway.

The Recruit indeed had caught a favouring breeze, which carried her quickly to Barbadoes, where she joined the squadron under Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane. Here officers and crew, mingling with those of other ships, spoke freely of the affair, which presently reached the admiral's ears, who sent for the captain, questioned him, and finding the story true, severely reprimanded him for his brutality, and ordered him back to rescue the man.

The island upon which Jeffrey had been so barbarously left was one of the Leeward group, a desolate rock called Sombbrero, and the Recruit got back to it just a fortnight after the event. A careful search was instituted, but all that was found was a pair of trousers, not Jeffrey's, and a tomahawk handle, no trace of the missing man being discoverable.

This result being reported on the ship's return to Barbadoes, Sir Alexander Cochrane felt satisfied that the man had been rescued by some passing vessel, and let the matter rest for the time. But a good many formed a different opinion, and suspected that Jeffrey had come to some violent end; and when the squadron returned to England the affair was taken up by people at home, and made so much noise that, after two years had elapsed, the captain was brought to a court-martial, condemned, and dismissed the service. This, however, instead of appeasing the public excitement, only inflamed it the more, by the authentic details which were brought to light in the course of the court-martial. The illegality of the man's having been pressed at all—the veniality of his offence, especially considering the circumstances of thirst caused by short allowance of water in so hot a climate, and the ready temptation to appease it placed directly in his way, combined with the inhuman cruelty of his abandonment to stir the public indignation. Meetings were held, articles written, petitions signed, urging the propriety of endeavouring by all means to discover what had become of the missing man; and Sir Francis Burdett lost no opportunity of keeping the question before Government, in the House of Commons.

Illegal pressings, keel-haulings, floggings to death were not so very uncommon in the navy at that time as to account for the usually indifferent public's espousing Robert Jeffrey's cause so warmly; but it did so, and made a representative man of him.

The first authentic news came from George Hassel, mariner, who deposed on oath before the Mayor of Liverpool that he had just returned from Beverley, a town in Massachusetts, and that a man was living there who was nicknamed the Governor of Sombbrero, whose real name was Jeffrey. Whereupon this Jeffrey was communicated with, and in due time a letter in reply purporting to come from him was received, giving a full account of his adventure.

When the Recurit had quite disappeared, he remained for some time overwhelmed with despair, but after awhile he grew calm, and felt very hungry, so he explored his island to see if there was anything to eat upon it, but could find nothing except birds, which flew away, as birds will, when he tried to catch them. At last he discovered an egg, but, alas! it was an election egg—a very good missile, but not edible. Soon, however, the pangs of hunger gave place to the severer sufferings of thirst, which he tried to appease by swallowing the seawater, and that of course made matters worse. But Heaven, more merciful than man, sent him a shower of rain, which lodged in the crevices of the rocks, and inflicted the punishment of Tantalus upon him until he thought of cutting the quills, of which there were plenty strewn about, and sucking up the puddles as we moderns do sherry cobbles.

In addition to hunger and thirst, he endured the agony of hope deferred, for ships were constantly passing, but failed to see his signals till the ninth day, when some one on board the Adams, an American schooner, noticed him waving the stick to which his handkerchief was tied. The master, John Dennis, sent a boat, and brought him off in an apparently dying state, so exhausted as to be unable to speak. With care and kindness however he recovered, and was carried to Marblehead, in Massachusetts, where he supported himself by his trade as a blacksmith.

This circumstantial account satisfied people at first, but when the letter was shown to Robert Jeffrey's mother she pointed out that not only was it written in a strange hand, but that it was not even signed by her son, who could write well enough, and was very unlikely to make his mark, as the man who vouched for the genuineness of this epistle had done. This objection naturally carried weight, and many people suspected that the evidence of George Hassel and of the letter had been got up by the captain, who was anxious to prove the man to be alive, and so escape from the odium which attached to him.

Finally a ship was sent to bring this professing Robert Jeffrey to England, where he arrived in due course, and proved to be the right man safe enough, a certain shyness and diffidence which he felt in the presence of the gentlemen who had drawn up his report being the cause of his making a cross instead of signing it. He landed at Portsmouth in the October of 1810, three years after the event which had caused him to become a public character. The Admiralty forwarded him under the charge of a naval officer to Polperro, where the entire population recognised him, and his arrival was made the occasion of great public rejoicing.

But before settling down in his native place he accepted an offer from the manager of a London theatre to exhibit himself for a certain number of nights, and as it became the rage to go and see "Jeffrey the Sailor," he made rather a good thing of it. These profits were presently swelled by a sum of six hundred pounds, which was paid him by the family of the captain in acquittal of all claims he might have against that officer, who was still liable to a civil action, and in the excited state of public opinion was likely to be cast in heavy damages.

After the lapse of a few months, when he ceased to "draw," Jeffrey returned to Cornwall with money enough to purchase a coasting schooner; married, and, if this were fiction, would have lived happily for ever afterwards. But the story being a perfectly true one, Robert Jeffrey was subject to all those ills which afflict ordinary mortals who have never been the subjects of popular sympathy or curiosity.

He failed to make his schooner pay, and he died early of consumption, leaving his wife and daughter in great poverty.

LEWIS HOUGH.

WHY MY UNCLE WAS A BACHELOR.

"I tell you love has naught to do With meetness or unmeetness."—Whittier.

YOU have often wondered, George, why it is I have never married—wondered, and most probably rejoiced, for at my death, you know, the old place will come to you, as it came to me, free of debt or incumbrance. I suppose you have attributed my confirmed bachelorhood to some disappointment in love in early life, eh? Ah, well! I'll tell you the whole story.

It may serve as a warning to you, I was going to say, only I don't believe in one man's experience being of any use to another. And as to warnings, bah! they never save. But I am in a retrospective mood to-night, so if you care to hear the story, you shall."

My Uncle George and I were staying up at Barluig, a small fishing-place of his in the Highlands, to which we resorted regularly twice a year for about a fortnight, in pursuit of salmon. I had lost my father when I was four years old, and since that time his brother, my Uncle George, had been my father in all but the name. Indeed, I think we were fonder of each other than fathers and sons usually are in these days.

It had always been a wonder to me, and to every one else, that Uncle George had never married. Some people declared that he had been hopelessly in love with the beautiful Duchesse de ———, and that it was for her sake he had remained single; others hinted at some entanglement; whilst some maintained boldly that Sir George Wyville was married, and that I, his nephew, and heir presumptive in the eyes of the world, should look very foolish some day on the baronetcy and Wyville Castle being claimed by the son of my uncle's old college bed-maker.

But to all these stories I turned a deaf ear. I knew enough of Uncle George to feel sure there was not a shadow of truth in any of them. My uncle often spoke of the Duchesse de ——— as what she was—one of the handsomest women and most finished coquettes of her day. But I felt certain he had never cared for her; he would not have talked so much about her if he had. And as to an entanglement or a secret marriage, why, I knew all my uncle's affairs as well as I knew those of Charlie Baynsford, my bosom friend and brother officer, who had been gazetted as ensign and lieutenant in the 5th Foot Guards the same day as myself, about two months before. No; whatever reason my uncle may have had for remaining single, it was one that he had carefully guarded from the whole world. I was glad that I was going to hear it at last.

I refilled my glass with whiskey and water, lit my pet pipe, about the colouring of which I was so anxious, and drawing my chair nearer to the fire, prepared to listen in comfort.

"I was about thirteen, George, when I first saw Nora O'Byrne. I was at Eton then, and she was a flower-girl in the streets of Windsor. The first day I ever saw her—I remember it as well as if it were yesterday—it was a bitterly cold March afternoon, and she was standing outside the then only hotel in the place, selling violets. To this hour I cannot stand seeing a girl selling violets in the street. I gave her all the money I had in my pocket, and my heart with it. It is no use attempting to describe her. All descriptions of real beauty are futile. She was simply the loveliest child, as she was afterwards the loveliest woman, I ever beheld. Day after day I used to see her. I contrived to meet her quietly. I did all I could for her, and it went to my heart to feel that I could do so little. I used to give her food; clothing it was of no use giving, for her mother took it away again directly, and pawned it to buy gin.

"I need scarcely tell you that 'Nora' was no common beggar-girl. Her father had been a well-to-do workman, and during his lifetime she had been to school, and had learned how to read and write; but after his death they had been reduced to beggary through her mother's fatal propensity for drink. For nearly two years of my life I spent every shilling I could spare upon that child, and I loved her as I have never loved any other human being. And what is more, I kept my boyish love a secret from every one—no easy matter, as you may imagine.

"When I was fifteen I had a bad attack of typhus fever. I was staying at Wyville at the time for the summer vacation with my uncle, Sir Rupert. He had a perfect horror of sickness, of fevers especially, and directly I was taken ill he left the house to pay a visit to some friends near Windsor. He promised me that when the school met again he would ride over, and give the fellows at my house the latest accounts of me.

"I did not return to Eton till after the Christmas holidays, and then Nora was gone—where I could not learn. In vain I made inquiries of different people in the town who knew the girl by sight. All I could learn was that neither she nor her mother had been seen since the beginning of September. I was nearly frantic with anxiety. I give you my word, George, that never but once again in life have I felt anything like the utter grief and desolation of that time, when I thought of Nora, with her extraordinary beauty, thrown upon the wide world with no other protection than that drunken old mother.

"Well, time passed on, and when I was eighteen I left Eton and went into the Guards. My mother took a house in Hertford Street, and I lived with her. I went everywhere, and was made much of. I was then at Wyville Castle and fifteen thousand a year—to say nothing of the baronetcy; and I could have married—as my uncle and mother were always telling me—almost anybody I chose. But I did not choose. Strange as it may appear, I never met a girl I could care for—never met any one who could make me forget for one moment my childish love. I grew tired of everything sooner than most men, and at twenty, having obtained several months' leave of absence, I started for a tour in the East with my old friend Baynsford, who was then Captain Fellowes. When we were at Smyrna I received a letter from my mother, telling me that my uncle was going to be married. As I had been taught from my childhood to consider myself his heir, you may fancy, George, with what feelings of disgust I received the intelligence. My mother wrote a very illegible hand, and moreover always crossed her pages, consequently deciphering her letters was no easy task. I could not make out the name of my uncle's fiancée, although Fellowes and I sat up half the night trying to discover it. My mother said Sir Rupert had met her in Paris, and I thought the word we could not decipher looked like a French name.

"London was no place for me now, I decided, and determined to leave the Guards and exchange into some regiment going to Canada—a country I was particularly anxious to see. We lingered a good deal on our way home, and were a great part of the time in out-of-the-way places, where we saw no newspapers. Thus I missed reading the announcement of my uncle's marriage. When I arrived in town I heard of nothing but the extraordinary beauty of Lady Wyville; and many were the warnings I received—half in jest, half in earnest—not to fall in love with my aunt. It was very odd, but I felt no curiosity to see her. On the contrary, the idea of making her acquaintance was rather repugnant to me.

"I left a card for my uncle in Grosvenor Square, a day or two after I returned home, at an hour when I knew she would be out; and I declined, on the plea of a prior engagement, an invitation that I received to dine with them the following evening.

"A few nights afterwards there was a large ball given at the Russian Embassy. I heard, directly I entered the house, that my uncle and his bride were there; but there was a great crowd, and I never caught sight of them. Towards the end of the evening, just as I was going away, the Duchesse de — came up to me in the conservatory, and told me that my uncle and aunt were just then on the staircase.

"'You must come and see her, George,' she said to me; 'she is perfectly beautiful.'

"I made some commonplace reply, such as that it was only very pretty women who ever admitted beauty in others; and then, with the little duchess on my arm, I went to greet my uncle and his bride.

"She was dressed all in white—not the faintest trace of colour about her—and her lovely face turned as white as her bridal wreath, as she came face to face with me. It was Nora—Nora whom I had last seen in rags, bare-footed, asking alms from the passers-by, and now met again thus—at an ambassador's ball, and talking to a foreign prince!

"My uncle introduced me to his bride, and I made a profound bow, and with a face as white as her own, congratulated her on her marriage, and expressed the gratification I felt at making her acquaintance.

"She gave me such a look, poor girl! I knew then that she had never forgotten me. I passed on with the duchess into the ball-room, and I felt rather than saw that Nora turned to look after us.

"'Is she not beautiful?' my companion asked me with levity. 'Ah, I was right. I could see you were desperately épous with her. What is it you English call it? Love at first sight. Take my advice, mon ami, and don't see too much of your lovely aunt.'

"'I shall follow your advice,' I said; 'I mean to see as little of her as possible.'

"Something in my voice made my companion glance up; and then, with true tact and good-breeding, she hastened to change the subject. She was a kind-hearted little woman, in spite of her trifling language. I know that never again to me or any living being did she recur to what she had noticed that evening; and that she had noticed more than she chose to say I felt certain.

"I never saw Nora again so as to speak to her during my uncle's lifetime. I exchanged at once into a regiment under orders for Canada. There I remained three years, until the death of Sir Rupert recalled me to England. Nora had no children, so I was now Sir George Wyville. 'She might as well have waited for me,' I thought bitterly. I met her once at our solicitor's upon business, just after my return home, and that was the last time I ever saw her in this world. She lived entirely in London, doing an immense deal of good, I believe, amongst the Irish poor. But her career of usefulness was a short one. She only survived Sir Rupert four years. To me she died the hour when she became his wife. She wrote to me once after she was a widow, telling me all the circumstances of her marriage—how that Sir Rupert had rescued her from a life of beggary in the streets, and sent her to school for four years, and that then she had felt herself bound in honour and gratitude to marry him.

"She concluded her letter by expressing a hope that we might still be friends. Friends! I had no more friendship to offer her than I had love to offer any other woman; and my uncle's widow was sacred in my eyes.

"I never saw Nora again.

"I believe the world talked a good deal about my strange conduct towards my aunt, and pronounced it to be 'very bad taste,' now that I had come into the title and estates. Only the Duchesse de —, I fancy, gave me credit for having some good reason for thus avoiding Lady Wyville.

"There, George, you know now the story of my life—why I have remained a bachelor all my days. I am not aware that there is any particular moral to be deduced from my tale, unless it is 'Only to fall in love in your own rank of life,' a piece of advice that was very frequently given to me when I was young. I hope you will profit by it better than I have done."

THE EARTH AND THE SOUL.

BY ROBERT BUCHANAN.

CHILD of my bosom, babe of my bearing,
Why dost thou turn from me now thou art old?
Why, like a bird for a flight now preparing,
Shrink from my touch with a tremor of cold?"

"Mother, I dread thee! mother, I fear thee!
Darkness and silence are hid in thy core;
Deep is thy voice, and I tremble to hear thee;
Let me begone, for thou lov'st me no more!"

"Love thee not, dearest one! son of my splendour,
Love thee not? how shall I smile thee a sign?
See my soft arms, they are kindly and tender!
See my fond face, flashing upward to thine!"

"Mother, thy face looketh dreadful and ghastly!
Mother, thy breath is as frost on my hair!
Hold me not, stay me not—time speedeth fastly;
Look! a kind Hand beckons softly, up there!"

"Child, yet a while, ere thy cruel feet fare on!
See, in my lap lie the flowers of the May;
See, in my hair twine the roses of Sharon;
See, on my breast gleam the gems of Cathay!"

"Mother, I know thou art queenly and splendid,
Yet is there death in the blush of thy bloom.
Touch me not, mother—my childhood is ended—
Dark is thy shadow and dreadful thy doom!"

"Child, 'twas I bare thee! child, 'twas I fashioned Those gleaming limbs, and those ringlets of light,
Made thee a spirit sublime and impassioned,
Read thee the Book of the Stars night by night,
Led thy frail feet when they failed sorrow-laden,
Whispered thee wonders of death and of birth,

Made thee the heir of the Garden of Aiden, Child, it was I! thy poor mother, the Earth!"

"Mother, I know it! and oh, how I loved thee,
When on thy bosom I leapt as a child, Shared each still pleasure that filled thee and moved thee,
Thrilled to the bliss of thy face when it smiled.
Yea, but I knew not thy glory was fleeing,
Not till that night thou didst read me the Scroll,
Sobbed in mine ear the dark secret of being;
Mother, I wept—thy fair creature, the Soul!"

"Child, wherefore weep? since the secret is spoken, Lie in mine arms—I will rock thee to rest;
Ne'er shall thy slumber be troubled and broken;
Low will I sing to thee, held to my breast.
Oh, it is weary to wander and wander!
Child of my fashioning, stay with me here."

"Mother, I cannot; 'tis lighter up yonder; Dark is thy brow with the Shadow I fear."

"Child, yet one kiss! yet one kiss, ere thou fliest!"
"Nay, for thy lips have the poison of death!"

"Child, one embrace!" "Nay, all vainly thou criest;
I see thy face darken, I shrink at thy breath."

"Go! I have wept for thee, toiled for thee, borne with thee,
Pardoned thee freely each taint and each stain;
Take the last love of my bosom forlorn with thee—
Seek the great Void for a kinder, in vain!"

"Mother, I go; but if e'er I discover
That which I seek in those regions untrod,
I will come back to thee! softly bend over Thy pillow, and whisper the secret of God."

"Child, thou wilt find me asleep in black raiment, Dead by the side of the infinite Sea;
Drop one immortelle above me, for payment
Of all the wild love I have wasted on thee!"

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-THIRD.

WAITING.

GRACE went on to a cottage at the upper end of the village. It stood a little apart from the others, and everything about it was singularly trim—too trim; there was a want of life in the exceeding orderliness of the place. It seemed as if no foot had crossed the threshold since it had been cleaned; no voice or face indicated that the cottage was inhabited. From the door or window there was a clear view of the harbour bar, the lighthouse, and a long reach of sea.

She lifted the latch and entered, her foot leaving a mark upon the sand which covered the stone step at the door. There was the same painful trimness inside as out; everything rigidly fixed in its place, everything polished and shining with almost obtrusive cleanliness.

A woman of about fifty, in a neat grey dress, her white hair plaited like a girl's, and not covered by the cap generally worn by women of her years, advanced to meet the visitor with a quiet, pleased smile.

"You are very kind, Miss Wishart, to come and see me so often."

"It's a pleasure to me, Mysie; how do you feel yourself now?"

There was a strangely subdued and submissive smile on Mysie's calm face, which was still bonnie, and had been bonnier.

"About my usual; nothing to complain of, and nothing to boast about. Will you no tak' a seat?"

Grace took the chair, and entered into a general conversation with Mysie about the ailments, losses, and successes of the fishers. Mysie was one of the ablest nurses, and always ready to help her neighbours, whilst in the big houses roundabout her assistance was frequently sought in cases of illness. Her peculiarities were known and respected; her retired mode of life, and her fancies about the house she occupied, were never alluded to in her presence. It was said that she was "some crack," but there was no sign of madness in her gentle manner, and her devotion to any of the neighbours who might be in trouble was certainly a most benevolent form of insanity.

Thirty years ago, Mysie, then a bright-eyed, handsome girl, married her cousin Bob Keith. There was not a gentler, shyer girl in the village than Mysie, and there was not a more good-natured or more rollicking fellow than her husband. He had a brother, Alick Keith, who was skipper of a schooner engaged in the Baltic trade, and who was reputed to be the most daring seaman ever known—he would sail upon a Friday! He would defy all storm signals, and all presages of bad weather or an unlucky voyage. Once a strange dove, weary and starved, had settled upon his bowsprit, coming from nobody knew where, and although his men implored him to put back into harbour, he refused! In fact, there was no end to his defiance of all the laws which had hitherto controlled the skippers and sailors of Rowanden, and there was apparently no end to his success. Nevertheless discreet old fishers, who knew what was what much better than these young innovators, shook their heads and declared—

"There's nae guid'll come o' yon loon."

Barely three weeks after his marriage, Bob Keith was offered by his brother the post of chief mate on board the Jessie Bell, of Kingshaven, with a small share in profits.

The offer was a good one, and Bob was anxious to accept; he only hesitated because he had been so recently married. Mysie would have liked him to refuse, because of the reckless character which Alick bore in his seamanship; but she was too young a wife to know how to exert her authority. She could not deny that Alick's offer was an excellent one, or that it was the right thing, even for her sake, that her husband should take advantage of any opportunity to make way in the world. Bob accepted his brother's offer.

The Jessie Bell sailed, Mysie watching it from the cottage door until it disappeared over the sea.

Some months afterwards, the skipper of another Kingshaven vessel reported that in the midst of a terrific gale, to avoid which he had wisely tacked, he had seen the Jessie Bell attempting to enter the Baltic; then suddenly he had lost sight of her. From that day nothing was ever heard of the vessel, or any of its crew.

Mysie listened to the news, dumb and white. Her own parents, and the mother of Alick and Bob, were overwhelmed with grief. They went into mourning, and lamented the deaths of the two promising youths.

Mysie was silent, but she would not put on mourning. She arranged her cottage with scrupulous care to the position which everything had occupied on the day when Bob went away, and went about her ordinary work quietly and resolutely. She said nothing concerning what she hoped or expected ; she simply placed things so, and went on with her work—waiting. She served her parents faithfully, she gave more than a daughter's duty to the mother of her husband. They died : Mysie did not change ; the house was still in order, just as when he had left it. Many good offers of marriage were made to her, and they were declined very resolutely. She was still waiting for him.

She never said that she was waiting, she would fusal to leave it or alter it in the slightest degree, there was nothing odd in her ways, and much that was kind and useful.

At early morning or late in the evening, Mysie was often seen standing at her door, looking out to sea ; during a storm she was always there, whether it happened late or early. Whenever there was a wreck, Mysie was the first to know it—the first to give warning, and to call for help—the first down at the shore, giving the aid of a strong and intelligent man in launching the life-boat, inspiring the crew by her energetic presence, or in preparing neither speak about the Jessie Bell, nor listen to any one else speaking of it. The moment she heard the name mentioned, she would go away—without fuss, but in a manner which clearly showed that it was a subject she did not wish to enter upon.

Her house was kept with a tender care, ready for the wanderer whenever he might appear ; the duties which fell to her were performed with alertness and cheerfulness. The folk pitied her, and shook their heads, lamenting her strange hallucination. By-and-by people became so accustomed to her ways that they scarcely noticed them ; and, with the exception of the house, and her firm re-signals—ropes—assisting bravely in everything which could further the good work of rescue.

Mysie eagerly scrutinised the face of every creature who was carried ashore by the boat, or cast on to the sands and rocks by the great angry waves. She looked as if for the face of some dear friend, whom she never found. But there was no murmur of disappointment, no word of complaint on her part, she went on with her work as vigorously as if there had been no hope of her own dispelled.

She had ceased to gather mussels and limpets for bait on the death of her father ; nursing and weaving stockings for the neighbours and the farmers' wives gave her ample occupation. Her calm ways and her skill earned for her the title of "the Wise Woman," and she was often consulted by the young folk about the most delicate as well as the most ridiculous dilemmas.

Whatever delusion or hope she entertained regarding her husband's fate, she did not trouble any one with it. The old love remained; but she did her work bravely.

"You have been very patient, Mysie," Grace said after a pause; and it was the first time she had ever made allusion to the woman's past; then dreamily and speaking to herself, "I wonder if it is better to wait, hoping, than to know that waiting and hoping are vain and wrong."

Mysie lifted her eyes from the rough stocking she was knitting, and, with a strange inward look, gazed first out through the window toward the sea, and then at her visitor.

"You're looking poorly, Miss Wishart," she said; "I noticed it when you came in; I'm doubting you're no weel."

"I am not very well, but I shall be better in a few days."

"Something has gane wrang wi' you."

"Yes—something which I thought would not have troubled me, because I was doing what I knew to be right; and yet it is vexing me, and making me feel unlike myself—making me feel as if it would have been better to have done wrong."

She shuddered at herself as she spoke these words in a whisper.

A pause, during which Mysie's knitting dropped into her lap, and her soft grey eyes remained fixed upon Grace with a questioning expression.

"Have you to wait—like me?"

"No; I must neither wait nor hope. I think it would be pleasant to change places with you, Mysie."

"And you ha'e siller and land, and youth, and a thing that aye can crave for."

"Not everything—none of us have that; but I would rather have a light heart with a light pouch than all the wealth in the world."

"Better a heavy heart than a heavy conscience."

"Which kills soonest?" said Grace, with some bitterness in her sweet voice; "if any choice were given to me, I think that is the one I would choose."

"I'll tell you, Miss Wishart, what I have never told to living creature before; it'll maybe help you, and you have been guid to me. When the news came that Bob's ship was wrecked and every soul aboard lost, I thought it would be easier to die than to live. Then I wouldna believe it was true, because I couldna think that God would be so hard upon puir creatures that had never done ony harm they ken'd o'. So I put the house in order, and waited for him to come hame. But he didna come. The deevil was aye putting ill thoughts in my head, and I wrought late and early to keep him out. Syne, I found that without a bawbee I was able to help my neighbours, and that they were grateful and kind to me. Syne, I came to understand that my work was needed for others, and so I had been left, waiting. I'm waiting and watching aye, but doing my best a' the while; and though I'm waiting yet, I ken that when he comes it'll be to take me awa' frae this place. It was lang, lang or I could understand that, but I learned it at last, and I'm content to be quiet and bide my time to gang hame to him."

"Aye—but if you had to wait, Mysie, without hope—to wait knowing that you could never meet him again—what then?"

"I canna say. I think I would ha'e waited a' the same, sure that He would learn me how to thole in His time."

The simple unquestioning faith of the woman who had suffered so much did Grace good. Her heart was purer when she left the house than when she had entered it. Thinking of Mysie's life, she became the more resolute in directing her steps into the narrow path which lay before her.

"It is strange," she reflected, "that the calm, pure temperament which makes us morally grand, is only found in one who has suffered much affliction; as if it were necessary that we should suffer in order to be good or wise."

As she passed through the village, grateful voices saluted her with kind inquiries for herself and home; pleasant smiles showed her the happiness which her presence gave; the bairns ran to her with merry, eager faces—with some selfishness, too, for they knew that she generally carried a packet of "Peter Reid's rock," a sweetmeat famous along the east coast.

She was comforted and encouraged; her foot was firmer on the ground as she made her way homeward, and the world was much brighter than it had appeared in the morning. She seemed to waken to a new sense, and she was thinking how full the world is of lovers whom we never know, how full of loveliness that we never see, and of music that we never hear. There are the people we love or who love us at a glance, and whom we never see again; there are the countless beauties of nature through which we pass unobserving; the forms and shades—ever varying with the day—of flowers, trees, mountain, valley, and sea; there are the bright songs of the birds always making the air musical, and to which we so seldom give an attentive ear. How much of all this passes back to the Giver, unseen, unenjoyed, and unappreciated! When His glories pass so, what wonder that the greatest efforts of a poor human heart should often pass away unkenked?

"But God sees and knows," said Grace; and something of the old sweet light dawned upon her face.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

HOME.

HARVEST work had begun when they returned. The crops were yellow, and falling steadily under the scythe or reaping-machine; the fields were dry and parched-looking; the heather on the moors was crisp, and crackled under the feet. The opal sea flashed its many colours in the eyes, dazzling them with its splendour; in the hot noontide the sound of waves was refreshing to the senses.

Dan met them at the station.

"Glad to see you back," he said; "I hope you're both weel."

He spoke as calmly as if they had not been out of his sight five minutes. Walter gave his hand a hearty shake, and Teenie did the same—no more, for kissing and hugging were quite out of their way, and the skipper would have been scandalised exceedingly if his daughter had offered to kiss him there on the platform before all the people.

She was looking bright and happy, radiant indeed; and the blush which covered her cheeks, as various friends saluted them and wished them happiness, added to the brightness of her eyes and to the joy of her smile. She was not at all awkward; she nodded to old acquaintances, ran up to fish-wives and fisher-loons with cheery greetings; although they were awed by the splendour of her silk gown, and almost afraid to speak to the lady, she was just the old, wild, fierce, and kindly Teenie that she had been before there was the slightest likelihood of her becoming wife to the Laird's son.

"She's no stuck-up ava," said Tak'-it-easy Davie, who happened to be on the platform, and to receive a warm greeting from the bride; "by my soul, I wish she'd married me."

"You, you guid-for-naething loon!" cried auld Meg Carnoustie, who, with creel of fish on her back, had been one of the first to whom the bride had spoken; "she'd be sair wanting a man that took you, let alone Thorston's lass."

"Wait a wee," says Davie with a sagacious nod.

Then Teenie would bow to the grand folk with as much ease and self-possession as if she had been born in a palace, instead of the cottage at the Norlan' Head. True, she had very little to say to the grand folk; but then they had as little to say to her, and were rather disappointed that she did not show any gratitude for their condescension in noticing her at all.

"She's a saucy creature," muttered Mrs. Dubbieside. "and has no sense of her station at all. One would think she was used to being married, she takes it so easy—or else she's thinking yet that she's the Methven heir."

Poor Teenie had not the remotest thought about George Methven, or his troublesome fortune; neither had she the remotest idea that she was not behaving with the becoming propriety of a newly married girl. She was happy, and she never suspected that she ought to act or look otherwise than as she felt.

Walter was awkward and shy enough for both parties; and he had to confess to himself that—although he could find no reason for it—he would have been better pleased if Teenie had been a little less boisterous. He had an unconscious sense that a lavender silk dress with a long train, and a high bonnet with orange-blossoms, did not agree well with a manner which suggested a skipping-rope. His sense of incongruity or the ridiculous was pained.

He shut his eyes immediately to that, and admired—or rather loved the more—the good heart and generous nature which were quite unconscious of the incongruity between silks and fish-scales. He was grateful that Teenie remained unchanged.

Nevertheless, he found himself as awkward and bashful as when he had gone up to receive his first prize at college, knowing that the eyes of a crowd of his class-mates and their friends were upon him. It was a self-consciousness which he felt was contemptible, and he tried to get rid of it, but could not.

He was heartily glad when they were seated in the Dalmahoy gig which had been graciously sent for them by the Laird, and were driving at a good pace up to Drumliemount.

It seemed very strange to her when they turned the corner of the road away from the Norlan' Head, and moved in what was comparatively a strange direction to her. Yet she was going home!—going to the place where her life was to pass away in the common round of cares and duties—going to the place in which all her thoughts and hopes must be in future centred. It was a new world full of bewildering novelty, and yet surrounded by the dearest and most precious of old associations. It was almost uncomfortable to turn away from the old home to the new. Here was one of her vague cravings gratified, and somehow it amused and puzzled her rather than gave her satisfaction.

Ailie had been at the house for a week, scrubbing, cleaning, and brushing, until she had almost driven the one servant lass "clean out of her judgment," as the girl declared.

Ailie was at the gate to receive them—she had been there many times during the morning, looking out for them. Her mutch (cap) was snow-white, and the frills were as stiff as starch and piping could make them—forming a white, prim halo, round her ancient and kindly face.

The garden was in trim order now, and the roses were in full bloom on the house. They passed up the newly gravelled path—gravelled with small, round, pale lavender stones, which rolled and rattled under the feet—and into the house.

When they crossed the threshold, Walter put his arm round his wife and, kissing her, whispered one word—

"Home!"

What a delightful sound it had, spoken by him in that place, in that loving voice! The sunlight streamed in upon them, a round mote-white beam fell on them, and the perfume of roses and honeysuckle mingled with the word, and they were always afterward associated with it in her mind.

Home! she had never known how much there was in the word until that moment. There she was to be queen, and live happy ever after. It was not the gorgeous palace she had dreamed about, but it was a reality; and at this minute she felt as if she would have been quite content if it had been a mud cabin, or a shieling of wattles and heather.

They went into the parlour: the window was wide open, and the perfume of roses and honeysuckle filled the room. She threw off her bonnet; he took off his hat and light overcoat, thrust his fingers through his hair, and looked at her fondly, proudly.

"It's not much of a place, is it, Teenie?—but it's our own," he said with a laugh.

"And that's everything," said she laughing too, and examining each article in the room, mentally estimating its cost—without the least thought that more or less was anything to her.

He looked at her with loving admiration.

"Yes, Teenie, that is everything, so long as we are true to each other. Do you think you can be quite satisfied here?"

"Satisfied!—I'm just that proud and happy I could greet for very joy and—I dinna ken what."

Her eyes and voice were full of tears, which made her very beautiful, although they were not allowed to find vent.

"I wonder if you will always think so?" he said reflectively.

She looked at him with that winning expression which a pretty woman's face obtains when mouth and eyes form an O of wonder, rebuke, and love.

There was only one answer to such a look, and he made it—he hugged her.

"There," she cried, pretending to struggle for freedom, "let me begin my duties at once, and go into the kitchen to see about the dinner."

"Confound the dinner—Ailie will see to that for to-day at any rate."

But Teenie's restless spirit would not consent to that arrangement. She was eager for the fun of showing her authority as "the mistress," as the maid of all work called her, and eager to examine every corner and treasure of her home.

She changed her dress with commendable rapidity, and in a neat house-dress of simple cotton pranced down-stairs. She glanced into the study, which Walter called his workshop, and there, as she expected, saw him already among his books. He made a movement as if to approach her, but she gave him a merry look, and closed the door between them.

The husband smiled, and turned again to his noiseless but most eloquent and dearest friends, books.

He was unspeakably happy. He was beginning the life of which he had often dreamed, and beginning it in entire accordance with his own wishes. Married to the woman he loved, and appointed to the work he loved, he had no fears for the future, no doubt of accomplishing some part at least of his ambitious designs—the designs being only to prove himself useful in helping his fellows to realise that mere life is a blessed gift—that to the true-hearted life is full of gracious sympathies and helpers.

He was not blind to the possibilities, or even probabilities, of failure; but he comforted himself with the reflection—

"A man must fail in so many things, that to succeed in any one he must work hard and fast to accomplish a great number."

He intended to accomplish a great number. Meanwhile, sitting in his cosy room, the open window admitting the lazy air, the hum of bees, and the perfume of flowers, he felt grateful for the mercies which surrounded him, and full of earnest resolutions. He thought that whenever he might be disposed to discontent, he would only have to remember this day, and he would be cured.

Teenie made her way to the kitchen, and was received by Ailie with new exclamations of admiration and pleasure.

"Marriage has improved you just wonderful," she declared; "'deed, I'm thinking I would like to get married mysel'."

Teenie enjoyed the idea of Ailie getting married, and was very energetic superintending the dinner, examining the furnishing of the kitchen, and telling her old friend of the wonders she had seen in Edinburgh—of the castle on the top of the rock, the houses ten and twelve storeys high, the grand shops, three times bigger than anything in Kingshaven, and many other marvels which made Ailie's eyes open wide in wonder.

That first dinner at home was very pleasant to the husband and wife, the little parlour was so bright, and they were so happy in themselves. Then they went out to the garden, and seated themselves under an apple-tree. He read; she played with her fingers, and stared at the ground with an air of profound attention, but she was busy speculating about all she would have to do in the house, and not hearing a word of what he read. He discovered that by-and-by, and closed the book.

"You couldn't have been more inattentive if I had been reading one of my own sermons," he said maliciously.

She felt very wicked, and could make no excuse. She just looked at him helplessly.

"We'll have all sorts of visitors to-morrow," he said, changing the subject.

"What for?"

"Why, to congratulate us, to quiz us, and to see if we haven't already repented our bargain."

"I wish they wouldn't come."

"So do I."

"Then why don't you tell them not to come? Whenever there was anybody I didn't want to come to the house, I told them to stay away."

"Arcadia!" laughed Walter; "we can't do that, Teenie."

"Why?"

"Because we must do a great many things we don't want to do, in order not to give annoyance to others, and because these visits are signs of friendliness with which we ought to be pleased. I wonder Grace hasn't been over this afternoon. She knows we are at home."

Grace!—was he already wearying for her?

Teenie was silent; it seemed as if a shadow had crossed the bright sunlight.

She moved nearer to him, placed her hand on his, and looking into his face with such earnest eyes, she said softly—

"You're no sorry, are you?"

"Sorry!—for what?"

"That—that we're married now?"

He regarded her with an amused and puzzled expression.

"You dear, stupid, wee lassie, what could put such an absurd notion into your head? Why, if ever a man was permitted to know perfect happiness on this earth, I am realising it at this moment."

Her hand closed tightly upon his, and she laughed at herself. She did not know why, but his warmth, his look, and the mere words of his assurance gave her a feeling of intense relief.

END OF CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FOURTH.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

WHO can fathom and describe the feelings of a young man, scarcely twenty-two years of age, who hastens towards the point of his warmest longings; who, hitherto driven by his fate strangely hither and thither, now seeks, with say fifteen Austrian florins in his pocket, a yet unshaped living in the far distance, amidst strange races which, uncouth and wild, have just commenced to approach a peculiar kind of assimilation to the West? On the high-rising waves of my feelings played the commotions of fear and hope, pain and curiosity. There was no one to accompany me to the steamer at starting—no friendly shake of hand—no warm kiss of a mother gave me a parting farewell on my long and distant voyage.

I had cause enough to be out of spirits—even to be disheartened to a great extent. But once thoroughly plunged amongst the objects of the human kaleidoscope on the deck of the steamer—and there is a very miscellaneous assembly at every voyage down the Danube—scarcely did I find opportunities to speak in Servian, Italian, Turkish, and in other languages hitherto known to me but theoretically, when by-and-by every trace of troublous feelings vanished. "Now," I thought, "you are in your vital element."

There was besides another circumstance in my favour—that, in consequence of my fluent polyglot conversation, I soon became an object of general respect, and a wonder of the multitude. They encircled me, wished to find out my nationality, and doubted the fact I mentioned, that I never was yet in foreign parts.

The gaping multitude gave me much amusement, but I drew practical advantages also from these communications of the free judgment of my fellow-travellers. At the sound of the dinner-bell I would hang back with confusion on the deck. There came forth every time some enthusiastic son of Mercury, who took the youthful prodigy down to table with him, and paid for his meal.

If after all these failed to start up such a patron to my appetite, I had to resort to a short walk before the kitchen-door of the steamer, whose managers are generally Italians. Some few stanzas of Petrarch or Tasso sufficed to draw the attention of the "cuoco." A conversation in pure Tuscan was commenced, and the result ended in his bringing out a dish well filled with macaroni or risotto, crowned by a morsel of boiled or roasted meat. "Mille grazie, signore," meant that I might appear in the evening hours for the continuation of his kind sympathy. The good Italian placed his linen baretta upon one side of his head, and smiled; and his encouragement, "Come, sir, without ceremony, whenever it may please you to see me," was a proof to me that the seed of my linguistic experiments did not fall on to a barren soil.

My good-humour fortunately ever proved a sure help in need; and, combined with my polyglot talent, it proved able to elicit favours where other people's endeavours would have failed.

Thus did I reach Galatz, a decayed dirty nest ~~even now~~, but still more forlorn and wretched at the time I speak of. During the down voyage on the Lower Danube, of course the right bank, with its Turkish towns and Turkish population, absorbed my whole attention. Every long-bearded turbaned traveller who got on the steamer was for me a new leaf for my practical ethnographic studies, and at the same time a new cause of agitation.

Whenever the sun set, and the Oriental orthodox believers sat or rather knelt down with features of the utmost contrition in prayer, I followed every movement—maybe with a pious copying—of their members with a feverish attention, and listened to the very breath and accent of the Arabic words of their worship, whose meaning even to them was unknown as they breathed them off their lips; and only when they had finished their devotions did I again respire freely.

This interest, undisguisedly shown, could not escape the attention of the fanatical Mussulmans. We have to recollect it was in the time when our Hungarian refugees sought shelter and protection in Turkey. Some, maybe hundreds, of my countrymen have taken but outwardly to the faith of the Islam. In the popular belief of Turkey, the whole people of the Magyars were ready to acknowledge Mohammed as their prophet, and as soon as a Madjarly was met with, instantly the fire of proselytism flashed up in the true believers.

Such or similar interest must have been at the bottom of the friendship shown to me by some Turks from Widdin, Rustschuk, and Silistria, on the voyage down to Galatz. It may be that my suppositions are unjustified, and that such sympathy was awakened by that Osmanlic national feeling which then was shown to every Magyar just defeated by the Russians. Be that as it may, this sympathetic relationship proved to me very advantageous, not only during my voyage, but also, as my readers will see hereafter, during the whole time of my abode in Turkey.

Drawn by curiosity to the semi-Asiatic Turks, it could not be otherwise, these were the means to introduce me into the Oriental world. I scarcely consider it necessary to say that after a few days of living together with them, I had made such a proficiency in the Turkish language as to become in Galatz the interpreter to one of my countrymen.

My voyage from Galatz to Constantinople found me already for the most part in Mohammedan company. That I went "last" class on board the vessel, living all the time upon deck, having had to pay but half the passage-money, my readers no doubt have guessed already. I placed my knapsack near to the closed ring of the baggage of the Turks, of whom the greatest number were just then on their pilgrimage to Mecca; and I longed impatiently for a glimpse of the sea, which I should get now the first time in my life.

He who gained his idea of the sea from Byron's sea-scenes, from the "Lusiad" of Camoens, or from Tegner, will not be moved by every-day feelings when he for the first time in his life beholds the endless water-mass below and around him, unable to reach its boundaries, and especially cradled in his progress, at the same time, on the waves of the old Euxine. An hour before we reached the Sulina mouth of the Danube, I was moved by the scene of awful sublimity now visible in the distant sea; nor could the deep gurgling sounds and wild groans of some sea-sick co-passengers awake me out of my fanciful elevation.

My health did not suffer in the least within the realms of Father Poscidon. I had—I am sorry to say—only a fiercer appetite than usual; but the cooler evening air (we were then in April) was able somewhat to lower the temperature of my spiritually heated, excited blood. In spite of the kind care of a Turk, who placed a superfluous carpet at my disposal, I soon began to feel cold, and only after having satisfied my longing look upon the star-bestrewed heavens, did I at last fall asleep.

It might have been midnight, when lightning and thunder, and a violent shower of rain, awoke us somewhat roughly from our dreamy slumber. At daytime I longed to see a storm on the sea: the night granted my prayer, and, I must acknowledge, this storm amply satisfied the curiosity of my romantic nature.

How my heart beat when the vessel leaped like a gazelle up and down on the towering waves! The creaking of beams, the howling of the wind, mixed up with the lamentations of my sick and frightened companions, the continuous call upon Allah of those surrounding me—nothing could deaden the bright aspect wherein this otherwise prosaic scene presented itself. Only the cold shower, that wetted me through to the very skin, forced me to relinquish my place.

I rose to warm my blood by walking amidst the chaos of stretched-forth legs, travelling-bags, guns, and turbans; however, this proved quite impracticable, and I sent a longing look towards the deck reserved for the promenade of the first-class passengers. Here I perceived a man walking to and fro. I thought first to commence a conversation with him; as however my courage failed me, I thought myself of other means to draw his attention to me, and commenced amidst the tempest still raging around us to quote some part of an epos known to me. My choice fell on Voltaire's "Henriade," from which I emphatically repeated—

"Je chante ce héros qui régna sur la France, Et par droit de conquête et par droit de naissance." *

My declamation rolled audibly along the deck, through the dark night. Scarcely had I finished a few strophes when the much-envied first-class passenger stopped, and after having stayed for a short while with listening ears near a knot of Turks, he commenced a conversation with me.

With a master of ceremonies like Voltaire, questions about descent and social position might well have been deemed superfluous. It was but at the dawn of morning that I found out that the shape wrapped up in the darkness of night was a Belgian by birth, a diplomatist by vocation, who now went to Constantinople as secretary to his king's embassy.

The gentleman, astonished to hear at night a thoroughly soaked-through fellow-passenger quoting with a zest next to poetical rage, was still more surprised on seeing me at daybreak poorly dressed as I was. Still he appeared to have no worse opinion of me, considering that he invited me to seek his abode in Pera, and promised to me his protection as far as that could be of any service.

From Varna to Constantinople we had the finest weather, and our voyage was as charming as we could ever wish it. The steamer's entrance into the Bosphorus, a place which touches even a prosaic temperament, excited me, as is easily conceivable, into the highest rapture. But when in the midst of the dense mast and flag forest of the Golden Horn, my looks wandered around, and I appeared to myself like one left behind in the midst of the great world, especially when the circle of my fellow-travellers began to resolve itself into smaller departing knots, baggage and men going off in all directions; then, indeed, commenced the feeling of désertion, unstringing my heart. I was dispirited, and my courage felt low.

Of the fifteen florins which I got from Pesth, just so much remained in my possession as to enable me to pay for the boat that brought me to land. I set my foot on Turkish soil, not with a light heart, it is true, but obviously with a light purse. Still I went forth with a careless amble along the narrow streets which lead to the heights of Pera.

Where shalt thou sleep, then? what shalt thou eat? what is there for thee to commence with? Such would have been the questions put to itself by a less adventurous temperament—by a more mature age. But enthusiasm is blind; and I was just occupied in deciphering the letters of Turkish signboards, when a stranger—it was a Hungarian—attracted by the long ribbon streaming from my Hungarian hat, accosted me. He asked me in Italian about my home and the aim of my voyage. After having answered him, he naturally continued our further conversation in our native tongue, and great was our mutual pleasure.

Mr. Püspöki was at home an honest artisan. In Turkey, however, he had in turns several positions. He was in succession officer of the line, canteeneer (sutler) during the Crimean War, accountant on board the vessel, and cook—thus he gained his subsistence. I found him employed in his last capacity, living in a poor chamber on the ground-floor of a house in the dirtiest street of the quarter, behind the wall of the English Ambassador's palace. His room presented but a mattress stretched along one of the dingy walls, and this couch he soon divided with me.

The first night on this bed will ever remain well remembered. My hospitable countryman was already sunk in deep sleep, while I, still pondering over the peculiar commencement of my Turkish life, yet lay awake, unable to close my eyes. Suddenly I heard my boots—first the one, then the other—seemingly by their own power commence to walk off.

"Friend," muttered I softly, while awaking my friend at my side, "I believe some one is taking our boots away."

A slight murmur was the answer; I repeated my observation, when the host, half in sleep, retorted, "Ah! sleep; it is but the rats that play around our boots."

Fine, indeed! thought I; an amusing game, provided that they did not gnaw holes into my nether garments also. But I felt now downright tired, and soon fell, against my will, fast asleep.

As far as I remember, I slept two nights more in this cave-like abode. New acquaintances among my Hungarian countrymen found for me an asylum within the chambers of the then already half-deserted Hungarian Association. There were fewer playing animals here, but the more hopping ones; and when one night, suffering from the cold night air, I had to request the secretary of the association kindly to furnish me with a blanket, he unfurled the national tricolor from its staff and handed it over to me, with the following pathetic words:—

"Friend, this flag has fired so many braves to battle and victory. The flag itself was oft in the fire of battle. Dream of glorious victories; maybe it may warm thee also."

And it proved a capital joke. I wrapped the ragged tricolor tightly around my body, and though continuing to shiver for some time yet, finally lapsed into sound sleep.

Thus passed again a few days. The circle of my new acquaintanceship was widened by-and-by. The circumstance whereby I drew to myself the attention of all whom I met, was decidedly my promiscuous knowledge of languages; and especially did it astonish everybody that, having never been before in Turkey, I should speak and write its language so well. The most natural vocation I could have embraced under these circumstances, to earn my daily bread, was to teach the different languages required in the land. Written advertisements were distributed, and the first lesson given was, peculiarly enough, in the Danish language.

And whom would my reader imagine that I had for my pupil? No less a person than the First Secretary of the Royal Danish Embassy to the High Porte, who, a native of the Levant, learned the language of his adopted land from a Hungarian.

Mr. Hübsch, a noble-minded and well-educated gentleman, whose personal character will ever remain to my mind a most pleasing reminiscence, had long been on the look-out for a master of the Danish language. Thus my acquaintance came to him very convenient, and proved very agreeable. He made, indeed, such progress, that in the course of a few months the reading of Andersen's "Spilleman," and "Berlingske Tidning," could be reckoned in his achievements.

From this peculiar beginning of my teaching languages, I was raised to the never-expected position of a teacher. The promising advertisements had not missed their aim. While one day I stayed at the book-shop of Mr. S——, there entered a young Turk, who brought a numerous retinue, and whom my first thought placed among the wealthier of his nation; and he wanted the announced Madjar for his "khodsha" or teacher of the French language.

The young bey was, as I heard afterwards, a "miraskhor"—that is, an heir just entering into a rich patrimony—and therefore tried to connect his new material wealth with the outward attributes of it. To these belonged in those days, within Turkey, (1) a suit of cloth according to the latest fashion; (2) prim, well-fitting, tight, lacquered shoes; (3) a small jauntily-set fez—gloves, of course; (4) a light, graceful step, with modern movements of the limbs; and (5) the art of "parleying" in French.

The first four attributes the bey was, of course, furnished with by European handicraftsmen; the fifth I was expected to help him to. I was therefore forthwith engaged as his teacher, having to receive ten piastres, besides the expenses of the passage there and back, as the dandy lived at Scutari.

This engagement gained for me the first opportunity of entrance into a thoroughly Turkish house. I went daily with great regularity; but generally found my pupil, who used to rise just then from his slumbers, still suffering from the consequences of his nightly revels; his eyelids opened but with difficulty, nor did I find in him any great eagerness for the learning of the French language. It was a full month before he mastered the alphabet.

My pupil was mostly in the company of a venerable Mollah, who was seized generally by a shudder whenever the sound of a giaour tongue met his ear; he, the father of my pupil, was a notoriously pious Moslem, and the walls within which I taught had resounded hitherto but with the texts of the recited Koran, of sacred hymns, and holy prayers.

"Indeed, indeed, thus sneaks the spirit of unbelief into our country," mumbled the old Mollah into his beard.

It is obvious that this teaching was to myself of very great benefit. In the commencement we kept closely enough to the French, but later on we deviated from the mere learning of the forms and constructions of the to-be-acquired tongue, to explanatory descriptions of European life and European views. I talked to the bey about our social, political, and scientific institutions, of course all in rosy hues; it came natural to me, so near yet to the old home. Every European, while still at his first Oriental station, looks back with charming recollections to the West he has left, and finds even the faulty beautiful at a distance.

My communications were mostly listened to and received with applause and admiration. Turkey had just, in the united armies of friendly England, France, and Italy, seen a good part of Europe within its own territory. The Turks were then rather curious after information which referred to the West, and although my accounts may have raised now and then envy, jealousy, disagreement, and conceit, yet they were listened to with pleasure.

At the end of the lesson, the sumptuous breakfast was duly brought in, and I will not prove ungrateful, and am ready to acknowledge that the Turkish art of cooking gained my gastronomical plaudits from the very commencement. It happened also often that, immediately after breakfast, my pupil and I undertook an excursion on horseback; he paid visits in my company. In few words, I spent, from the very commencement of my stay in Constantinople, a great part of my time in thoroughly Turkish society, and only near nightfall did I return to Pera and to European customs.

But my permanent stay among the Turks commenced truly only when, on the recommendation of a countryman of mine, I was chosen by the Divisionary General Huscin Daim Pasha, tutor to his son Hasan Bey, residing in his house.

I transferred my omnia mea mecum porto from Pera to the charming row of dwelling-houses of Fyndykly, got a separate room assigned all to myself, and enjoyed, for the first time since my arrival, the happy amenities of Oriental peace and Turkish comfort. The life in a strictly Mohammedan quarter of Constantinople, in the immediate vicinity of a small mosque, from whose slender minaret the earnest melancholy sounds of the "ezan" during the silence of night so magically charmed my ears; the splendid view from my window, opening on to the near sea, with its thousands of vessels, and on to the magnificent palace of Beshiktash; finally, the patriarchally dignified tone which ruled within the house—all this had such a charm of novelty for me, that it will for ever remain within memory's sweetest records.

THE WRECKED.

BY W. C. BENNETT, AUTHOR OF "SONGS FOR SAILORS."

"I WATCH AND WAIT IN VAIN."

WHERE birches bend by Loch Achray
I see a cottage door,
I see a face, so far away!
A gaze I'll glad no more—

A longing look, a fond, fond gaze,
As though its sight could reach
To where I waste my lonely days
Upon this island beach;

Oh, whisper to her, wandering breeze;
A lone heart, far away,
Breaks to be northward o'er the seas
With her by Loch Achray!

Day dies to dark, and dark to day,
Before these watching eyes;
How long—for ever must I stay
Beneath these shadeless skies?
Dumb stirless palms that watch around,
White reefs of foam and roar,
Oh, southern sights! oh, southern sound!
That I were north once more!
Oh, seaward wind! oh, wing me, breeze,
Far from this dimless day,

Through clouded skies, o'er dark dear seas,
To love by Loch Achray!

No sail upon the cloudless deep;
I watch and wait in vain;
Must I for ever watch and weep
To see a sail again?
Oh, face that day and night I see!
Oh, eyes that gaze to mine!
Oh, heart that prays that I may be
Once more at home and thine!
What sighs from my lone tropic life
Go upward, night and day,
That I again may clasp my wife
At home by Loch Achray!

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

MOST lastingly shall I remember the person of the major-domo, Vckilhardsh. He was an old grey-bearded Anatolian. The good old man had peculiar patience with my offences against the strict Oriental customs; he gave himself the trouble to teach me to sit with propriety—that is, with the legs bent under the body he taught me how to hold my head and hand; how one was allowed to yawn, sneeze, etc. His attention extended to the very minutiae.

"Thou hast come now for the first time," used he benevolently to tell me, "into a cultivated world, and thou must learn everything."

Of course, the good old man considered me as one of those individuals come from the land of the "black infidels," from the country where there existed no propriety, no morality, no customs; and he thought that a stranger from those places required just as much education as a peasant from the environs of Kharput and Diarbekir.

Very superior in appearance, however, was my lord the Pasha. It is the same who afterwards, as head of the celebrated Kuleli conspiracy, grew famous. This conspiracy had no less an aim than the removal of Sultan Abdul Medshid, together with his head men, and all this under the original idea, that hereby all the causes would be removed which essentially contributed to the downfall of the Turkish Empire, and that by such an unlawful act, but in good faith, the Ottoman Empire, tottering by age, should gain new vigour by orthodox fanaticism.

Husein Daim Pasha, a native of Tchirkassia, had by nature a rather too ample sense of freedom, and brought that temper from the free ranges of his native country into the City built on Seven Hills. He spent his youth at the court of Sultan Mahmud, during the very time of the eradication of the Janissaries, and the conflict with Egypt; and as his political views dwelt permanently but on a radical revolutionary transformation—a view shared by many of his contemporaries—he came to the idea of curing the deeply rooted evils of the Turkish State by a marvel.

His fanaticism may have been enhanced by the circumstance that he lived in close contact with the political refugees. He heard much from these, during the siege of Kars, in the long dreary nights, when seated in their circle within his tent, that would inflame his fancy. I remember still minutely how the eyes and features of the tall, slim-built man worked, whenever I communicated to him single episodes of the Hungarian war of 1848—9.

Enough: I was present in his house when the first threads of this conspiracy were spun, and the first plans formed. The enlivening spirit of the whole scheme was a Mollah from Bagdad, named Ahmed Efendi, a man of rare capacity of mind, of mighty reading, of an ascetic life, and an unbounded fanaticism. He served during the whole Crimean war as a "Gazi" (religious warrior), bare-footed, bare-headed, in a most simple garb, reminding one of the very first epoch of Islam.

Never did the sword leave his lean loins, nor the lance his cramped fist, neither by day nor by night, except during his five diurnal prayers. In the snow and in the storm, in the turmoil of battle and on the harassing rough marches, ever did the ghastly fanatic with fiery eyes lead his detachment, whose chief officer was my lord.

Such a man could not but please Husein Daim Pasha. The acquaintance was commenced in the camp. Here it was cemented into something like a blood-relationship, as proved by the fact that the lank Mollah was allowed to pass unasked even the threshold of the harem, where, within the sanctity of Turkish family life, one was most securely protected against prying listeners. For me, the appearance of Ahmed Efendi had in the commencement something awful; but later, when I, in proof of condescending confidence, was called by the name of Reshid (the Brave, the Intelligent) by the Pasha, the frightful man only then approached me with more amity, as he conjectured that by accepting the Eastern title I was ready in time to embrace his faith also. A mighty mistake! But I allowed the zealot to nurse his sweet hope. I won by it not only his goodwill, but also his instructing me in Persian.

Ahmed Efendi even granted to me the privilege of seeing him within the cell of the courtyard of the mosque. And how interesting proved those hours, spent with other youths thirsting for knowledge at the master's feet, when, as by a wonderful charm, the whole extent of Mohammedan Asia had opened to my comprehension!

Ahmed Efendi had an astounding, almost supernatural memory. He was a thorough master of the Arabic and Persian—could recite a whole library of Eastern classic scholars—and I had but to commence from my Persian Chrestomathy (collected by Mr. Spiegel) one verse from Khakani Nizami or Dshamy, and he continued the whole of the masterpiece communicated in my handbook to the very end. He could have awed me for hours by his recitations of equal worth.

To this Ahmed Efendi do I owe my transformation into an Asiatic. I say advisedly transformation, because I claim the confidence of my readers when I assert that acquaintance with the Asiatic never changed in my heart the spirit of the West. The more I learned to appreciate the culture of the Islam, and viewed the world with the eyes of its people, the higher rose in my estimation the culture, manners, and science of the West.

In the year 1860, I was very probably the only European who could enter every circle of Constantinopolitan society without hindrance, and thus gained much knowledge of the life of Stambul. And nobody need find fault with me if, returned to European society, I remember with unmingled satisfaction the hospitality I enjoyed in the houses of most eminent Turks. The condescension of the man of state, the absolute absence of all haughtiness, are indeed virtues looked for often in vain within the lands of our Western civilisation. The silly conceit, the ludicrous arrogance, and the deplorable ignorance of certain aristocrats of Europe furnish a very poor comparison to the often derided manners of Asiatic men of power and station. With us the high-born are but proud of their long noses, proportionate to their line of ancestors. The Oriental cares for the nobility of blood and descent only in his horses and sporting dogs, while with us such mere animal excellence is thought most of by the "exquisites." I am curious to know where there may be a land in Europe in which an unknown foreigner could meet with encouragement to satisfy his thirst for local knowledge, with that rapidity, by that condescending favour in the most eminent and noble circles, gaining at the same time introduction to the mighty, their benevolence and protection. With us there are indeed protectors, high patrons, who aid the man of letters and art; but there is none of that elevation, confidential friendly feeling, which meets scientific endeavours everywhere in the Orient. In our European countries, heraldic pedigree, often rotten at its core, alone gives the tone to society. In Mohammedan Asia this evil does not exist; and though the Arabs pride themselves on their achievements in arms, and on the generosity of their ancestors, yet they are far from wishing to prop up their own personal merits, as so often happens with us in the West.

To return to my literary activity in Stambul: I shall mention but briefly that I published in 1858 a German-Turkish dictionary, a little volume whose shortcomings even I the author could not deny; yet it was the first of its kind ever written, and is to the present day the only one accessible to the German travelling to Constantinople. In my study of Turkish literature there were two points especially on which I had concentrated my attention. To commence with, I found in the history of the Ottoman Empire so much which could prove useful for reference in the history of my own country, that it induced me to translate it. By this translation I came early in contact with the Hungarian Academy of Science. Within the pages of Turkish historical works, we meet absolutely with no critical pragmary, but we gain—even without such enlightenment by reasoning—by a minute circumstantial detail of narration, very much in historical dry facts and dates, for which no historian can be sufficiently grateful. For instance, it might be a little-known fact that yonder Turkish sultans who, with their devastating armies, broke into the south-eastern portions of Europe, against whom so many crusades were preached, had imperial historians travelling in their suite, and had done more for the science of the muse Clio than our true Catholic potentates and princes of those times.

Secondly, I found on the field of linguistical research, as to the study of the Eastern-Turkish language, an almost uncultivated wild and devoted to this my whole attention. I found in several libraries manuscripts useful to my purpose, and I frequented besides the cloisters (Tekkes) inhabited by Bokharites; and to insure success by every means at my command, I chose a person of Central-Asiatic birth for my teacher. Mollah Chalmurad (this was my teacher's name) made me in advance acquainted with the manners and customs of Central Asia. I hung with genuine passion on his lips whenever he narrated about Bokhara, Samarkand, the Oxus and the Jaxartes, because I soon perceived that the man travelled very much even in his own country. He had twice undertaken the pilgrimage to the holy cities of Arabia, and excelled in that acuteness and far-sightedness which are the birthright of nearly every Asiatic, but are found most powerfully developed in every far-travelled son of the East. This acuteness of his made me often tremble for my personal safety in his company.

The study of the Eastern-Turkish language had, beyond the general scientific, a still nearer specific interest for me, in consequence of its great treasure of Turkish words which the Magyar uses in common with the Turk. In my former observations, having this in view, I gave utterance to the conjecture that the use in common of some words by both Turk and Hungarian might date from their living in close proximity in Europe. But I made the experience in Constantinople, and especially in my intercourse with Anatolians, that the deeper—that is, the more eastward—the home of the Turk was, the purer and more unadulterated proved the character of his language also, and as my reader may guess, the nearer related proved the analogy between his and the Magyar language. To speak truth, even my boldest imagination never deluded itself with the hope that I might finally arrive at the abode of a pure Turanian people, which, in consequence of the nearer assimilation of the Turkish and Magyar languages eastward, would stand quite closely related in respect of its language to my countrymen.

Such an expectation, which has been falsely ascribed to me in different quarters, would have been—if only from my too superficial acquaintance with comparative philology—altogether impossible. In the next place, it would have proved me very deficient in ethnographic knowledge, to have assumed that in inner Asia—true, not quite known by us—there could live races about which Europe had no knowledge whatever. I repeat, then, that the supposition that I had considered it a chief task of my travels to find out the original birthplace of the Magyars, was from the very beginning a wrong one. All I sought was a Turkish dialect, whose age, and purity secured to it by its isolation from the West, would prove highly interesting to philology. And as that dialect could now be learned from books, nothing remained for me but to wander over those distant regions, and to acquire by hearing and speaking a practical acquaintance denied to theoretical study.

I do not doubt for a moment that, besides my desire to study the Dshagatai tongue, my longing for travel, which seems to be innate, and my ardent seeking of adventures, formed the main incentive for my decision to travel into Central Asia. The life in Stambul, with all its charms and interesting experiences, could not but act in a debilitating and enervating way on my system. During my numerous visits in Pera, I saw myself plunged after a lapse of half an hour—leaving in Constantinople the luxury of Asia, and the customs of the innermost countries of the East—suddenly into the midst of European turmoil. The comparison of the two races—there that of the East, here of the West—might have continued for some time to fascinate my attention; but in Pera, that Babel of European nationalities, I came frequently in contact with men of deep thought, who kindled in my breast the fire of further study, and encouraged me, who then considered myself yet in all things a thorough European, to the most venturesome enterprises. And how little encouragement was there needed for me!—to me who used to feel a spell come over me by the mere mentioning of Bokhara, Samarkand, and the Oxus. Oh, no! their persuasive exhortations acted only as proofs of the practicability of my undertaking. The literature of travel was tolerably well known to me, and all my doubt referred but to the dangers I should have to encounter.

The plan of a journey into Central Asia had just awoke within me, when I was honoured by the Academy of Pesth in being elected its corresponding member. This was intended as a reward for my translations of Turkish historical authorities. It formed a new incentive, inviting me to follow up my plans of the future. At that time, even in Hungary, important political changes had taken place; and when, after several years' absence, I returned in 1861 to Pesth, to hold my academical position, it required with Count D— only a suggestion for me to receive an aid of 1,000 florins (in bank notes; equal to 600 florins in silver, or £60). In my home, the success of my undertaking met with much doubt. They failed to see how one of so frail a body, and with such slender means, could travel so far. The good gentlemen of course had no idea that one neither travels by means of money, in Asia, nor by means of legs; but that the use of the tongue, and that the right one, stood in place of both. Such remarks, however, did not touch me deeply. The Academy of Pesth gave me an introductory document, my authority. This, for general comprehension among the Tartars, was worded in Latin, and addressed itself to all Sultans, Khans, and Beks. This document might have proved a sure passport to the gallows or the block, had I shown it in the Steppes or on the Oxus. Our home government of those days, too, had the generosity to grant me a passport to Bokhara. I put the best face on all intentions, and after a delay of three months in Pesth, started on a second voyage, with the view of going on my Asiatic expedition next spring.

THE CRINKLETON MYSTERY.

BY PERCY FITZGERALD.

OUR grotesque teapot was an article decidedly ugly, wearing a permanent and disagreeable grin, and with a kind of snake arrangement for handle and spout. The gentle associations—the day's labour done, the drawing in round the fire, the family circle, with the cheering and not inebriating results—seem wholly incompatible with the use of such an article; and the spectacle of the amiable fluid poured from such a vessel by gentle hands, almost a painful one. But I would not part with it for any money; it is held in affection like a cherished heirloom. Yet it is damaged—indeed, from the network of lines and cracks which covers it, even an unprofessional could see that it had been “smashed” into a hundred pieces at least. So it has. One day it got a fall—was dropped—and lay on the floor, shivered into a heap of fragments. The restoration, deemed impossible at first, was undertaken for a large sum of money, which was paid with delight, for that fall brought about what you are now going to hear.

I well recollect the day that my dear father secured it, and when he said it was “a unique.” We could see no beauty in it, although we tried hard to do so; and as to its uniqueness, we rather thought that was an advantage for the world, and for the spread of taste. He was considered a gentle enthusiast, this Mr. Crinkleton, and as I once overheard a brother-amateur whisper to his friend, “like a particular saucer—all cracked and mended,” and though I should not say it, still the conviction began to force itself on me of late years that, from over-devotion to this pursuit, he had grown a little odd. Not that he was one of the reckless, wasteful amateurs, with whom collecting is a passion as impossible to be resisted as drinking, and who devour and swallow everything with a reckless craving. He had the most surprising taste and judgment, and it was admitted that the choicest and most valuable portion of his collection had been gathered very cheaply, when he was a poor man. But I can see I have been assuming a good many things as known, which there has not been time to tell.

I, who have now the grotesque teapot in my hand, and am relating this story, was his son—a son that worshipped him, and sympathised with what friends called his hobby; though I frankly own I never could understand how this plate was precious, or that jug was rare, or this “bit” of Palissy worth more than the number of sovereigns that would cover its surface. I confess, indeed, I had a feeling, but it was one of repulsion, for those brown lizards which kept crawling over the green plates.

However, he understood these things, and I did not, though he often offered to teach, or rather, inspire me. Gradually the house began to fill with these treasures. Corner shelves and cupboards appeared, and were crowded. Cabinets became choke-full, and the fame of the “Crinkleton Collection”

As is usual in such cases, public opinion was divided, one portion of the community laughing at and pitying that poor man who was wasting his own and the family substance in a lot of crockery and gallipots; the other looking knowing, and saying that “little old Crinkleton” knew well what he was about, and would by-and-by sell the collection for ten times the amount it cost him. It did indeed seem likely—for what he had bought for a few shillings he was now offered pounds.

I was all this time what is called “a little thing”—a pet, dividing the affection of my father with his other treasures. That constituted our united family—that perpetually increasing family—I finding new relations every day, in the shape of china dogs, Chelsea shepherds, Dresden beauties, and Toby jugs. Oh, the Battersea enamel snuff-boxes and wine-labels! the tea-urns of rare Bedlin!—but I must leave this subject, or I shall never get on.

One day, however, there came a surprise, not to say a shock, for me. That queer little Crinkleton, as the neighbours and friends would call him, had brought some new treasures and curiosities. Alas! a stepmother and her daughter.

They were very designing people, and, I believe, frightened him into it. He was shrinking and timorous, he would never have had courage to carry such a scheme into execution. Thenceforth began a new and, for me, a terrible life. They brought no money with them, though he was persuaded that he was doing what is called “a good thing.”

They very soon convinced him of the contrary. Two more rapacious spoilers could not be conceived. Every moment in the day they were making an inventory of “the property” about them with a questioning eye. An order was sternly sent forth that all buying was to be given up, and that “good money” was no longer to be squandered on rubbish. Yet it could be seen that, with an extraordinary inconsistency, they watched jealously over every article of the property, counting them, and taking good care to ascertain their value. All our life in that house was of a sudden changed. Our poor dear father seemed to shrink and cower away under this despotism. As for me, I felt that all happiness was gone, and that I was living in a prison under the charge of gaolers. Many were the little furtive walks he took with me—I being no older than eight or ten years—when we would make our way guiltily to the narrow lane or street, to gaze at curiosities which he dared not purchase. It was miserable for me, whose hand was in his, to note his wistful looks, and even more miserable to see that this was but part of his sufferings under this slavery, which grew more and more galling every day.

It was on one of these occasions that we spied the grotesque teapot. The sight brought the colour to his cheeks, for he had nothing of that pattern in the collection. It was exposed in a poor, mean little den—not a curiosity shop at all—a kind of huckster's place. Here the teapot was offered with a view of finding some purchaser who would use it for the purpose of making tea. He was enraptured with it. He could at least ask the price. Four-and-sixpence—worth, he said, five guineas, and would be worth double by-and-by. As we went out it was offered for three-and-six. It was very tempting, but he resisted it then.

The next day he took me out with him for a walk, but this was for a second inspection. He delayed long before he could make up his mind, but at last the purchase was made. Then it was to be brought home, and then came the difficulty. Where was it to be placed?—for their Argus eyes would detect the slightest change. But they had an instinct that something was wrong. The daughter was in the parlour window, looking up and down the street, while she—I always thought of her as though she were a unique, like the teapot—opened the door, and gave a policeman-like glance at his figure. The grotesque was hidden away under his coat, but a great protuberance revealed its place of concealment. We were both arrested, the trembling victim assailed by both women, and the grotesque confiscated on the spot, as indeed all his treasures had been already. I saw them later inspecting it curiously, and with eager eyes; for they had a suspicion of its value, and after all trusted to his judgment.

Indeed, latterly I noticed that this pair were inspecting the cabinets; and more than once I had surprised them with their heads bent down over some little cup or figure.

One day, too, I heard them talking earnestly about some one they called "Dimbley's man," and what he had said. This did not make much impression, but in a day or two I again heard a remark about Dimbley's man, to the effect that he was coming to-morrow. In our next little walk, grown curious about the matter, I asked my father—

"Who is Dimbley's man, father?"

He started.

"Why?" he said—"what about him?—what do you know of him?—who wants him?"

These questions were put quickly, and with agitation. I told him what I had heard, when he almost gave a cry, and turned sharply round to go home.

"I see what they are at. I suspected it. They want to sell the things."

We returned hurriedly—he was in a perfect fever, and when he entered flew to inspect his darling treasures, which he found all safe, though he discovered the two women busily engaged in peering into the cabinets, and handling them cautiously. But with them was a gentlemanly and fluent personage, who was giving his opinion, and admiring the collection.

He read the whole situation at a glance. The colour flew to his cheeks, and with vehemence that was wholly artificial and unnatural he addressed the party.

"I know well what all this means," he said; "I'll not have it—I'll not allow it. It is robbery. I'll not part with these things but with my life.—Go away, sir," he said to the gentlemanly man; "this is my property. They are not to be valued or sold."

To do him justice, the gentlemanly man was much put out at this incident, and declared truly that he had merely come, as he supposed, at Mr. Crinkleton's request. And he took his departure at once. Then my father turned on them.

"Let a finger be laid on my treasures," he cried, "and I will do something desperate. I'll send them to-morrow to some museum—give them away—sooner than have them scattered. Mind, take warning, for they are part of my life!"

The two ladies were much taken aback at this sudden explosion, and even tried to soothe him. But for the rest of the day he was terribly excited, and the following morning was lying ill in bed, with wild eyes and all the symptoms of fever. A doctor was sent for to attend him—an eminent practitioner—who looked grave. Indeed, the two ladies caught the reflection from his face, and looked grave and disturbed.

I was the only one whom he seemed to recognise, though indistinctly. Again there was fresh whispering, and inspection of papers and property. And again his eyes peered out wistfully towards the door, as if he could see the spectral images of his collection floating away in the direction of Dimbley's.

He grew worse and worse. To my inexpressible grief, it one morning passed round the house in a mysterious way that we were to lose him. Some one came running for me, and took me by the hand to lead me to him. There was a piteous intelligence in his eye, and a gleam of light came into it as he saw me. He was moving his arms, and pointing, and trying to speak.

The lady who was his wife kept turning up her eyes and shaking her head, as who should say his wits were gone. But he kept his imploring glance fixed on me, making as though he would clutch something in his hand. I was sure, I could have sworn it was one of his pet treasures, and stole away to rack my little brain with desperate attempts. At first I thought it must be the two precious figures of Old Bow, representing Kitty Clive and Woodward Martin as the fine lady and gentleman, and I returned with these in my hands. A fresh eagerness came into his eyes, and he seemed to smile and nod his head, as though it was something near what he desired.

Some curious stupidity came over me—or was it my trouble? for I surely ought to have guessed, and gone out to choose some other article, which should be the right one. While I was taking a hurried bird's-eye glance over the collection, they came running to me again, and I was dragged in to see the last friend I had on earth in his agony.

* * * * *

So he passed away; and after a scarcely decent interval, the two women were going about with avaricious eyes, counting up the treasures. This time there was no one to interfere with "Dimbley's man," and the eminent firm had pronounced that the whole, when submitted to competition at their well-known mart, would bring a vast sum. By the will of the deceased collector, made shortly after his second marriage, the whole of his property was to go to her, and a small pittance was kept for us—that is, for me and for my sister, who was at a cheap boarding-school.

A great fuss began to be made about the Crinkleton Collection, and it was discovered that another portion was at some museum in the country, where it had been exhibited, and which was quite as valuable as that in our house. The whole, it was expected, would bring ten or twelve thousand pounds. They were gloating over their prospect. We—that is, my sister and I—would be beggars, but that they did not think about.

By-and-by the inventory was taken, the catalogue made out, and the prospect discovered to be even more inviting. The men in green baize arrived to pack and carry away. Spring-vans stood at the door. We saw the whole stripped gradually—there was not to be a relic kept (so I was told) to remind us of the dear old collector who had brought them together. Very timorously I begged that they would let me choose something which I might keep as a souvenir; but an excuse was made that a list had been taken, and that it would be impossible to make any alteration now.

Utterly shocked and almost desperate with rage at such heartlessness, I came to the resolution that I would have what I wanted, and determined to secure what was associated with one of the last acts of my father's life at which I had assisted, namely, the old teapot. That should be mine, and should not be subjected to the profanation of a sale. I did not care for the penalties, which I knew would be awful; they might put me to the torture, they should never know where I had concealed this relic.

My plans were laid. I chose a moment when they had gone out, and taking no one into my confidence, prepared to execute the daring scheme. It was a nervous task. The teapot was placed, with a few other articles not yet removed, on a high bracket of antique pattern over the chimney-piece. Even standing on a chair I could not reach it; still I was not to be daunted. I constructed a sort of ladder formed of chairs, which, with much trepidation, I ascended. I secured the grotesque teapot, but without ever having heard the Latin quotation, Facilis descensus, I found myself cordially endorsing its truth, and stood there on a precarious balance, carefully holding the treasure, and not knowing what to do next. To get down and leave the teapot, it might be thought, would be the simplest course; but with my nervousness, and its own insecurity, the structure now began to totter. The next instant I heard her on the stairs.

How it occurred I know not, but there followed a crash, I being left standing up on the insecure construction, whilst the old cherished teapot had slipped from my fingers, and was dashed into a hundred fragments on the hearthstone! They rushed in—I was dragged down and in a storm of scoldings was hurried off for punishment. It was inflicted with terrible severity, and I bore it without flinching. One thought was even then in my mind, to recover the shattered fragments, keep them in that condition, and perhaps one day, when I was richer, get them restored.

When they were tired of scolding and beating, they had gone down-stairs; then after waiting patiently I watched my opportunity and stole down. They had not thought it worth while to remove the fragments, which lay there in a heap—the curved handle, the leering face, the spout, the lid. I gathered them up tenderly, and as I did so, saw that a small piece of paper folded up was lying, as it were, partially thrust into the spout. I took it up with the pieces, on the ground that it was a relic of his that ought to be preserved, and reverently brought the whole mass away to my own room.

It seemed hopeless. I tried myself to put the pieces together in many different ways, but it was not to be done save by a miracle—a miracle however which skilful hands accomplished later. In a sort of despair I laid it aside, and then carelessly opened the paper.

It was signed with his name, which was sufficient to give it an interest for me. And yet this only made me feel more acutely the cruel loss of the piece of earthenware, which I felt that nothing could ever restore to us. It was a long time indeed before I set myself seriously to the task of making out what was written on the slip of paper.

It began, "Codicil to my Will," and stated that it revoked the bequest of a particular date, and left all his personal property and effects, including the china, which was to be sold off, to his two children.

This I did not quite understand at the time, nor did I see the full force and meaning of it. But seizing a favourable opportunity I got away out of the house, and hurried to a friendly Mr. Baker—of course bald and benevolent—to show it. He started as he read.

"This makes a most important difference," he said; "you must leave it with me, and I will call up in the morning."

Everything, as it proved, was ours. The cruel pair got nothing, save the small sum that had been settled on her at the time of her marriage.

The collection brought a vast sum, much more indeed than any one had ever anticipated. And the teapot, as I have already said, repaired with the most exquisite art, now reposes in a place of honour.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-FIFTH. MORE SHADOWS.

THE calls of ceremony proved rather more of an affliction than Teenie had expected; and much as she had wished before that they might be left alone, the wish was a great deal more fervent after the first half-dozen visitors had appeared.

The calls were made at uncertain hours—she was compelled to be always ready; and she was obliged to pretend to be pleased to see people who, she felt, cared nothing at all about her, and for whom she could not care anything. Then she very speedily became aware of two facts: that one-half the callers came out of idle curiosity, and the other half out of a sort of pity for her husband—as if they would show him that, although he had been foolish, they were magnanimous enough not to ignore him altogether. Very few seemed to come with any friendly disposition towards her.

Teenie didn't like this—it was humiliating to her, and she was irritated by it. If good-nature did not induce folk to desire to shake hands and wish them happy days, why should they fash themselves and her by coming at all? She did not want them.

She had not yet learned that as a wife she was bound to forget herself, and respect the civilities paid to her husband as much as if they were paid to herself.

The whole business of the calls was a disagreeable falsehood in her eyes, and several times Walter had serious difficulty in persuading her to appear. When she did appear she was silent almost to sullenness; she said "Thank you" to the good wishes which were expressed, but she said it like a parrot, without soul or any touch of sensibility to the meaning of the words. Most of the visitors went away with grim forebodings of a miserable future for the young minister.

"He's caught a Tartar," was the general exclamation.

Aunt Jane came, and Teenie could not abide her, she was so overwhelming with her patronage. Aunt Jane went away with the impression that Walter was worse than a fool—he was a donkey; and she experienced a sort of satisfaction in thinking that his harness would very soon gall him.

Widow Smyllie called, and Teenie hated her, she praised everything with such painfully sweet airs, and such thinly veiled contempt. The widow retired with the idea that Teenie was a dull, ignorant doll, of a very bad pattern.

The gentlemen were not nearly so difficult to deal with, Teenie thought; there was far more heartiness in their manner and voices than the ladies had shown; consequently she was much more herself with them, and they went away with the notion that young Dalmahoy had been lucky, all things considered. General Forbes was quite charmed with the bride, and could scarcely believe that she was only a fisherman's daughter. He mumbled a pretty speech to her, in which he was sincere enough under the influence of her brave bright eyes, and pledged himself to be her knight-errant, if ever she should need one.

Aunt Jane and the general had a fierce quarrel next day, on the subject of Walter's wife, and they parted mutually resolved never to speak to each other again. A similar resolution was usually formed by them once a month at least. But they were neighbours, they were both excellent whistplayers, and somehow the terrible resolution was always forgotten in the course of a few days, during which each did severe penance in missing the favourite rubber and the sixpenny points.

Teenie was glad when the day was over, and the outer door closed for the night. She had never known anything so wearisome or so disagreeable as that day's proceedings.

What made it all the worse, she saw that Walter was not pleased with her share in the performance, although he expressed no hint of disapprobation.

motive of these friendly visits, and try to forget or overlook any selfish thoughts which may mingle with it."

Teenie believed that he was right, but she was too much irritated just then to make confession. Still she had a fancy that, when they found it pleasanter to be alone, people had no business to intrude unasked.

She was lighting the lamp; he was sitting, book in hand, purposing to read as soon as it was lit.

"It was a pity Grace did not come to-day," he

"THE HARVESTERS WERE BUSY AT WORK."

"I hope they'll never come back again," she said spitefully.

"They are not likely to come for some time."

"The longer they stay away, the better I'll be pleased. It's a shame that they should come vexing folk for no other end than just to see what you're like, and to price your dress and your furniture, as though such things were the whole measure of your worth. I saw them taking stock of me."

He did not reply immediately, and when he did, it was in a very serious tone.

"Those people came to us, Teenie, quite as much because they think it right to come, as because they wish to see what we are like. We must do what we think to be right, too—respect the first said, "she would have been a great relief to you when you had to meet so many strangers, and she knows them all. I hope there is nothing the matter with her."

Teenie almost allowed the globe to drop over the glass funnel. He seemed to be always thinking of her; nothing could go wrong but Grace would have set it right. The mood she was in made her feel spiteful for a minute. Then, she checked herself, remembering what he had said last night. She took a healthier view of his words, and recognised in them his kindly anxiety for her comfort.

She would have been better pleased, though, if he had suggested any one but Grace.

Next day they walked over to Dalmahoy. A hot glaring sun, the earth throbbing with heat, woolly cloudlets floating drowsily against a grey sky.

They took a short cut through a field of barley, where the harvesters were busy at work. One half of the grain had been cut, and now studded the field in rows of stooks, round which half a dozen touzly-headed bairns were romping; the other half was rapidly falling under the long sweeps of the scythes. The voices of the harvesters were loud and mirthful, and an occasional snatch of song cheered on the work. The three scythesmen bent sturdily to their task: it was a point of honour amongst them how straight should be the line of standing grain each left behind him, and how short the stubble. Each scythesman was followed by an "uptaker," a woman who gathered up the cut grain in a bundle, formed a band by deftly knotting together two lengths of the straw, upon which she placed the bundle, and passed on to the next heap left by her scythesman, to repeat the same process. She was followed by the "bandster," a man who caught up the two ends of the band which the woman had made, tied them together, and placed the bundle up on end against two others, thus forming a stook, which stood there for several days to dry before being carted into the farmyard, and built up into stacks.

The bandster was followed by the "raker"—a loon of about fifteen who, with a broad horse-belt crossing his left shoulder, dragged a large rake after him, moving round and about the stooks, gathering up the loose stalks into heaps at one side.

From the top of the field to the bottom was called a "bout," and in the middle of the bout the three leaders halted to sharpen their scythes. A fierce rasping noise broke harshly upon the clear atmosphere, mingled with sounds of voices in gossip and laughter; flocks of tewhits (lapwings), their white breasts glittering in the sunlight, swept overhead.

The work began again and continued to the end of the field. There the scythes were shouldered, and the crowd of workers trudges—leisurely enough to displease the farmer, who is looking on, if he had not been so accustomed to the ways of his folk—back to the top of the bout, to begin again. During this promenade there is plenty of time for courting, story-telling, and now and then a song. The men and women, lads and lasses, take advantage of the opportunity.

The men wear white linen jackets, coloured shirts, corduroy breeches, and straw hats—except one, a distinguished poacher of the district, and he wears a foxy-like fur cap which has a close resemblance to his own reddish hair and whiskers.

The women wear great white or yellow sunbonnets, which fall over the neck and shoulders, and protrude over the brow, displaying the ruddy, healthy, laughing faces to much advantage; short gowns of brown or red-spotted calico, grey drugget petticoats short enough for a ballet dancer, exposing thick sturdy limbs covered with grey worsted stockings.

The harvesters never halted in their work when they saw the young minister, and his wife, although they knew them quite well. But when the two came near, the men gave a hearty "Fine day, sir," and the women, with respectfully averted heads, stared at Teenie sidelong, and took an inventory of everything she had on.

When the couple had passed, the harvesters nodded to each other, made comments and jokes, with some of which neither Walter nor his wife would have been pleased had they overheard, although there was not a word of ill-nature in anything that was said. There was, on the contrary, a very hearty "Wish them weel" on every lip; but the young couple supplied material for conversation and speculation during the course of the next two bouts.

The Laird was quite gracious in his reception; he saluted Teenie in a stately way, and expressed the happiness he felt in seeing her look so well; he hoped she was comfortable in the new house; and if there was anything he could do to add to her comfort, she had only to mention it.

Teenie felt, as she always did with Dalmahoy, uncertain whether he was in earnest or making fun of her.

"Everything is very comfortable in the house," she said, with eyes fixed on the carpet, and thoughts wandering back to the last interview she had with the Laird in that room—his warning that she should refuse Walter, and his reference to the Methven fortune. Somehow she wondered, in a faint distant way, whether she had done right or wrong in acting contrary to his advice—"but thank you all the same."

"How funny you should come to-day, and we were just going over to see you!" said Miss Burnett, sailing into the room, her long neck bare as usual.

"You do look nice—I wish I was married!" cried Alice, with her customary ecstacy.

The ladies entered into an animated cross-examination of their sister-in-law, as to the latest styles of bonnets and dress which she had seen in Edinburgh. They were properly shocked to find that she was lamentably ignorant upon this vital subject. She could not describe one of the countless new bonnets she must have seen in the shops and on the ladies in Prince's Street; she could not give the remotest idea of the colour, material, or—most important of all—the shape and trimmings of a single dress!

"Head and body are all fluffed up behind in a silly way," was all the description she could give, and the ladies were much disappointed.

Poor Teenie had been too much taken up with her husband, too much interested in the city and the various excursions they made, to Craigmillar, Roslin, and other places, to give the slightest heed to the fashions; and now she found that all the historical, biographical, and topographical information she had collected was as nothing compared to the fashion of a bonnet!

She felt humbled in the presence of her grand sisters, and sorry that she had displayed such complete ignorance of what a lady ought to have known and observed.

"But I can tell you all about Allan Ramsay and his 'Gentle Shepherd,'" she cried, making a last effort to rescue her character from the abyss of utter ignorance; "I saw his statue, and Christopher North's—that was the great Professor Wilson, and I'm going to read all his books."

"Oh, how funny!" exclaimed Miss Burnett, somewhat more shortly than usual.

"Yes, dear, but we'd rather hear about the bonnets," said Alice again pathetically; "now that papa keeps us so close here, we can only see these things once in two or three years, and it would have been so nice to have gone to the flower show in something fresh from Edinburgh, which is always fresh from London, and that again is fresh from Paris. It would have spited Madam Smith of Kingshaven, who makes a trip once a year to London, and dictates to everybody all the year round on the strength of it. It would have been nice to spite her. I wish we had thought of telling you what to look at."

"I wish you had," said Teenie humbly, and ready to submit to any penance for her stupidity.

Walter and his father were standing in the recess of one of the windows, talking seriously.

"I'm heartily glad you find things answer well so far," the Laird was saying, "and I hope it will continue. I hope it for my own sake as well as yours."

"I have no doubt of it."

"At present, you mean?"

"No, always."

"Just so: we shall not discuss the question: I hope you may be right. All I want is that you should quite understand, as you have made your bed so you must lie on it."

"I am quite content," answered Walter smiling; "I accept the future as it may come to me; and whether it be good or ill, I hope my friends will make allowances for me."

"Don't fear for them: our friends make many more allowances for us than we give them credit for. If we were pulled up every time we blunder through ignorance, or selfishness, or carelessness, we would be worried into our graves in a year. Do you make allowance for them. I think that much more needed."

"Thank you, sir; I shall not fail in that if they will only show consideration to her."

"She'll earn consideration for herself, or I'm mistaken," said Dalmahoy, looking at Teenie through his glasses as she sat between his two daughters. "You remember what I have told you; for although my resolution not to help you might break down, that won't alter the fact that my pockets are empty, my account at the bank blank, and I can't help you even if I would."

"I trust you will never be annoyed by any necessity to think of helping us."

He spoke quietly, but proudly too, proud in the sense of youth, health, and hope, and in the possession of the rarest treasure a man can call his own—the wife he loved, and who loved him.

They quitted Dalmahoy with all honours. Peter Drysdale was never more respectful than he was to Teenie; he had not smiled for years until she came—she made him think of the grand visions he had entertained when he first saw the "panoramy," and he declared that she "wasna the least upsetting."

Alice at the window waved a handkerchief to them as they passed down the avenue; and the Laird, twirling his glasses round his forefinger, vowed that they did not look ill-matched.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SIXTH.

DAME WISHART.

THEY walked on to Craigmillar.

As they came near the house both looked anxiously for Grace, but she was not visible. Both had the same impression that there was something unusually quiet about the house. No dog stirred, and no one appeared to welcome them.

"I am afraid Grace is ill," he said, as he rang the bell.

"You think a great deal about Grace," she said, looking straight at him, and with a faint return of the old feeling of spitefulness.

"Yes," he replied, with the clear honest look into her eyes which nothing but perfect honesty on his part, and utter absence of a suspicion of her feeling, could have permitted; "she occupies the next place to you, Teenie, in my thoughts. She has always been good and generous to me."

"More generous than most women would have been, as you know," he would have added, but he happily checked himself, thinking that the reminder might be unpleasant. He had no idea how unpleasant it would have been. An honest man is very stupid when placed in such a position as Walter's, and he was stupid and blind too.

They entered the drawing-room, and presently Grace herself came to them, pale, and eyes sunken. She advanced quickly to Teenie, kissed her, and in a low earnest voice said—

"I am glad to see you back, and looking well."

There was no mistaking the sincerity of that voice and look, no mistaking the truth of the brave heart that beat within the frail frame of the bonnie, unfortunate woman.

Then she turned to Walter. He kissed her too, and Teenie felt no pang of jealousy. Somehow the appearance of Grace, and her manner, had altogether disarmed the incipient viciousness with which she had been disposed to regard her.

"I was afraid you were ill, Grace," he said warmly, and holding her hand.

How her heart beat! how her whole form quivered under his touch, and the kindliness of his words! What was she not ready to sacrifice, just to be permitted sometimes to touch his hand—sometimes to hear his voice saying a friendly word to her! Poor Grace, so strong to help others, so powerless to help herself; she would have sacrificed anything to have an occasional smile from him, if no more than such a smile as he might give to a pet animal. Surely Teenie could not grudge her that!

"No, I am not ill, but my mother has had a bad turn, and I have been obliged to stay with her day and night. She cannot bear me to be absent from her, sleeping or waking. That is why I have not been over to see you."

"I thought there was something wrong when you did not come. But I hope aunt will soon be better."

"She is very old," said Grace wearily, "and she has little chance of being much better in this world."

Standing there, holding his hand, he looking in her face, which had grown haggard during the last few days, she saw that he was quite unconscious of the real cause of her altered appearance. Standing there, holding his hand with one of her own, and taking one of Teenie's in the other, she silently vowed that he never should know the real and deeper cause. She looked at him with a faint despairing smile, and then turned her face towards the wife with such a pitiful expression of inquiry, asking did she understand, that Teenie felt ashamed of the cruel thoughts of which she had been guilty, and wished that she could do something, however slight, to comfort this poor soul, that seemed to be cast out upon the world without any place in which to rest.

Grace saw that she understood, and the fingers tightened upon hers, and the eyes brightened with gratitude—brightened and glowed, and the whole face flushed as if with new health, in the new pleasure which had been given to her.

It was a compact between the two as distinct and well understood as if lawyers had written it out with their disagreeable formality on imperishable parchment. It was a compact as clearly defined between the two as if it had been discussed by a congress of lawyers. Which of them would be the first to forget it?

"Is aunt in bed?" he asked.

"No; I wish she could be persuaded to keep her bed; she would suffer much less pain; but she persists in getting up to her chair, and I have difficulty enough to keep her in the one room. She has attempted to go out several times, but she cannot walk, and I am obliged to watch her closely lest she should fall and hurt herself in one of her efforts to get upon her feet."

"Why will she not stay in bed?"

The tears glistened in Grace's eyes.

"She has a great dread of death, and fancies that if she were once to yield and lie abed she would die immediately. So she almost lives in her chair. It is often twelve and one o'clock before I can get her to lie down, and then she is awake at the first sign of daylight, insisting upon getting up. When she is very ill she will not go to bed at all, thinking that by keeping to her chair she will escape her enemy."

"This must be very wearying to you, Grace. You must let Teenie and me relieve you."

She shook her head.

"My mother will scarcely allow me to be out of the room."

"We'll go up and propose it to her, at any rate," he said decisively.

There was a momentary and inexplicable hesitation on Grace's part, and she glanced at Teenie doubtfully, as if the proposed visit might not be agreeable to her.

"I would like to see your mother," said Teenie quietly. She had never known a mother, and she felt eager to offer help in any way that might relieve Grace.

"Very well, come up, but you must not mind anything she says."

And again she looked pleadingly, as it were, at Teenie.

They went up-stairs. Mrs. Wishart was seated in her big chair, her hands falling limply over the sides, her chin sunk upon her breast, a painful spectacle of suffering age fighting stoutly against natural decay.

Walter advanced and kissed her, expressing a hope that she was well.

"That's a good lad. I have na ken'd what a man's mou' was like this long while. I'm no just so spry as I would like to be, but I'll be on my feet again in a day or twa. It was kind o' you to come and see an auld body like me. But wha's yon?"

"That's my wife—Teenie."

"Wife, wife," mumbled the old lady vacantly.

"Yes, and she has come with me to see if you will let us wait on you sometimes, in order to save Grace."

"Wife," continued Dame Wishart, as if she had not heard him, and as if she were making an effort to solve some riddle; "that canna be your wife, Wattie; there's your wife" (pointing to Grace). "You were paired lang syne, when you were bairns, and it brings Craighburn and Dalmahoy together, just as we would like to see them. Craighburn's the richest of the two, Wattie, and you may count yoursel' lucky, for Grace has had a heap o' offers, and——"

"You forget, mother," said Grace, advancing, with much deprecation in the look she gave to Teenie.

"Forget? forget?" exclaimed Mrs. Wishart, startled and distressed, for that was one of the calamities which, next to death, she most dreaded—the loss of memory.

She pressed her gaunt fingers against her temples, and her feeble eyes wandered vaguely from one face to the other.

"You forget, mother, that Walter has married Teenie Thorston—a good, bonnie lass."

"Wha is she?"

"You remember Skipper Thorston?"

"Him that saved the folk that were drowning aboard the steamer Ariel?"

"Yes."

"Ah, you see I mind quite weel what happens, and that was a pickle years syne. But what about him? What were you saying? You're awfu' ravell't in your way of telling things, Grace. You should try to be like me."

"Well, it's his daughter Walter has married."

"Where are you, Wattie?" And she groped about for him as if she were in the dark.

"Here, aunt" (taking her hand affectionately, although he felt somewhat vexed upon Teenie's account).

"It's no possible that you've given Grace the gae-by? For though I couldna thole to let her away just now, she's a fine bairn, and she'll be a grand wife to him that gets her."

"Grace and I have settled that, aunt," he said awkwardly, and wishing that Teenie might have been spared this dialogue.

"You mean that you have done it."

"It was done with her consent, and because we thought it best."

"Mother, mother, you are forgetting. I explained it all to you," cried Grace, much disturbed; "and the doctor said you were not to excite yourself on any account."

To the amazement of the others the old woman stood up on her feet, gazing fiercely upon them all. Years seemed to pass away from her as she spoke—

"I do not forget, Grace. I mind that, when you were a bairn, I settled that you should be the means of keeping Dalmahoy in the family. I married in the hope of it, when I saw the waste my daft brother was carrying on. I brought you up in the expectation of it, and I could almost have been content to die, seeing the wish fulfilled in you and Wattie."

"Whisht, mother, whisht! a stronger will than ours has ordered things as they are."

"I will not whisht, and you had no right to take upon yourself to settle a matter of this kind without speaking to me."

"I did speak to you, but please wait till they are gone, and I'll explain."

"You must have spoken to me when I was asleep, but I'm awake now. Do you ken what you have done, you and Wattie between you? You have murdered the family of Dalmahoy; and here am I, an auld frail woman, just dropping into the grave, and learn at the last minute that what I planned and lived for has gone all agee through your fault."

"I'm sorry, aunt, that I should have disappointed you," said Walter, eager in any way to divert the storm from Grace's head.

Dame Wishart was twenty years younger in her wrath.

"Sorry—you may weel say that! You are a fool, Wattie, and that poor lassie who has helped to make a fool of you will be sorry for it some day. You have broken up Dalmahoy, for I tell you that wild brother of mine hasna a penny to bless himself with; but, worse than that almost, you have lost the best wife that ever man had. Oh, I understand, auld and dotered as I am. Grace has given in to your nonsense just because she was the most fit to be your true wife. You have been cruel to her, but take my word wi' you—the word of a wife that stands in the grave—you have been far more cruel to yourself. She cared for you, you poor stupid gowk, as never man was cared for by woman. I ken it a', blind and helpless as I look. Awa' wi' you, awa' wi' you—I canna thole you near me!"

She dropped back upon her chair apparently lifeless. She had spoken with such rapid vehemence that no effort of her daughter could interrupt her, and she was utterly insensible to the agony she caused to the one on whose behalf she spoke. Grace would have done anything to have spared Teenie such a scene, and so would Walter. He had grown pale, and would, in obedience to the distressed signals of Grace, have forced Teenie from the room. But she imperiously determined to remain and hear all that was said. She was the only one who was quite calm, but her eyes brightened and her cheeks flushed a little as Dame Wishart proceeded. For the first time she seemed to understand all that Walter had given up for her sake.

He advanced hastily to offer assistance in restoring his aunt, but Grace motioned him back.

"She will be worse if she sees you. Don't stay."

—Teenie, remember she is very ill. I'll be over to see you as soon as I can get out."

Teenie pressed her hand without speaking, but the big bright eyes were full of pathetic interest and regret.

On the way home they found conversation difficult—he was vexed by what his aunt had said, because he felt that it would annoy his wife; and she was sorry for it, knowing how much he would suffer on her account; but neither had sense enough to speak out the feeling which was uppermost, and so they watched each other wistfully, each wishing that it were possible to say something which would impart comfort to the other, and yet saying nothing.

"You must not mind what my aunt said," he remarked with an effort, as they were ascending Drumliemount; "she is an old woman, and it is not easy for her to submit to the destruction of any of her cherished schemes. But I did not know until to-day that she had so set her heart upon that match."

He pretended to laugh, and looked most uncomfortable.

"Would it have made any difference if you had known it?" said Teenie, as he opened the gate and she passed through.

"I'm afraid it wouldn't," he answered, this time with quite a hearty grin, for he was looking at her, so brave, bright, and bonnie, and at their cosy cottage. Home and beauty, both his. Was it possible to have decided otherwise than he had done?—"Are you sorry?"

"No," she answered absently, "but I was wondering——"

"Well, what were you wondering, now?"

"I was wondering," she said, halting to pluck a white rose, and to pin it to his coat, "I was wondering if some day you might not remember all that your aunt has said, and maybe blame me."

"It will be you only who will be able to make me remember it, or to regret what I have done. When that day comes, Teenie, we'll be a very miserable couple. We don't look like it just now."

And both laughed, with something approaching gaiety in their tone.

END OF CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SIXTH.

OLD-FASHIONED ELEPHANTS.

As a piece of general information, and apart from natural history knowledge, most people are aware that there are but two living species or kinds of elephant. These species include the Indian elephant (Elephas Indicus), the most familiar form, seen in menageries, and which is susceptible of being highly trained and domesticated; and then we also find the African species—the Loxodon Africanus of naturalists—this latter being of a fiercer and less tractable disposition than his Indian relative. The differences and distinctive characters of these two kinds are readily appreciable to the ordinary observer. Thus, the Indian elephant has a concave forehead, possesses ears of comparatively small size, and the upper surface of the molar or grinding teeth is divided into a number of transverse spaces by the peculiar arrangement of the enamel of these teeth. And, lastly, the fore feet in the Indian species possess five hoofs, whilst the hind feet are provided with four hoofs only. In this species, also, the male animals are alone provided with the characteristic tusks—which in all elephants consist of two of the incisors, or front teeth, of the upper jaw; these organs being very largely developed, and continuing to grow during the entire lifetime of the animal.

The African elephant is distinguished on the other hand by its convex forehead, and the larger size of its ears. The upper surfaces of the molar teeth of this species are divided into lozenge-shaped spaces by the arrangement of the enamel; and the fore feet in the African species are furnished with four hoofs, the hind feet possessing only three. Then, lastly, both the male and female animals in the African species possess tusks, those of the males attaining the largest size.

Such is a brief resumé of the characteristics of the two surviving members of what, in past ages of our earth's history, was a large and numerous family. Although the elephant order is thus sparsely represented in the present day, it attained a high development in former epochs, the history of which belongs to the domain of the geologist, rather than to that of the naturalist. And the past development of the elephants has reference not only to numbers, but also to the large size and curious conformation of many members of the group; whilst in relation to man's own geological history, and to the first appearance of human life, in Europe at least, certain extinct elephants afford highly important information alike to the geologist and antiquary.

Although, humanly speaking, and in relation to the ordinary ideas of time, the ancestry of the elephant order might be regarded as exceedingly remote, geologically speaking their origin is of comparatively recent date. The first traces of elephant-remains occur in rocks belonging to what geologists term the Miocene age ; these being formations which comprise rocks of recent origin, and which lie comparatively near the surface of the earth. But it must be remembered that a thing geologically recent is, in ordinary language and ideas, incomprehensibly remote. And bearing this latter observation clearly in mind, we may find the past history of the elephant family exceedingly interesting from more than one point of view.

The earliest representatives of the group are found as fossils in the Miocene rocks of India, and from these formations the remains of upwards of six different species have been obtained. India at a former period must therefore have formed a centre of distribution for the elephant tribe ; although, knowing little or nothing as yet, regarding the geology of other Asiatic regions, it may be premature to assert that other Eastern countries may not yield as rich a store of elephant-remains. Of the Indian species, all have died out or been exterminated except the single living Asiatic elephant, and according to trustworthy accounts, this familiar form is rapidly passing out of existence also, through the inroads of man upon the species, and also upon the territory and habitat of these animals.

It may seem somewhat strange to hear European elephants talked of, just as the existence of the British lion, bear, or hyæna may seem to ordinary readers of an entirely hypothetical kind. Not only, however, have the remains of several distinct European elephants been found, but these latter species must have existed in Europe at a date much more recent than that at which their relatives lived and became extinct in Asia. The deposits known as the Pliocene and Post-Pliocene, bring us very nearly to the formations and soils of our own day, and to the geologist's mind it seems but as yesterday when compared with the vastness of anterior epochs, since the last representative elephant vanished from the category of European animals.

One of the most familiar of these latter forms is the Elephas antiquus of geologists, which must have possessed a wide distribution, not only in space, as represented over the European Continent, but in time, as represented in geological epochs or ages. Thus we find the remains of this form in Italy and in France ; later on, its remains crop up in the superficial deposits of Spain and Southern Europe generally. And as to the time or period during which this form persisted in Europe, we have certain evidence that, as it existed before the Glacial or great Ice age, so it persisted throughout that uncongenial period, and apparently lived and flourished amid the ice and snows which marked that famous epoch. And we further know that it survived the rigours of the Ice age, and that it only became extinct when a more genial climate had been inaugurated, and when the present features and aspects of our earth had begun to be apparent.

The form which we are discussing did not differ materially, or to any great extent, from the existing elephants, either in size or structure. But, like other huge and extinct quadrupeds, the European elephants must have been provided with coverings of hair or wool, enabling them to brave the lower temperatures and varying warmth of the regions and times in which they were placed, and during which they existed. We know for a fact that a certain species of rhinoceros was in this way provided with a woolly coat ; this latter form being essentially Northern in its distribution. And, similarly, the celebrated Mammoth, to which we shall presently allude, was furnished with a covering of wool and hair, fitting it for residence amongst snow and ice, and otherwise enabling it to live in regions in which the living elephants would inevitably perish.

A curious and somewhat anomalous elephant of European celebrity was the "Maltese," or "pigmy" elephant. Of this variety there were several kinds, the "Maltese" elephant par excellence—the remains of which are found in the superficial deposits of that island—being only four feet in height, a circumstance from which the familiar name of "donkey elephant" has been derived ; and another and still smaller species of "pigmy" elephant has been described, this latter form averaging only three feet in height.

Mastodon remains first occur in the Miocene rocks, and several European as well as Indian species are described from these formations. Like the Elephas antiquus, the Mastodons extended from the Miocene into the Pliocene period, and thus survived the important physical changes that marked the transitionary periods of that age. The Mastodons possessed molar or grinding teeth of peculiar structure, adapting them for triturating and bruising vegetable tissues ; the crowns of these teeth being elevated into nipple-like cones or prominences, whereby the plant-food could be thoroughly divided and crushed. And these animals, besides possessing the ordinary tusks of the upper jaw, were generally provided with shorter tusks springing from the lower jaw ; the latter teeth, however, in the majority of instances, do not appear to have attained any great size.

Another extinct elephant of large size was the Dinotherium, the remains of which occur in the Miocene rocks of Central Europe, France, and in Asia as well. The peculiarity of this form consisted in the absence of tusks in the upper jaw, and in the huge development of those of the lower jaw,

And these lower tusks, unlike those of other elephants, were curved downwards and backwards, instead of upwards and forwards. The functions of these tusks appear to have been chiefly directed to aiding the Dinotherium in climbing on the banks of rivers or estuaries, or in digging up the roots upon which it, in all probability, fed. It thus appears to have been amphibious in its habits, and from this consideration it was long included among such forms as the existing dugongs and manatees, or "sea-cows," which are nearly related to the whales.

The last extinct elephant which we may notice has every right to be regarded as the most famous of the group; not only from its peculiarities of structure, but also from its relations to primeval man, with whom it was, in the latter stages of its existence at least, contemporary. The Mammoth (Elephas primigenius) has long been famed, not only in scientific but in popular estimation, as the latest form which sustained itself in the colder regions of the world, and as an elephant which appears to have been absolutely confined in its distribution to cold latitudes.

As fitting it for such a residence and life, the woolly and hairy covering of the body, already noticed, may be mentioned. The exact nature of this body-covering was clearly ascertained from the examination of a nearly perfect mammoth which was found literally packed and preserved in ice, near the mouth of the river Lena, in Siberia. The skin was seen to be covered by a coat of reddish wool, interspersed with longer hairs of a black hue; and the structure of the skeleton, and of the body generally, was also definitely ascertained from this specimen—the skeleton of which is now preserved in the St. Petersburg Museum—as well as from other specimens which have been found in a similar and more or less perfect condition.

The specimen from the Lena measured sixteen feet four inches, from the forehead to the end of the tail—which, however, had been partly destroyed. It was nine feet four inches high, and the tusks measured along their curve nine feet six inches each. The Mammoth more closely resembled living elephants than any of the extinct species. The tusks, however, are much more curved than in other elephants, and are generally larger; and the other and grinding teeth, which resemble those of the Indian elephant, have the ridges more closely set than in the living Asiatic species.

The tusks of the Mammoth have long been sought after in Siberia, on account of the ivory; but they occur as fossil remains in Great Britain, France, Germany, Russia, Asia, and North America also. From Essex, for example, the tusks of a Mammoth have been obtained, one of which measured nine feet ten inches along the outermost curve, and was two feet five inches in circumference at the base. And other localities, in the southern districts of England especially, have afforded specimens of these gigantic elephant-remains.

It has been now proved by abundance of satisfactory evidence that the Mammoth and primitive man were contemporaries, in the later periods of Mammoth existence at least. The fossil remains of the Mammoth have been found in closest proximity to traces of human handiwork; and, indeed, a rude portrait of it has been found scratched upon a portion of its tusk—the rough art-handiwork of primeval man, thus attesting the fact of his having seen the animal depicted in his sketch. And from other sources the evidence of man's propinquity to this old elephant has been fully supported and confirmed. Judging thus of the antiquity of the Mammoth, we may similarly decide concerning the antiquity of man himself; and thus the elephants of the past, in their relation to man's past history, constitute a subject of great import and interest, alike to the geologist, theologian, and antiquary.

ANDREW WILSON.

A HERMIT-BEE.

ANACREONTIC.

DEAR Proteus, who such manifold shapes
Could take whenever it suited thee,
Just help an unfortunate jackanapes,
And turn me into a hermit-bee!

I hope you know the creature I mean—
No other bee would do duty as well;
It isn't a drone, it isn't a queen,
But a lonely thing in a single cell.

(Perhaps you'll say that you've no pretence
To the power of changing another's frame;
That's some other god's; well, no offence—
Just kindly oblige with the party's name.)

Yes, a hermit-bee is the thing for me;
He scorns the crowds of the storied nest;
A rare independent fellow is he,
And takes the lodging that suits him best.

Good-natured god! oh, I thank you much;
A wonderful quick transformer are you;
For here I am, at a single touch,
Behorned, bewinged, and becoming to view!

And now for the cave I've tried so hard
As a suitable hermit dwelling to win.
Good Pro., when settled I'll send you a card:
"At home.—The Dimple, Dorothy's Chin!"
H. G. B. HUNT.

AN UNPLEASANT VISITOR.

"BEING THE STRONGER MAN"

AT half-past five in the morning of a certain Fourth of June, I walked on shore from the Havre boat at Southampton, setting foot once more on English soil after an absence of eight years, the greater part of which had been spent in a very wild district of South America, where I had made some money. How I am not going to say, though there was nothing wrong or dishonourable about it ; but there was much risk, and my poor little capital of five thousand pounds was several times in imminent danger of being swamped in the process of decupling. My luck might not befall others, and I decline to tempt any to engage in a similar venture. Gambling, some men called it, but that was unjust. The peculiarity of gambling is that one must win at another's expense, whereas everybody engaged in the enterprises I allude to might be a gainer, just as everybody might be ruined.

Well, here I was, back in my native land once more, and heartily ashamed at not feeling more enthusiastic on the occasion.

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead," etc.,

I repeated to myself, and had to own that there did, and I was the man who deserved Sir Walter Scott's reprobation. My parents were dead; I had no brothers or sisters; with friends and distant relatives I had kept up no correspondence. I could impute no blame to any one, and felt no bitterness; but I was dull and lonely, and not at all sentimental.

Then my hotel, when I reached it, seemed to grudge its hospitality at that hour of the morning. There was a stale smell about the coffee-room, which was being swept out by a man who looked half awake and utterly miserable. Going to bed was out of the question, as I had slept soundly all the way over from Havre. There seemed no particular reason why any one should remain at Southampton at all, beyond the cogent fact of there being no train for some hours, so I thought that the inn folk would be on the alert for straggling guests. But no; in order to get my luggage taken in and stowed away, I was obliged to use quite forcible language.

That accomplished, a walk till my countrymen woke up a bit seemed the only resource. One, a small and juvenile compatriot, had already awoke—an exceptionally early bird, who probably hungered for a worm. I met him at a street-corner, and he wanted to clean my boots. This, being a sort of welcome, soothed my feelings, and I let him have his way, though the steward of the steamer had put quite sufficient polish on them. Then I started for my walk. The town looking deathly with all its shutters up, I passed through it into the open country, and took a long circuit. Between seven and eight, I came to a picturesque village, with a very pretty church and churchyard. The latter was quite a garden, tempting me to walk in, wander about, and moralise. A winding path led me up to a wicket-gate, communicating with extensive and well-cared-for grounds, which surrounded a substantial house, no doubt the clergyman's residence. A step on the gravel causing me to turn my head, I saw an old gentleman in a white necktie coming along one of the paths with a rake in his hand; and I was about to retire, when I recognised him as my former tutor.

"Mr. Stanhope!" I called.

He paused, and came towards the wicket in his old courteous way—a little more stately, though, I fancied, than formerly.

"You wish to speak to me?" he said.

"Do you not remember me, sir?" I cried; "I am Harry Morton."

"Is it possible?" he exclaimed. "Why, I declare it is Harry himself! The fair, smooth-faced boy, turned into a bronzed, bearded man. No wonder I did not recognise you at first. Come in, come in; I am glad to see you. Where have you been all these years? What have you been doing? Why did you not write?"

"I landed in England, for the first time since we parted, just two hours ago."

"And you came to see me at once—that was right and kind."

"No; I thought of you still as in Somersetshire; it was quite by chance that I lit upon you here. I hope the change is for the better?"

"Yes, indeed," said Mr. Stanhope, "this living is a very good one, and I am quite a rich man. Since you have so fortunately found me, you must pay me a visit. We will send for your luggage after breakfast—for which, by-the-by, you must be ready."

My old tutor had indeed risen considerably in the world, since the days when he was glad to take pupils to make both ends meet. His house was elegantly furnished, the plate on the table massive and handsome, and the meal well served, with ice for the butter, and such little luxuries, not often found in the establishment of a man with no female belongings. But it seemed that Mr. Stanhope, being an archdeacon, was expected to entertain many guests, and had therefore chosen a good upper servant, who understood all such matters.

He alluded to his Sybaritism as not being very apostolic.

"But what would you have?" he asked. "I receive a good income for the purpose of keeping up a certain appearance, and it would be a breach of trust if I lived like an anchorite. I believe I am thought mean for not having a footman, but I hate men-servants about me."

"But you cannot have women to look after your horse and carriage; how do you manage there?"

"Oh, the groom is a married man, and lives in a cottage close by."

I remarked that, the situation of the rectory being somewhat lonely, I should have thought the presence of a man-servant in the house would have been desirable; but the archdeacon laughed at the notion, saying that the people about him were so honest, that he believed he might leave his doors and windows open day and night without risk of robbery; and as for professionals from the large towns, it was not likely that they would organise a trip, the profits of which would be so small.

"And now," he added, when breakfast was over, "you will excuse me for a few hours, I know. I have some work to do which cannot be put off. After luncheon we will drive over to Southampton for your luggage. Meantime the library is at your disposal, for during the summer months I always write in a small room opening into my bed-room."

The library was a handsome and comfortable apartment, very different from the pupil-room of former years. But most of the old volumes which stood in the book-shelves were familiar, at least so far as their backs were concerned, and as I sat and looked at them I fell into a reverie.

I suppose that few men have escaped the predicament of loving a woman who did not return the compliment; it is a sort of moral measles which most of us go through in early life, when it does not injure the constitution. After the age of forty these juvenile diseases are more serious, but then we are not so liable to catch them.

I had my love-disappointment when very young; but the attack must have been of unusual severity, for the effects were lasting. When I left school and went, at the age of eighteen, to Mr. Stanhope, to be prepared for Oxford, he had a niece living with him—an orphan child dependent upon him for protection, though not for support, as she was comfortably provided for. Indeed, her father, when requesting his brother to take care of her, thought that he was benefiting both parties, and that the use of the child's income would add to the comforts of a clergyman struggling on an income little over a hundred pounds a year.

But Mr. Stanhope was extremely—perhaps over scrupulous about the employment of the interest on the girl's capital, and endeavoured to reduce the indirect advantages accruing to himself, from the extra household expenditure necessary for a young lady's comfort, to the lowest degree possible; while any fancy of hers that was purely personal was gratified at once, which was hardly a judicious system from an educational point of view. When the girl was old enough to take charge of the household affairs, indeed, she easily managed to add to her uncle's comforts without wounding his susceptibilities; for he was simple and unsuspicious, as most learned men are.

With Ella Stanhope I fell desperately in love. It is all very well to laugh at the passion of boys, which indeed is often marked by amusing extravagances, but it is very genuine. After a little experience, a man learns that individuals of the other sex are human—fallible like himself; but at nineteen he looks upon the object of his affections as a demi-goddess, and there is a touch of idolatry in his devotion to her. There is something almost sublime in the way a love-sick youth ignores all obstacles, in the firmness of his faith in the future—in the cool way in which he treats everything and everybody, as existing merely for the furtherance of his amorous prospects. It is well that these early passions rarely come to anything, for the risk of disappointment is terrible. When the boy-husband finds that the girl-wife is not his ideal, he is apt to cool with perilous rapidity.

Ah, well! moralise as I may, I find it impossible for me to believe that I should not have been an exception to the general rule. In spite of experience and observation, I feel convinced that my life would have been a very happy one if Ella had passed it with me. I do not blame her, or accuse her of trifling with me. She was quite a child, and did not know her own mind. When I found, after a year's intimacy, that friendship had ripened into love, it was easy to persuade her that she had experienced a similar change of feeling towards myself. She never meant to wound me or deceive me, of that I am certain. I believe that she would really have loved me in time if—Pshaw! one may wander for ever in the dreamland of "ifs."

I went to Oxford, where my most intimate companion was a man named Stanley. Not that there was much in common between us beyond youth, high spirits, and a turn for frolic. Our acquaintanceship was an accident; our rooms were on the same staircase, we were both freshmen surrounded by strangers, and happened to speak to one another on the evening of our arrival.

Too great a votary of pleasure to read, he failed in the first examination we went in for; and as I passed creditably, he asked the secret of my success; for I seemed to be as idle, or nearly so, as himself. I told him that, though inattentive to lectures at college, I read steadily with a private tutor in the vacations; and as it was very necessary to him that he should pass, he determined to follow my example; and so, thinking to do a good turn to both, I introduced him to Mr. Stanhope.

Then came the old stereotyped story—my friend "cut me out"—the girl I loved found fresh homage preferable to stale. All is fair in love and war, they say, but I refuse to endorse the proverb. Slander is foul play under any circumstances, and Stanley made use of slander to warp Ella's heart from me. And he concealed his object, and taught her concealment; and he professed friendship for me all the time. Pah! I would sooner play the part of dupe than supplant another on such terms.

I suppose he loved her, after his fashion, if that is any excuse; for her bit of money was hardly enough to tempt him into a distasteful marriage. To have sought her uncle's consent would have been useless, for though Stanley was somewhat older than myself, he was not in a position or of an age to marry with prudence; besides, Mr. Stanhope loathed deceit and treachery of any kind, and would have been indignant on my behalf.

So Stanley persuaded Ella to elope with him. His influence over her must have been unbounded, for under it she made a false declaration as to her age, in order to facilitate their marriage.

I learned my fate from a letter sent me by Ella herself, in which she asked my forgiveness.

I could forgive her easily enough, but him—never! I was very young, and so far made a fool of myself as to send him a challenge, which of course he laughed at. He had no particular objection to shooting me, he wrote in reply, but the very strongest to being hanged for it. Oh, how I raved that the days of duelling had passed! I would have given every penny I possessed in the world for an hour alone with him in a desert, foot to foot, none knowing of our whereabouts. As for assaulting him publicly, the idea of that soon passed away. An unseemly scuffle, ending in a charge before the magistrate, and a jocular account of the whole affair in the police reports—it was not to be thought of. No, I had no redress, and my hatred of my enemy was all the more intense. It was not the mere fact of the girl jilting me for him—I could have got over that with my infatuation for her; it was the treachery, and the sense of being tricked, which made me thirst so for revenge.

Even now, as I sat in the library, ruminating over the old story after so many years' absence, my breath came short and my pulses throbbed as they had done when conflict was forced upon me in the wild lands where I had been residing. Stanley had befooled me—made me his tool—driven me from my native country—slandered my good name—all with perfect impunity, and I hated him as keenly as when my wounds were fresh. So absorbed was I in dreaming over the past, that I started when the archdeacon joined me with the remark that he had done his morning task, and was at my service.

"After such a lapse of time," I said that evening, "I hardly dare make inquiries about old friends."

"Ella is alive, and I hope, well," replied Mr. Stanhope with a sigh. "Her husband has treated her—as might have been expected; indeed, he has gone to the bad altogether, but she still clings to him. I have offered her a refuge here, but she says that her duty is with him."

"I know nothing," said I.

"Stanley inherited a fair estate soon after his marriage," said the archdeacon; "but it did not last him long. He dissipated all that he could lay his hands upon, and his wife had no settlement; they have almost known want. From gambler he turned black-leg; from black-leg, swindler; he was convicted and imprisoned. When he was released his wife returned to him. That they are not now utterly destitute is owing to the one sensible thing the poor girl has done. While her husband was in confinement, a little property invested in Indian railways came to her. She put the scrip into my hands and empowered me to receive the dividends, which I forward her half-yearly. Stanley thought for some time that this money was an allowance made by me, but he somehow obtained an inkling of the truth, and wants to get hold of the capital. But he cannot sell unless he has the scrip, or whatever they call it, which is locked up safely in my bureau in the library; and he is unable even to learn exactly what the money is in, for Ella herself has only a vague idea about it. I dare say that I am acting illegally in not handing over the coupons to him, but I do not care for that. He had the impudence to call upon me and bluster about three weeks ago, but I simply refused to answer any questions, or to admit that I had any property of his wife's in my charge; I told him if he proved that I had, and defeated me in an action at law, I would do what I was obliged to, and nothing more. If Ella herself demanded the scrip, of course I should give it up to her; but she will not do that, for the sake of her child."

"Child?"

"Yes, there is one, only one happily, a girl."

That was not a good story to sleep upon; for hours after I had gone up to my room, I sat and thought it over. For the archdeacon retired early, having an important sermon, to be preached before a congregation of clergymen (which must be a very critical audience), in hand, and he intended to work at it awhile before he slept. I took a book up-stairs with me from the library, but could not read it, so after several attempts I gave in, and yielded to the enervating indulgence of vain regrets, and morbid dreams of what might have been.

Every one has experienced the high state of tension which the nerves attain when you are sitting up at night after the household has retired, absorbed in reading, writing, or thinking. Writers of fiction have informed me that the more the imagination is stimulated, the greater is the degree of sensitiveness attained, and I fully believe it. For sitting there picturing scenes of happiness which might have fallen to my lot, I was somewhat in the position of one inventing a story, and certainly my senses were almost preternaturally acute. I distinctly heard the low silvery bell of a timepiece in the library strike two, though the situation of the apartment with regard to my bed-room was such, that a really loud noise would not have been audible there in the day time.

Immediately afterwards I thought I heard another sound, like the shaking of a window-frame; and listening intently, I fancied that this was repeated. I smiled at the start which such faint and probably imaginary noises of the night had given me, and rousing out of the easy chair in which I had been reclining, I prepared to go to bed. My candle had burned down in the socket an hour before, and I had not disturbed myself to light one of those on the toilet-table; for there was a moon, though it was not full; and I always sleep in the summer months with blind up and window open. I have slept without a roof over me too often not to be a lover of fresh air, and I now went and leaned out into the night—my habit, the last thing.

Hark! That was certainly not fancy. I distinctly heard a sash softly raised. Leaning cautiously forward I could see several windows, but they were down, and the blinds or shutters were closed behind them; it was not one of them. But the library window was round a corner, not visible from my position; it would be in the shade too, and therefore more likely to be selected for an entrance, supposing such a thing to be effected.

I remained listening intently for a few minutes, but heard no further sound. Probably my host had finished his sermon and closed the window of his little snugery; but I was not satisfied, and opening my bed-room door I stepped out on to the landing and listened there. Presently I heard a crack, as of wood when broken; this was repeated, and then there was a sort of wrench. Creeping down the stairs, and pausing at every step to listen, I was guided by these sounds to the library. The door stood open, and the moonlight poured into the room from the staircase window, so that I had to manoeuvre to approach without casting a shadow. This I accomplished however, and peering in, I could distinguish the outline of a man standing against the door of a tall cabinet, which I judged, from the sounds heard, that he was endeavouring to prise open.

"What are you doing there?" I cried.

The figure darted towards the window, which was wide open; but I was quicker, and caught him. He struggled hard; but, being the stronger man, in a couple of minutes I had him down on the carpet, with my knee on his chest and my hands at his throat.

The moonbeams from the staircase window fell on his face, and I recognised Stanley. I confess with shame, with horror, that I have never felt any pleasure so keen as the Satanic joy of that moment. The brooding of the last few hours had exasperated my long-cherished hatred of this man to the highest pitch, and here he was in my grasp!

"Mercy!" he whispered in a choking voice, "I cannot breathe! Mercy!"

"Mercy!" I repeated, mocking him; "I have waited too long for this moment not to take full advantage of it. I am Morton, you viper—the man you betrayed and laughed at! You would not meet me in fair fight, but it has come to much the same thing, you see."

"Let go of the man, Harry—let go, I say!" cried a voice behind me; "you are choking him."

I obeyed sullenly, and arose. Mr. Stanhope fetched a cordial, which he poured down the throat of Stanley, who presently revived.

"You had better let me secure him in that chair sir," said I, "and then I will rouse the groom and send him for a policeman."

"I only wanted my own," said Stanley sullenly. "You have property of mine in that bureau, I am certain, and I cannot get it by fair means."

"I cannot hand Ella's husband over to justice, Harry," said the archdeacon. "Leave him to Heaven, and let him go."

I bowed my head, and the fellow slunk away. But his career was near its close. Six months afterwards he was convicted of forgery, and sentenced to penal servitude for life.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

THE preliminary preparations, which required yet about six months, had consumed nearly one-half of the 600 florins, and consisted chiefly in the visiting of localities sought especially by travellers and pilgrims from Central Asia. This people, for the most part poor, I used to reward according to my slender means for the smallest service—some questions or an hour's conversation. I had herein a great advantage, the Turkish conversational tongue used in the lands of the Oxus being pretty well known to me before I started for those regions. I had heard so much about the chief towns of Central Asia, that single quarters of these towns were as well and better known to me, from theoretical conception, than any such of Paris to the readers of works describing them minutely.

Very noteworthy, and even peculiar, was the manner of my friends in Stambul, on seeing my preparations for the distant Turkestan. With the majority of the modern Mohammedans, a journey induced by thirst of knowledge is but an eccentric action.

Such an undertaking is called, in short, insane, whenever planned for an inhospitable, wild region, fraught with dangers. I can remember yet very well with what a shudder, with how deep a pity the effeminate Efendies looked at me, when I spoke with the utmost contentment of my future abode among the Turkomans, and my expedition through the Steppes. "Allah okollar" (Let God give him understanding), was the pious wish, mumbled by all in a low voice. A man who relinquishes purposely this charming Bosphorus, the comfortable life in the house of a Turkish grandee, can indeed be charged with insanity, according to their ideas. "No one can cure insanity, may then Allah take pity on him," said the Efendies, and gazed at me for some time with frightened looks.

And yet these good people had a wish to benefit me as much as they could; they did what they thought would smooth my lot, and retard as long as possible what they considered an inevitable doom—my destruction. Persia had been chosen by me for the first land to be visited, and as in Teheran for several years a regular Turkish Ambassador and suite lived, and as the then Plenipotentiary of the Sultan at the Court of Persia, Haider Efendi, was a friend of my protector, thus it came that I received, besides the official recommendation of Aali Pasha, a collective letter (general introduction) to all the acquaintances and relations of K—Bey, wherein I, the unfortunate, was placed under their kind protection, in the warmest expressions. I received also "firmans," wherewith to cross the Turkish dominions, to be presented before the authorities. In this I was represented as the traveller, Reshieh Efendi. Of my European descent, my aim, and the plan of my wandering, not a word was said; and I had only to act in conformity with the general purport of my introduction—in fact, I was not allowed to do anything else—and was taken everywhere for a thorough Turk, and for an Efendi of Constantinople.

So much about the practical part of my preparations. As to the intellectual, the moral, I need not mention that the nearer the moment for starting arrived, the stronger grew my longing, the more moved my soul. Where I dreamt about as a child, raved as a youth, whatever hovered like a fata morgana permanently about my path, through the literature of the Orient and Occident, that I was destined now to reach, and to gratify my eye. Where passion reigns so tumultuously as in my innermost heart, in such persons understanding and prudence are often disregarded. Nothing could have kept me back, only the material privation, the difficulties encountered with the elements, and the endangering of my health; for I never thought of an absolute failure in my plans by death. Now I beg to ask my reader what hardship could have happened to me, what could have been the privations, which the harsh fate of my youth would not have prepared me for? I was famished up to my eighteenth year, insufficient dress was the fate of my early youth. Men's whims and weaknesses I learned to bear early, and experience taught me to consider the man in Asia's rough garment very like intrinsically to the finely dressed man of the West. Pity and kindness I generally found more with the first, and thus the awful picture of the barbarians, so often sketched by our modern literature of travel, could but make me curious to experience, and never was able to discourage me in my onward progress. There is but one circumstance that in the execution of my plans could be taken into consideration, and that is the fact that after early schooling in misery and battling for bread, having at last had the enjoyment of well-living, comfort, and rest in Constantinople, I felt my newly gathered strength, and could think of continuing the fulfilling of tasks expected from me. For I had lived, during the last few years in Constantinople, well, I may say very well. I had a comfortable lodging, luxurious board, even a saddle-horse for my pleasure. Having thought all this as naught, exchanging these comforts for a mendicant's garb and staff, that alone do I consider fair to be placed to my credit.

But whereto would the spur of ambition be unable to incite us? And what is our whole existence whenever this instinct is unknown to us, or has become deadened? Material well-being, exaltations, and decorations are but motley-coloured childish games, not able to bind our fancy for long, and of which the sound human intelligence soon gets tired. But how noble and exalted is the conviction of having done—though the smallest—offices and services to mankind in general! and what could be more sublime in this world than the hope to be able to enrich the book of spiritual life, were it but with a single new letter? Thus did I think and feel, and found strength in it, enough to enable me to suffer a thousandfold such hardships as I met with.

A fortnight ago enjoying every luxury of a wealthy Oriental demesne of the Seven-hilled City of the South-east, this moment—I jot down from memory the items of my travel—I am jolting to and fro on the meagre back of a miserable, jaded, small horse, on the road leading up to Erzeroum, from the coast of the Black Sea through the Pontine ranges. A charming bit of land this, that surrounds my ride, the first to meet the traveller's view going to Asia. A magnificently romantic spot, among ranges full of steep mountain-tops, deep ravines, forest-crowned peaks, and bold uprisen rock-walls. The scenery is exactly so distributed as to give the traveller a foretaste, to enjoy the more the magnificence he can meet with only in the interior of Asia. Truly so, of Asia alone. And just on account of this, memory treasures for ever after the haunting scenes of this part of the East, because from this point, far into China, but rarely do fat meadows, dark forests, and the heart and eye-refreshing green patches enchant the traveller. One meets no blade of grass that unaided nature, without watering, without human efforts, would have raised. All is dreary, all is waste and dried up, and the Pontine range does not appear as the mighty rocky gate of Asia, but more like the Ultima Thule of nature, where none of the vegetation gratifies the cultivated observer with the mild, life and health-giving blessings of the clime of Central Europe.

But let me stop. It is not a book of travel that I am writing now. I have fulfilled that duty as far as I was able in my works already published. Let there be here but the first impressions of my difficulties during my travels, and the commencement of my trials. The transformation, sudden and dangerous, from an Efendi into a dervish would have been neither practicable nor morally possible. Step by step one gets at the goal, but by degrees alone can man endure the deepest misery alike with the highest fortune, but thus can it bring lasting benefit. From Constantinople I departed as an Efendi, and kept in that position on to Teheran, a space of about three months. But I represented withal an Efendi of meagre means—a wandering savant, according to the view of the Orientals. I had for my expedition in clothing but enough linen for a change, had to sleep where hospitality offered a shelter, or on the bare hard earth—now and then on a soft-cushioned divan, and enjoyed, instead of the simple fare of a dervish, a good savoury meal.

The ride of the first days, having gone over six to eight German miles from the commencement, was very tiresome. Sliding down on a night from the saddle, all my members felt as if broken. I often had scarcely the power to move, and yet I had to prepare my own meal, being servant, cook, and master in one person, having besides to attend to the wants of my poor horse, hired for a moderate recompense for the term of six days. My duty was the more punctiliously fulfilled as I was more dependent on him, poor brute, that had no other reward but his scanty food—void of curiosity after the language of Dshagatai, and the lands of the Oxus—that had no moral encouragement to proceed but the whip. I had to pass, as my Asiatic fellow-travellers said, the days of soreness; and got comfort from the thought that the pleasure of travel would become the sweeter, the sooner my body got “boiled and baked”—what we call hardened.

This culinary process, effected by jolting and the hot sun, was generally gone through in three or four days; and indeed, as soon as I got accustomed to these hardships, I commenced enjoying the charm, the romance of this kind of life; and had but my horse been improved also by some sort of “boiling and baking” process—had he but got more into the way of progressing better, as if interested in my aims, I should have found my travel from the commencement very entertaining.

No roses without thorns. I am sorry to remember that the first impressions of my travel lost their romantic hue on the very first night by arriving at such localities, and having to rest upon such couches, as offered on previous nights the same comfort to the very poorest Turkish and Persian traders, mule-drivers, and mendicants; whereby a considerable number of guests nestled unasked within the folds of my garments, which, judging from the discomfort I was put to, seemed to enjoy my exotic acquaintance.

The flesh of my legs got thinned; my face, but little protected from the parching sun, swelled with blisters, and the skin peeled from nose and cheeks. But my strength increased, and with it my courage and spirit. Along the whole track the honest Turks received us with kindness, and the cunning and ill-willed Kurds with respect and awe. I had but to open my lips, and all hands were crossed over the chest, saluting me according to the custom of the true believers, and offering me, with a salutation full of respect—“Efendim” (my master, my lord)—their hospitality.

This circumstance, of course, only confirmed the prudence of keeping up the travelling incognito. It proved a well-passed examen, and was as good in its reassuring effect as a diploma, wherewith I might quite safely enter on the experiment of an otherwise dangerous tour into Central Asia.

Thus the very first four weeks of our travel into the interior offered me unexpected charms. Whenever after a long ride I lay tired on my carpet, to enjoy, leaning against a wall, the flickering dance of the lively hearth-fire, I arrived at the conclusion that within boundless nature I could move freely, unmenaced by any danger from others, not harassed by the chicaneries of an interpreter, or a master of etiquette, or society's stringent ceremonies at a public reception. At such moments indeed I felt happier in the hard saddle on the back of my jaded brute, and would not have exchanged it for a seat in a first-class railway carriage. I became, without will or effort on my part, a wandering authority; and I was not a little proud when some rich Persian merchants, when passing the ranges of Dagar, placed themselves under my protection, and, as the readers of my “Wanderings and Adventures in Persia” will remember, evaded by this subordination the attack of Kurd robbers.

My meeting with these Persians was in another way also fortunate for me. As I left the Turkish boundary behind Bajazid, my grandeur—my title of an Efendi (gentleman, sir)—my exterior commanding respect, went to grief. My red fez with the brass plate (tepelik), instead of being my shield and protection as hitherto, was to become the source of danger and evil.

I nearly forgot to mention that, passing the boundary into Iran, I left the land of the Sunnites and entered the soil of the Shiites, and quite lost sight of the circumstance that the kind but idle Osmanlies never appear, or certainly very seldom, in the country of the Persians; and thus my insignificant social position ran the risk of being considered, in the midst of this fanatical population, an eyesore.

You see what positive religion is; here even, far from our easily-split-up European churches, I became again, as I might have become in Europe, a martyr of positive tenets, though but assumed for safety, and was exposed to sufferings for belonging to a sect wherewith my connection was but imaginary, and which in my innermost soul I loathed as I do all the rest.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SEVENTH.

TRANSITION.

THEY were to settle down now, and apply themselves to the common duties of daily life—she to see that their one domestic swept and dusted the rooms properly (that was easy enough, she thought), and to look after the cooking (she felt some despair in thinking of that); he to read, to write his sermons, and to visit his parishioners.

To him the idea of the simple quiet life he was to lead, in which there was yet the possibility of accomplishing important work, was delightful. The woman he loved as his companion, the work to do to which he was most devoted—what more could man desire or hope for in this world?

His sermon did not progress so rapidly or so satisfactorily as he would have liked. He began to think that he was too happy to get below the surface of his task. The earnest thoughts which he desired to utter somehow lost their strength in being transferred to paper. Then when he had concentrated his whole heart upon some particular passage, the door opened, and Teenie would appear, with such a miserable look, to tell him that she had spoiled the broth or burned the pudding, and he would be obliged to get up and comfort her.

This was amusing at first, but by-and-by he discovered that æsthetic speculations and the distresses of the kitchen did not harmonise very well; the one interrupted the other grievously. He began to fidget; he blamed himself much for the lack of that philosophic calm which sustains the mind in equal poise, no matter what winds are blowing, or what seas are rolling.

He was obliged to preach an old sermon on the first Sabbath after his return. That was vexatious, for he had intended to deliver a fervent discourse, which, inspired by recent happy experiences, should reach the hearts of his hearers, and help them to accept gratefully life as it was given them, good and ill together. The kirk was full; many were anxious to see the newly-wedded couple, and to note how Teenie would conduct herself in the minister's pew.

Walter felt that he had lost an opportunity; and, to make matters worse, one of the elders recognised the sermon as one he had heard before. He was much scandalised at this backsliding of the young minister, and resolved to take him to task for it at as early a date as possible.

Walter had occasion to call upon this elder. Mr. Pettigrew was in a comparatively large way of business. On one side of his shop he was a grocer, cheesemonger, and licensed to sell wines and spirits, to be drunk off the premises. Very drouthy customers, who wished to drink at once, had only to go round to the back, and they were served with the half-mutchkin, or whatever they might require, through the back-window, outside which they could drink and be merry, whilst Mr. Pettigrew obliged his friends, obeyed the letter of the law, and maintained a clear conscience. On the other side of his shop the elder was a draper, boot-seller, cabinet-maker, and undertaker, not to mention a minor trade in song-books and newspapers.

Mr. Pettigrew was a successful merchant (all the shopkeepers are called merchants). He had brought to perfection the art of attracting customers by presents of sweeties to the children. He was tall, comfortable-looking; had a white fatty face, decorated with short grey whiskers; he had a text ready for every occasion; he was much respected; and he was a martyr to his anxiety about other people's business. Whatever happened in the "town," Mr. Pettigrew was sure to know all about it, and he gave his customers the benefit of his knowledge, pledging each to profound secrecy.

"Step ben this way, minister. I'm proud to see you, sir, and I take it kindly, your coming so soon after you got settled. And how is the mistress?"

He led the way into a little parlour at the back, talking all the time in quite a friendly way—his voice was fatty like his face—and as if that old sermon were not uppermost in his thoughts. He had mentioned the sermon to a dozen customers privately.

He placed glasses and a decanter on the table.

Walter declined any refreshment at that time of day.

"Oh, but you maun take something on this your first visit, Mr. Burnett. I canna let you away without taking salt, so to speak, with me," said Mr. Pettigrew, producing a black bottle with a red seal, then hunting about for a corkscrew, which at length he found.

Then placing the point of the corkscrew upon the cork of the bottle—without breaking the seal, however—he looked at his visitor with the most he always insisted that his guest should "say the word."

"Aweel, since you winna, there's no more to be said," observed Mr. Pettigrew, with every appearance of chagrin borne with Christian resignation.

They proceeded to business, which was to discuss the necessity of certain repairs in the church, and a joint movement of minister and elders upon the heritors to obtain the requisite concessions. They had sundry little disputes about what was necessary and what was not; they agreed upon various points, hospitable expression of which his face was capable, saying—

"WALTER AGAIN PROTESTED."

"You'll take some of the very best sherry wine, sir? Just say the word, and I will pu't" (pull it—draw the cork)—"but I will pu't!"

And he made desperate pantomime, as if about to insert the corkscrew. Walter again protested his disinclination to take anything just then, and Mr. Pettigrew became the more vehement as the other became more decisive.

"But I will pu't; the best sherry wine; only say the word, minister, and I will pu't."

The same bottle and the same pantomime had often done Mr. Pettigrew good service, obtaining for him credit for hospitality without expense, for and their conversation came to a close without the elder having referred to the particular subject in which he was at the moment interested. But as Walter was taking his leave, the elder coughed and said in a considerate tone—

"I hope, Mr. Burnett, you're no meaning to give us that same sermon ower often—the afternoon one I mean. There is naething to say against it, but we can have ower muckle even of a good sermon; and I take the privilege of age to mention the matter to you."

Walter's cheeks burned, for indeed he had a sharp sense that he had not done his duty.

"I thought it better to give you a discourse which had been carefully prepared, than one hurriedly and therefore badly prepared. But you shall not hear it again, Mr. Pettigrew."

"There's not a word to say against it, mind, only I thought it my duty to mention it to you."

"Thank you."

Apart from this disagreeable reference to the sermon, there was something about the whole interview with the elder which depressed the young minister. There was a coarseness and earthiness in the subjects of their discussion, and the manner of them, which dissatisfied him, chiefly with himself. And so, as time went on, he found that the great work of which he had vaguely dreamed was interrupted and interfered with by the most trivial circumstances—or what seemed to him trivial circumstances. Slowly he became aware that the question of mere existence, the petty problems of the ways and means of bread-and-butter, stood between men and the higher sense of religion—and the bread-and-butter came always first in their thoughts.

He found that his attention was to be distracted by the pettiest of disputes; that he was expected to be the peacemaker often in drunken brawls; and that he was to keep a strict watch upon the manner of the Sabbath observance. Although these things were urged upon him only by a small section of his congregation, he had not acquired the art of satisfying these bigots, and yet leaving freedom to the others. One poor woman, the small widow of whose cottage had been transformed into a shop by filling it with cheap toys, dusty bottles full of lozenges, and tin trays full of treacle-balls and candy, was brought up before the bailie for the heinous offence of selling sweets on the Sabbath. The woman pleaded use and wont, but she could not deny her guilt, for there was an elder who had himself purchased a pennyworth of candy in order to prove the charge!

The minister made an appeal on behalf of the poor woman—he even dared to excuse her!—and from that day forth a number of his parishioners looked upon him with fear and horror as a man of dangerous, if not altogether heterodox, opinions. He was not sound in the matter of sweets.

He accepted the position: it was his work to make the best of things as they stood—to excite the noblest aspirations of those who came under his influence, and to point the way to true faith, which implies courage and hope. That was his work: he would do it.

But after a while there came to him, with painfully slow steps, the knowledge that the trifles of life have more influence upon it than the heroic deeds of action or suffering which may distinguish it. Petty debts accumulated until they assumed proportions which startled and frightened him—all the more so as, despite wild efforts on his part, he could find no way of satisfying or reducing them.

Nobody pressed him for money, but the sense of owing it was none the less keen to him. He smarted under it, and he was shamed by it; soul and mind seemed to be weighted by the vulgar needs of filling the inside and covering the back. How slow he was to recognise the commonplace conditions of existence! But he did recognise them at length, and he accepted them like the rest, bravely. It was a struggle with him at first, and he felt as if something of the better part of his nature had been sacrificed in the struggle.

He was disappointed; yet he clung to the ideal he had formed, feeling the more need to exalt it, and keep it steadily before him, since he found that the grosser elements of nature were so strong in their influence upon our ways.

Teenie was disappointed too, although she did not realise so clearly the source of her disappointment. She found the household worries very trying to her patience and her temper. She was often irritable, and she took an almost wicked satisfaction in provoking her husband, until he would leave the house and take a long fierce walk along the shore to calm himself. She was always sorry, always very penitent, and ready to take all the blame to herself; but she was also ready to repeat the cruel experiment, forgetting the past. The making-up was very sweet, certainly, but it was costly.

Day by day the old craving for the mysterious something which lay beyond the horizon line of sea and land came back to her, and slowly grew upon her until it developed into an unspoken discontent with the routine of her life.

She did not say to herself that she was dissatisfied; but she knew that she was impatient, that she did not find pleasure in her household work as she ought to do: and at times she was very angry with herself for that, and for a day or two she would work with an almost savage energy at anything that fell to her hand to do. She would be quieter and blither for a week afterwards, only regretting that there was not enough for her to do.

She was very sorry, and almost cried with vexation, to find that she could not take an interest in her husband's sermons and his books. They had very cosy evenings when they sat chatting together, or maybe playing at cards—chess she could not acquire. But when he read to her she found it difficult to keep awake, and she performed all sorts of pretty manoeuvres to conceal her yawns, and to convince him that her eyes were wide open. At last she would get up, unable to endure the torture longer, put her arms round his neck, make faces at him, pinch his ears, and maybe kiss him, whilst she begged him to put the book away and talk to her.

"I wonder whether it should be regarded as a compliment or not, Teenie," he said laughing, "that you think I talk better than I read."

"You read such dry things."

"I thought this was interesting; but it is wonderful what an effect reading has in contrast with the poorest conversation. I remember once when my father was ill, he could not get sleep: I used to take down Blair's Sermons and read—and he went off immediately."

"Try the same plan with me when I'm sleepless," said Teenie gleefully:

Travels or ballads she would listen to eagerly, and she would lay aside her sewing or knitting that she might give the closer attention. Then her bonnie face would brighten, and her lips part, as she bent forward in growing interest with the progress of the narrative. When he had finished she would sit silent, dreamily realising the wonders she had heard about.

But as his work became more troublesome—as the necessities of his position pressed closer upon him—he became more and more involved in his tasks. The readings for mere amusement became fewer; his leisure hours shorter; and as she could not find interest in his work, her fits of restlessness became more frequent. She had boundless energy, and as it could not be directed into the common channels of their life, it was rapidly developing into general discontent with herself and everything around her. She flatly refused to take a class in the Sabbath school: in fact because she had a timid fear of her own incapacity; but pride would not allow her to say that. She said that she could not and would not, and when Walter was at length obliged to say that his wife was unable to take a class—it caused him a sharp pain about which he said nothing—there were many unpleasant looks cast at the minister's wife. That did not help her to any more gracious mood.

When she felt very wicked, as she called her queer humour to herself, she would steal down to the Witch's Bay, take out the small boat, and have a cruise out to sea or round by the rocks. The beautiful colours of the water, glancing under the noonday sun, or flashing brilliant crimson and purple in the sunset, delighted her. The roar of the waves, the plashing against the rocks or lapping against the boat, the foaming crests curling and leaping towards her, were very pleasing to her, and the rolling movement of the boat soothed her. Sometimes Walter would accompany her on these excursions, but more frequently she went alone, unknown even to Ailie, who was now sole mistress at the Norlan' Head, and still Teenie's closest friend. She had no confidante, for she had nothing to confide. She was herself still quite innocent of all knowledge of the dangerous issues to which her restless spirit and vague yearnings were leading her.

Skipper Dan was fitting out a vessel for a whaling expedition. It had come into his head that for Teenie's sake he ought to increase his store, and that combined with his sense of the loneliness of his home, to urge him to carry out the idea which had occurred to him when he had first thought of her going away from the Norlan' Head. The old spirit of adventure seized upon him, and he entered into the work with an enthusiasm which increased daily as he saw the preparations of the Christina, as he called the ship, nearing completion. The vessel almost took the place in his thoughts which his daughter had occupied before her marriage. Early and late he was near her, admiring her build, her "lines," and everything about her, and filled with joyful pride when any one else expressed similar admiration.

"Is she no bonnie?" he said to a Kingshaven tailor who met him at the harbour, "did you ever see finer lines in any boat that sails the sea?"

The man looked, and then answered cautiously—

"I canna say, Dan; she's no painted yet."

Dan turned away in silent contempt.

Teenie was often down viewing her namesake. She took the interest of a child—or a lover—in the progress of the ship, and she longed to be a man, that she might have accompanied her father on his expedition. If he would have allowed her, and if her husband had consented, she would have found the utmost satisfaction in going with the Christina, and would have delighted in all the hardships and dangers of the voyage. But of course such an idea was not to be entertained for a moment, and she was sorry.

The next best thing to going with the vessel was to be aboard it as often as possible, and she became as well known to the ship-wrights and the other men as her father. She found an excellent vent for her surplus energy in seeing to the fitting-up of Dan's cabin. He scoffed at her arrangements, and at the woman's luxuries which she insisted upon introducing; but it pleased her, and so he submitted, as he had submitted to so many other things.

At length the season had come round; the Christina was ready for sea—all her stores and hands complete. She was towed out of harbour, cheered and well-wished by a crowd of fishermen, women, and children, who had gathered on the quay to watch the departure.

Teenie and Walter were on board, intending to return with the steam-tug. Ailie did not go, for she thought it was just as easy parting on dry land as on sea, and "a heap more comfortable."

So they moved out across the bar, past the fearful Wrecker, and the Christina stood out upon a clear course. Then came the parting.

"The tug leaves us here," said Dan, as if it were the most ordinary affair in the world.

But when Teenie rested her hands upon his shoulders, and looked into his face so fondly and so frightenedly, so unlike her old self, Dan felt uncomfortable. Walter and all the men were looking at him.

"You'll come back, father?"

"Of course, sea and the Lord permitting."

"Aye, but you'll take care——"

"Hoots! do you think I'm a Bairn, or that I'm weary o' life? I'll take care, never you heed; but if it's the Lord's will we should go to the boddom, we canna help that."

He spoke as if she had been finding fault with him unnecessarily or foolishly.

"I wish I was going with you," she said laughing, partly in jest, but a great deal more in earnest, as she glanced along the vessel, noted her trim decks, and saw the stalwart seamen, brisk and merry at their posts.

"See what your guidman would say to that," retorted the skipper.

"He would say that he can't spare her," said Walter, taking her by the hand to lead her away.

"I would hope sae," commented Dan, after giving some directions to his mate. "Now then, awa' wi' you; the boat's waiting, and there's a fair wind that we maun tak' our use of. Wish us luck, Teenie, for I'm going to make siller for you, lass, and we'll come home with the Bank o' England in our hold."

"Good-bye, father," she said simply, as she kissed him, and he looked rather ashamed of that natural sign of affection.

"Pleasant times till I come back," he said quietly, then gripping Walter's hand, he added, "Be guid till her."

"Never doubt that."

They went over the side, and on board the tug. They were carried safely into Kingshaven harbour. Teenie was quiet; there was not the least indication of hysteria in her manner. If she had parted with her father for the evening only, sure of meeting him in the morning, she could not have been more calm outwardly.

But her heart was full of strange fears, such as she had never known before. Formerly she had parted with him, even when he had been going on a similar voyage, without the least sense of dread. Now she felt as if they had parted for the last time, and she seemed to realise a portion at least of the dangers he had to encounter. She became sensible then how rapidly her nature seemed to have changed, and although her husband stood beside her, she felt lonely and weary.

Dan had seemed almost gruff in his parting; but he watched the tug with yearning eyes until it disappeared from sight. He answered the last faint signal which Teenie made with her handkerchief, waving his hat to her. Then all seemed to become blank. His eyes became unaccountably dim, and he turned and cursed the mate heartily for some fancied neglect of his command.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-EIGHTH.

B A B Y.

IN the pleasant May-time a baby was born at the manse, and Teenie was very ill. Trees and flowers were brilliant with brown and green buds just bursting into life; the birds sang a merry woodland chorus, and the sea swept inward with a grand bass sough that told of storm and peril.

At one time she was so ill that the doctor looked grave, and professed himself unable to predict the result. That was a very bad sign, for the doctor was not one who ever doubted his own skill; he only doubted nature.

Happily, Teenie was unconscious during the period of her chief danger. She did not know how Walter wandered through the house, and round the house outside, in anguish on her account, and praying for her safety. She did not know how Grace had come over from Craighburn to nurse her; how she sat by her day and night, ready at the least sign to supply her with soothing drinks, and to calm her delirium with loving words and the gentle touch of a faithful hand.

She did not know what wild things she had been saying—some of them striking Grace very sharply—how she had jumbled together the names of Walter, Dalmahoy, her father, and her nurse; and how she had uttered in her frenzy the wish she had never clearly realised to herself—that she might be allowed to go away in the Christina, to sail to strange regions, and never come back to stand between Walter and Grace.

This was heard only by the nurse; and she was careful to keep the door close. She became the more confirmed in her resolution that no one but herself should be permitted to attend the invalid. She was used to nursing, she was accustomed to spend many nights in a chair by her mother's bedside, and so was the best qualified to take care of Teenie, as she was the most interested in preventing others from hearing the young wife's ravings.

Ailie would have relieved her; but Grace insisted that she had enough to do in taking care of Baby—a fine healthy boy, with lungs of the very strongest quality. Mysie Keith came over expressly, as an experienced nurse, to offer her services. Grace thanked her, and said she would be glad to have her when the delirium had passed off. As for Walter, he was peremptorily excluded from the room, except when Teenie was in a sound sleep. At the first sign of awakening, Grace bundled him out at the door.

One night—fire and lamp burning brightly, Grace sitting with elbow on the table, brow resting on hand, an open book before her which she was not reading, and Teenie sleeping more peacefully than she had done since the birth of Baby—Grace became instinctively conscious of a change. Her thoughts, sad and far away, seemed to be drawn back by some spiritual influence to the room and the duties she was performing.

She lifted her head, and found the big wondering eyes of Teenie fixed upon her with an expression of puzzled curiosity, and she knew that the crisis was past.

"What's wrong?" said Teenie, as if the whole trouble were associated with somebody else.

Grace was beside her, holding her hand, feeling her pulse, smoothing her brow, and trembling with joy.

"You have not been well, Teenie, and we have been very anxious about you."

"About me? What was the matter?" said the invalid in a faint tone, and laughing feebly at the idea of her having been very ill—she who had never known a day's sickness.

"You have been very ill, and you must not excite yourself in any way. You must obey me for the present, and in the morning you shall see Walter and Baby."

"Baby?" murmured the girl vaguely, and as if seeking to catch some will-o'-the-wisp of thought. Then a dim consciousness of what had passed seemed to dawn upon her; the eyes brightened, and the pale cheeks flushed, as she repeated tenderly and wonderingly the word "Baby!"

"You must not speak again," said Grace with gentle firmness; "I must be very stern with you, I see. Drink this, and do not attempt to move or utter a word, or I shall be very angry."

Teenie obeyed quite humbly. She had not moved her head from the pillow; but Grace felt that, wherever she moved, the big, unnaturally bright eyes followed her with strange questioning looks, noted every turn she made, and speculated what she would do next. In the stillness of the night the consciousness of those eyes became painful to her. She wished that Teenie would go to sleep, or turn her face to the wall; she felt inclined to talk, although it was in direct opposition to the doctor's commands; by-and-by she felt ready to do anything that would break the charm which those sad questioning eyes wrought upon her, and she had to make a strong effort in order to remain silent.

In a very little while, Teenie, lying there motionless watching her nurse, understood the whole position as well as if she had been conscious all the time. Grace had been nursing her through a dangerous illness—had probably rescued her from death by devoted care—and there she was, quite a helpless, useless creature, apparently doomed always to give trouble and anxiety to those who loved her, whilst she could never find the least opportunity to render them a service in return.

She felt so miserable and worthless; and she thought that the very best service she could render to everybody would be to remain quiet and die.

Then something seemed to whisper "Baby" in her ear, and her pulses quickened with life whilst her eyes filled with tears for which she could not account at all. Only she knew that she would not like to die.

"Grace!"

That lady was startled by the low pathetic cry which filled the room; it was one of the rare occasions upon which Teenie had called her by her Christian name; generally she avoided naming her altogether.

Grace was kneeling by the bedside, and Teenie looking wistfully into her face.

"I wonder how you manage it, Grace," she said faintly.

"Manage what?"

"To forget yourself the way you do—I couldn't do it. If you had been me, I couldn't have come to nurse you and save you as you have done to me. I must be awfully bad."

And she looked helplessly frightened at the sense of her own iniquity.

"You dear, silly child, you would do a great deal more than ever I have done for anybody you liked."

"And you do like me?"

"Very much."

"That's queer."

"Teenie moved her head for the first time, as if the problem required a change of position to be solved.

"Wh

"You don't know the spiteful way I think of you whilst—just because I know you are so good, and true, and brave. Whilst I wish you were at the other end of the world—or me; then I think it would be better for me to be away, because you would make him so happy and——"

"She went no further; her voice, weak at the best, seemed to be stifled with subdued sobs.

"Oh, Teenie, Teenie! why do you speak of this?—you are making me very wretched."

"I don't want to do that—for I like you, Grace, I like you a great heap."

Grace kissed her affectionately—that was the only reply she could make—and then she implored her to be silent.

"You must not speak of these things—you must not think of them, and you must go to sleep."

"Get Wattie to come and read me one of his sermons if you want me to go to sleep," she said with a faint twinkle of her old humour.

She seemed to be so much better, that Grace for an instant hesitated whether or not she would summon Walter; she knew that he was in his "workshop," trying to read whilst awaiting the report of any change for the worse. But the danger of exciting the patient beyond her strength was too great; and so she took her chair again, pretending to fall asleep, in the hope that Teenie might rest.

Then there was that strange noisy silence that is felt in the night when two people are wide awake, and each trying to keep quiet in order not to disturb the other. The little clock on the mantelpiece made an extraordinary din; the wind seemed to roar round the house, although it was a calm night; a branch of a rose-bush tapped on the window with irritating loudness and constancy; even their pulses seemed to be heard.

There was a grand crimson glow on the window, one of the panes glistened with prismatic lights, the lamp and fire faded, and they knew it was morning. It was a grateful relief to both, and each thought that the other had rested comfortably owing to the cunning way she had feigned sleep.

Grace administered the morning dose of medicine and then she went for Walter. He came in looking weary and haggard enough, but so joyful with the news conveyed to him, that he looked flushed and happy as he embraced his wife.

"What a fright you have given us, Teenie!" he said, husky with pleasure.

"Did I?—I'm awful sorry."

Then the cause of all the trouble—Baby—was introduced: a fat, plump, rosy boy, utterly indifferent to everything and everybody. He was placed in the bed beside his mother, and he kicked and squalled lustily.

"He couldna be stronger if he was six months auld," exclaimed Ailie proudly and admiringly.

"What a funny wee ted!" said the mother, half laughing and half crying.

But when the doctor came he damped the joy of the household, for he found his patient terribly weak; he declared that she had been excited far beyond her strength, and he would not be answerable for the result. If she lived, it would not be due to his skill—and that was the first time Dr. Lumsden had ever made such an admission.

END OF CHAPTER THE TWENTY-EIGHTH.

IMPRESSED BY STAMPS.

OF all the snug and profitable businesses in London, there are not many which may be compared with that carried on in a very unpretending range of apartments in the lower part of Somerset House. The windows of these rooms till a few years ago looked out, at least twice a day, upon a vast and most unsavoury expanse of Thames mud; and the internal arrangements of the place still bear witness to that malodorous period in metropolitan history. It was impossible, or at least very dangerous, to ventilate the establishment from the river-front, and a shaft was therefore carried from the summit of the building down into these lower regions, and a strong current of air drawn through it by a revolving fan, which still spins round and keeps the place in a tolerably wholesome and comfortable condition. The Embankment has abolished the mud, and has enabled the public to peep in upon a very busy scene; but probably few of the passers-by are at all aware that from these dingy-looking rooms emanate most of the stamps, used throughout the United Kingdom.

It is not, however, through the windows that we most proceed to inspect this very important branch of Government manufacture. The entrance is from Wellington Street, through which all day long deeds and documents of every conceivable description are carried, for the purpose of receiving that magic touch of the die which instantly converts them from mere paper and parchment into instruments as powerful as British law—a touch without which, it is curious to observe, they would be invalid, even though, through any material laid upon them, they had received the requisite impression.

The first thing likely to strike one who follows in the wake of a document tendered for stamping, is that Her Britannic Majesty conducts this department of her business rigidly on the ready-money principle. There is no trust here, or if there is, it is on the part of the customer, who hands over his money in one room, and forthwith proceeds to another one below it without either acknowledgment or equivalent. In this lower room he awaits the arrival of a "warrant," and perhaps amuses himself by speculating on the possible use of a broad band of canvas moving continually across the ceiling. This is a contrivance for bringing down papers from the room he has just left. The officer who has received his money, fills up a form which, when completed, shows that a certain sum has been paid, and "warrants" the stamping department in producing a stamp for that amount. This form is slipped into a spout, through which it falls on to the revolving canvas, is carried by it across the room and rolled into another spout, finally emerging on the counter in the room below. Here the warrant and the document to which it refers are put together and deposited in a shoot, down which they slide into a large room where stamping is actually going on.

Taking an imaginary dive down this shoot, the first thing likely to attract attention is an ingenious contrivance of the present comptroller for bringing the various rolls and packages from the bottom of the shoot into the middle of the room. They fall on to a surface composed of parallel bars, of which every alternate one has a motion that carries anything laid upon it gently forward. In the middle of the room they are taken possession of by examiners, who scrutinise the warrants and whatever accompanies them, and mark upon the documents themselves the value of the stamps with which they are to be impressed. Those that are of paper are now distributed to the various presses; in the case of parchments, however, a preparatory process has to be gone through. Any stamp impressed upon them would be liable to obliteration by moisture; and against this, provision has to be made. In the first place a small slip of blue paper is pasted over the part to be stamped, and then paper and parchment are punctured, and a scrap of patent capsule metal inserted in such a manner as to form part of the surface to be operated upon. The stamp now to be embossed upon this combination of parchment, paper, and metal will be practically indelible. This preparatory process is partly done by boys, but by the aid of a little machine in the room one person may do in a given time four or five times as much as will be got through by a hand-worker.

As in most similar establishments under intelligent management, little niceties of arrangement and mechanical devices for facilitating and regulating labour are very numerous. In this room, for instance, is an odd-looking apparatus for obviating a difficulty which was found to arise in taking documents in their proper order. Before its adoption, parchments brought to be prepared for stamping were deposited in a heap, the bottom part of which, comprising of course all those first brought in, would often lie there the greater part of a day untouched. To meet this difficulty, a kind of roundabout was constructed, consisting of four troughs mounted on a central pivot. These troughs are filled and emptied in turn, each one as it is loaded being passed round one stage towards the machine already mentioned.

Most of the stamping in this room, having to do with a very miscellaneous assortment of sheets, is performed by hand-presses. At one time no other power was employed in any part of the establishment; but the introduction of stamped cheques brought in such an overwhelming influx of business, that the department, though working night and day in relays of hands, was unable to cope with it. They got a million and a half of stamps in arrears, and fell into no little confusion; and, but for the timely introduction of steam, would probably have broken down. A somewhat similar strain on the department was brought about by the institution of post cards, the first order for which was for one hundred millions to be executed between July and Michaelmas. On the other hand, the abolition of newspaper stamps rendered useless a great deal of machinery, which had been specially invented for this work by the late comptroller, Mr. Edwin Hill, (the brother of Sir Rowland), who, in his power of organising labour and his mechanical ingenuity, appears to have been singularly well fitted for the management of an establishment like this; and, both in the machinery and in the general arrangement of the place, has left behind him many indications of great ability.

Now-a-days, arrears of a million and a half of stamps would be no very serious matter. The average number of penny impressed stamps—not adhesive postage or receipt stamps, or any of a similar kind, but impressed stamps such as are on cheques, promissory notes, etc.—is at the present time 225,000 daily. In value these important little impressions range from these penny ones up to £11,250, which represents the highest die in the possession of the department. This of course is not high enough for some of the plums that fall to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it occasionally has to be repeated two or three times on the same document. This was the case, for instance, in stamping the will of the late Mr. Brassey, the probate duty on which required a combination of dies representing no less than £45,000, the highest amount paid on any document of late years.

The actual receipt of money and the operation of stamping are, for the most part, the duties of different departments. An exception is made, however, in the case of two or three machines which are constructed to register the number of impressions they give. Some of the sixpenny stamps are produced by a press of this kind, and the money is taken by the person who impresses the stamp. A similar arrangement is adopted in the case of two-and-sixpenny and five-shilling stamps, the only difference being that a money-taker intervenes between the person tendering the document and the official who stamps it.

One room of the department is devoted to various forms of stamping by steam power. The presses here are worked by boys, of whom there are, throughout the establishment, about 100. The skill and rapidity which some of these lads acquire are remarkable. They begin to learn by practising upon a "dummy" press, a wooden affair which produces no regular stamp and which, therefore, wastes but little paper and, what is of more importance, does not result in the loss of a finger or two, if the owners happen to put the ends of them under instead of the sheet. There are various kinds of machines going in this room, the most interesting of which perhaps is one producing the embossed oval stamps on envelopes, the pink ground of which is laid upon the die by two or three little rollers mounted on watch-springs and driven, by the machine itself, across the face of it, every time it is uplifted from the bed in which the envelope is laid. Cheque-books are being stamped in this room in enormous numbers, the speed of the presses being regulated only by the limit to the manual dexterity attained by those working at them. Some are going at the rate of 60 stamps a minute, while one sharp hand is turning them out with apparent ease at the rate of 140 a minute, or about 40,000 in the course of an ordinary day's work, the machine itself snatching away each leaf the instant the blow has descended upon it.

One of the most interesting features of this establishment is the system upon which the work of these boys is organised, and which would be well worth the attention of many employers of labour who find the juveniles in their employ a constant source of annoyance and difficulty. Any detailed account of the system referred to would be scarcely within the scope of this paper, but it may be described as a very wise and carefully elaborated scheme for making a boy's promotion and advancement in earnings the unvarying result of merit, and rather a part of the machinery of the place than the effect of any action taken by superiors.

In another part of the irregular and rather bewildering maze of rooms in the occupation of the department, labels for patent medicines and half-penny stamped wrappers are being produced by the ordinary printing process, and in another room postage and receipt stamps are being dealt with. These and, speaking generally, all other adhesive stamps are printed and gummed by contractors off the premises, and are merely perforated in Somerset House. This work, as well as the great bulk of mere printing, such as newspaper wrappers and post cards, is in the hands of two firms, on whose premises the Board of Inland Revenue have officers charged with the safe custody of all plates, blocks, and dies, and the general supervision of the work so far as the interest of the Revenue is concerned.

The perforation of penny postage stamps is, altogether, rather a complicated process. They are of course printed in the sheets of 240 which may be bought for £1 at any post office, and theoretically these sheets should be all exactly of a size. Before printing, however, the paper requires to be damped; and, practically, this is found to expand the sheets in very different degrees, and the first thing to be done on their arrival at Somerset House is to sort them. This is done by boys, who rapidly lay each sheet against a gauge, and put them out in distinct piles. There are five sharp lads usually employed in this way, four of whom between them manage to get through on an average £12,000 worth of penny stamps a day. When thus sorted they are handed to others, whose duty it is to lay them in parcels of six or seven sheets, the stamps falling exactly one over the other, so that in every sheet the perforation shall be precisely in the spaces between them. This is accomplished by having two pin-points at a proper distance apart, and sticking the sheets upon them, each pin passing through a mark printed on the paper for the purpose.

Each little parcel is now placed in the perforating machine, which is far too complicated to admit of description here, but the working of which may perhaps be made intelligible. The sheets being laid in the bed of it, and the machinery set in motion, a set of small punches come down and, at a blow, pierce three sides of every stamp in the first row on the sheet, leaving the space between the first and second rows unperforated. As the punches rise again in readiness for a second blow, the machine itself pushes the sheets along one stamp, and again the punches come down and operate on the second row, thus of course completing the perforation of the first, but leaving the space between the second and third rows uncut.

It is only the penny postage stamps that have to be gauged and sorted before perforation. Other kinds are done on paper which does not require to be wetted before printing. The cost of this preparatory operation however is merely nominal, and the penny stamps cost less to produce than any others of a similar size. Hence it is that they are retained notwithstanding that, owing to the liability of the colour to come off, they are confessedly rather unpleasant to handle in any considerable numbers, and from their stiffness are not always very easily made to adhere. As to the colour coming off, that in one respect is held to be rather an advantage than otherwise, since it very greatly increases the difficulty of removing the cancel-marks without destroying the stamp. This of course is an important consideration, so long as there are people who will always make merrier over a penny won by trickery than over a shilling they have honestly earned; but one cannot help thinking that to pay greater attention to the nature of the obliterating marks would be better than to retain a stamp which, while more extensively used than any other, is far inferior to them all. The cheapness of the stamp is, however, the principal reason for retaining it. But even if the difference between the cost of this and of a better form—the receipt stamp for instance—were far greater than it can possibly be, it would yet seem a very trivial consideration to weigh against the convenience of the public universally.

By this time many of the papers and parchments we saw coming down the shoot from the outer world have passed through the regular routine, and as we retrace our steps a little we find them undergoing a final inspection, from which they are tossed on to another revolving canvas, that gradually rolls them upwards to an aperture, through which they are ejected into the domain of an officer who deals them out again to the public.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

NEVERMORE.

'HERE I SIT WITH DROOPING HEAD.'

AS I watch the fleecy snow
Glistening on the moorland height,
From the dazzling hall below
Streams a flood of crimson light ;

Mingling with a paler sheen
As the moon goes sailing by,
Weaving silvery webs between
The grey mountain and the sky ;

And the merry guests rejoice,
While I murmur o'er and o'er,
"Nevermore to hear that voice !
Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !"

From yon peaceful cottage steal
Pleasant sounds of youthful mirth,
And the varying lights reveal
Happy faces round the hearth—
Lo, they draw the curtains now,
But the shadows still are there,
And the bright heads meekly bow,
As they breathe their evening prayer.
Now a wistful face I see,
Watching from the open door—
Nevermore I'll watch for thee !
Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !

When the evening waxes late,
And the tapers brightly burn,
Oh, how sweet it is to wait
For some loved one to return !
In the gathering mists to stand,
Full of tender hopes and fears,
Till the dear one's loving hand
Wipes away our happy tears ;
But, alas ! I know that mine,
Though as eager as of yore,
Nevermore may rest in thine !
Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !

E'en the festive strain, that swells
O'er the loud rebellious blast,
To my lonely spirit tells Mournful stories of the past—

Bearing on its shimmering wings
Records of departed hours,
Laughing even while it flings
Broken wreaths of withered flowers.
Could not summer's balmy gales
One wee bud to life restore ?
"Nevermore !" my poor heart wails,
"Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !"

Could I rest my burning cheek
'Gainst thy faithful breast once more,
Could I hear thy heart-pulse speak,
As it spoke to me of yore !
Ah ! methinks the perfect bliss
Would be tempting me to pray
That thy tender thrilling kiss
Might beguile my life away.
In my loneliness I cry,
"Soothe me, darling, as before !"
"Nevermore !" the winds reply,
Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !"

Now the noisy guests depart,
Little thinking as they go
That they leave one aching heart
To unutterable woe ;
For, as darkness falls around,
Here I sit with drooping head
Deaf to every passing sound,
Listening only for thy tread !
And as night wears on apace,
I am moaning as before,
"Nevermore to see that face !
Nevermore ! oh, nevermore !"

FANNY FORRESTER.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE FIFTH.

WHAT was there to be done ? I knew well that, according to the Shiitic tenets, "Takie" (that is the temporary secret existence of the sect) was allowed ; but in accordance with the Sunnitic tenets this is prohibited. As the sudden change of religion, though it often takes place with the people of Bagdad, would help me but little, and would have been still more dangerous as to my further plans, I had to bear contentedly the martyrdom, and to take up spiritual arms in this arena for the rights of Abubekr, Osman, and Omar, with all the zeal of his nearer-related followers. And what wretchedness—what endless hardships—what sad hours—how much reviling, derision, and here and there even beating, had I to suffer on account of these first three Kalifs ! Indeed, I shudder at the remembrance of my Sunnitic incognito. True, it had something tragico-comical about it—how I, with my newly acquired eloquence—a stranger to the language I used, and foreign to the religion in whose behalf I used it—defended the rights of the first successors of Mohammed twelve centuries after their existence.

This was, at all events, the final draught of the chalice of bitterness I had to swallow on my tour in Persia. For the rest, the land and people of Persia offered me one of the most interesting studies, after having hitherto moved exclusively among Turks. The appearance of the (generally speaking) heavy and helpless Turk in the province of Azerbaïdshan, who tries to copy the proper Iranian in all his sliness and civilisation of manners, gave me much inward merriment ; and as the dialect they use also attracted my full attention, so that within a fortnight I could use it pretty fluently, I awaked the Shiitic proselytizing jealousy at many a place, and they sought to get me back by all means to the teachings of the sole authority of Ali. The impressions I received became the livelier the further eastward I penetrated, and at the same time the more encouraging for further progress. When I found in Tebris, for the first time on my Central Asiatic travels, a table and chairs, emblems of European civilisation, it required all my moral courage and mental power to suppress my yearning after the distant Western lands.

I was just seated on my rush-mat in the Caravanserai of Emir, when I was struck by the expressions in German, in the Swiss dialect, of a European passing me. He was speaking to a countryman of his following him. I accosted him. Mr. W— was quite astonished to find a European under such circumstances and thus disguised. He at once offered me hospitality, though I refused to accept of it during the first two days; but in the end I could not resist the temptation; and once in his house, I enjoyed in full the luxury of European customs. Clean linen, a good board, a comfortable bed, had a relish; but very soon the inner voice awoke me to the consideration of my circumstances for the safety of the future. I tore myself away from the sweet comradeship and the enticing fetters of comfort, donned my filthy dervish garment again, and on went I on the path of misery and privation as before towards Teheran. And the July sun of Persia did not make my ride under his parching rays more easy or comfortable.

In the Persian capital I was to be exposed to similar temptations, and indeed it required a much greater effort to tear myself away from luxurious enticements, into the tiresome path towards my prescribed goal. As my kind readers may remember yet, I had to enjoy the hospitality of the Turkish Ambassador at Teheran, and this proved more superabundant in its show than I ever could have expected. Haider Efendi petted and spoiled me nearly by forestalling all I required, by his grand mansion, and his luxurious table. Similar was the manner of living of all European ambassadors.

It must be remembered that I arrived at Teheran with the fame of a prodigy. People were much surprised at my ease in speaking the Azerbaïdshanic dialect of the Turkish tongue. Some suspected even that I might have travelled for some time previously in those regions.

Sweet was the rest in the Turkish summer palace at Dshizer, in the neighbourhood of Demawend, a thousandfold sweeter when remembering the pestilential air of Teheran, and the burning glow of the sun of South Persia. And yet I awoke one fine morning at the end of August with the firm purpose of getting my meagre knapsack ready for further wandering. Forward, ever forward, prompted a secret voice from every quarter of the compass. I proposed to hasten across Khorassan to the river Oxus, but as the conflicts then raging made such an attempt next to impossible, and would have endangered all my experience gathered hitherto, my ardour for adventure had to choose another aim.

It drew me towards the celebrated Ispahan and charming Shiraz. True, it was the infatuation of a traveller only curious to know these historical gems, as I had to dread to lose all my hardiness gained, by effeminacy within the lap of luxury, and thus be forced to get hardened in afresh on my return voyage. The members of the Turkish Embassy, and some Europeans at Teheran, who in such a heat scarcely dared to issue out of the soft shade of their tent-like dwellings, thought me crazy in leaving. Their dissuasion, however, and their pictures drawn to frighten me from my undertaking, found deaf ears, and on the 1st of September I was already seated upon my lightly packed ass, again in my costume of Bagdad, with the many-coloured silk cloth ("kerfee") twisted like a turban round the crown of my head, the long tassels hanging lazily down in the hot stillness of the air to my very chest, and amidst a caravan, mostly of pilgrims on their return from the grave of Imam Rizas at Meshed, vis à vis Teheran, hastening back to their Southern homes again. I had seen much, very much indeed, and the firmness wherewith I remained in my adopted character of Sunnite, and passed a school of hardships and anxiety, was destined to be the best preparation for my subsequent struggles.

Imagine a pack of mad Southerners, who come home drunk with the imbibations of the chalice of fanaticism—return filled with enthusiasm from the grave of a Shiitic saint par excellence—who are mad against every form of Sunnism—whose canine instinct run in search of the scent of something that could be made a stumbling-block to their fanaticism, to cool their exuberance. And now consider me, with a frail body, wrapped in a poor and scanty garb, riding my modest ass, myself a Sunnite amongst them, without defence or protection, exposed to perpetual derision and scoffing, proceeding on the same road with them, and you may have an idea of the position that I occupied in the midst of these Meshedes. Had not the cowardice of the Persians been known to me, and had I been unable to make good my right of a "joldash" (travelling companion), I might indeed have become afraid for my safety. But I rightly thought the zealous* to be seldom thirsting after blood, where they cannot still their hunger at the same time with gold.

During the first days I was the target of general

* In Persia as elsewhere.

derision, contempt, and scoffing. While riding, while resting, and at dinner alike, I was assailed. Even during the cool night hours, when tired and worn out I fell a-dozing on the slowly pacing animal, even then I was unceremoniously roused, and rudely asked—

“What, do you mean that dog called Omar—that ugly domesticated animal—that vermin—was not a usurper? Answer, ha, Efendi; for, indeed, I feel a mighty impulse to send you, too, to your dirty patron saint.”

Thirteen centuries have passed since vanity and the thirst for ruling, dressed in the cloak of religion, commenced its wild, nation-severing battles, a struggle that cost a sea of blood, a mountain of dilapidated buildings, bankfuls of treasures, and—look here! after thirteen hundred years, I, seeking with harmless passion after Turanian roots of words, am still thrown into the same whirl of insanity, and awaked from my refreshing slumber by pokes in the ribs. Is this not fruitful?

These sufferings were sufficient to steel even the most timid in a struggle against the generally known zealotism of the Mohammedans of Turkestan. The hardships of the road, the privations during my travel, which I undertook as a pleasure trip on the largest scale through Southern Persia, all increased seriously, and yet only strengthened my desire for further wanderings. Having left Teheran with a single ducat, and counted on the benevolence of the Persians, I was of course reduced to the necessity of diminishing my daily food. Meat was with me a scarce article. I lived mostly on tea, bread, and fruit. I sought and found hospitality in the house of the Imam Dshuma, the highest and most influential prelate of the Shiites, whose power often overawed even the kings.

Aga Buzurg (Great Lord), as he was styled, received me very well, in the hope of being assisted in the glorification of Shiism over Sunnism during a controversy. He was, however, deceived. And what a shudder would have shaken any of the faithful, had he known how the Great Lord had eaten from the same plate, and drunk in common from out the same cup, with an unbeliever, whose touch sufficed to contaminate the members of the Shiite sect! Later, of course, he must have heard of it; but he gave vent to his anger only in public, because this head of the Shiites was nothing less than a bigot.

During my onward voyage to Shiraz I met with still more varied adventures and experience. I rambled often several consecutive days quite alone within the magnificent ruins of Persepolis. I boiled my scanty meal—some tea—on the altar of Nakshi Rustern, which relic looks as new as if its sculptors had but yesterday left off hammering the chisels that moulded it. And when the crackling flame arose, and the fumes ascended from the black stone plate towards the skies, it lulled me for hours into a charmed contemplation, wherein the stony figures of the worship disused for centuries passed before my dreamy eyes. How interesting were, after all, those bygone days I passed within the honoured monuments of Persian antiquity!

Towards evening I used to slink to one of the adjacent villages to fetch my daily provender. Nothing disturbed my spirit of reverential piety within these sacred ruins but the silly custom of European travellers of engraving their names, with the hope of immortalising themselves, in the slabs or columns of the place. And that sky—that wonderful azure blue sky of Shiraz, never found elsewhere—how deeply did it move my soul, how happy did I feel for hours in its contemplation! I stopped two entire days at the tomb of Saadi, the great moralist and traveller. From his book did I suck the sweet honey of eloquence. He passed with his travelling-staff across two-thirds of the globe, and made himself immortal on every page of his writings. On the tomb of Hafez, not a great distance from that of the former, I thought it piety to quaff some cups of the excellent wine of Chullarij. A friend of mine, Dr. F——, accompanied me thither; and while the cups filled with the effervescent drink lingered on the horizontal marble slab, placed there by Kerim Khan for the glorification of the great poet of love, I found my most daring dreams surpassed. I forgot grief, misery, the hatred of the Shiites, and all wretchedness, happy in the few moments spent at that immense distance from my native land.

How I would fain dwell longer in the remembrance of those scenes! While there I should have liked to remain within the hallowed precincts longer. But it is time that I return to Teheran, and communicate to my readers those feelings which seized hold of me when I first met that company of ragged Central-Asiatic pilgrims, with whom I intended to enter the otherwise unreachable centre of Asia.

They looked indeed very ragged and wretched. In the features of their tanned faces poverty had stamped legibly its mark; a bewildered conception of world and men, a violent fanaticism unmistakable in its expression, awed the beholder from the very first meeting. That, notwithstanding all this, the small twinkling eyes of these Tartars had a smile for me, that I was enabled to draw courage and zeal from their manner, could be explained but by the fact of my scientific fanaticism plucking its medicine wherever it found it. In the same way as the single members of the Turkish Embassy saw but crafty pilferers and arch-murderers in these people, so would every European, maybe to-day myself, have opined; but then I lived so much within the influences of Asiatic ideas of all circumstances; my abode in Constantinople transforming me into a Turk, the same way that my travels in Persia changed me into a thorough Asiatic. Indeed, I had no foreboding, nor did I believe it, that travelling with these pilgrims was connected with more hardships than I had suffered hitherto.

But herein I was essentially deceived.

To me, the immense difference by which the social and ethnographical life in Central Asia differs from the same within Mohammedan parts of the rest of Asia was unknown; and no doubt to this circumstance must be ascribed my illusion. In the first place, the uncommon uncleanness, which characterised not only the dresses of my travelling companions, but also their manner of living, I learned early to loathe, because it oppressed me—it lowered me by its very contact. He who has travelled with very scanty means from Trebizond to Shiraz, and then again to the very southern shores of the Caspian—he who, as I have related already, at the very first halting-place of his travels had to make uncomfortably close acquaintance with companions that are inseparable from all Oriental travellers, and who, finally, with wild and dirty-looking Turks, Koords, Arabs, and Persians of the lowest order, had to drink in common out of the most primitive vessels, and had to take his meals with his fingers out of the same dish, as I have done it often—might not have been touched so much by the inamenities of his life among such companions, though it might cause horror to a European; and with all former experiences to keep up my spirits, to blunt my fastidiousness, I was shocked, and thought the endurance of it beyond my strength within the very first few days—as soon as I entered into intimacy with the Tartar mendicant pilgrims.

Among twenty-four members of our company, to but four or six did their means allow change of their nether garments, though vanity or pride suggested to these also to dress up in shaggy garbs, consisting of many-coloured rags wherewith their body was more surrounded and patched over than dressed.

Added to all this, by far the greater part had a lamentably sickly appearance. Many were disfigured by chilblains, from long exposure to frost, and blisters brought on by want of protection against the sun's heat.

Consider now the fate of a European who had to rest night after night in close contact with these people; who was obliged to eat all his meals out of one dish with them; who had to bear and to be thankful for the daily bodily proof of their attachment, without being allowed to betray the slightest sign of loathing—a deadly sin among the Mohammedans. Under the sky, in the free air, my lot may have been considered tolerable, while travelling in a smaller party over hill and dale with my companions; but extremely disagreeable were to me the first nights, and the impression which these left on my memory will haunt me to my very grave.

In my food, too, I had to undergo a great change. The Turkish and Persian board—which a European would consider insupportably bad—compared to what I had to eat on my travel through the south of Persia, appeared to my mind as the perfection of culinary art. How times changed with me! The Tartar gourmets delighted but in rice, prepared with plenty of mutton suet; and as this is not customary with the Persians, we had to purchase at our halting-places in Mazanderan a lot of tallow candles, break these up into a saucepan, and grease the rice-dish with the fat, although fresh butter could be had cheap and in abundance.

My wish to make use of the latter, and prepare for separate use my own share, might not have seriously shocked my companions, but I made up my mind to remain faithful to the principle of undivided friendship, and thought it better to succumb to the experiment of my thorough Tartarification, than to fall a victim to the suspicion and tyranny of the Central-Asiatic authorities. This appeared anyway to me the wisest policy, as I thought, and not without some likelihood, that my only hope lay in the adoption of as many Turkestanic manners and customs as possible for my thorough protection in their land.

Whether it may have been fear of my future fate, or repentance on account of my undertaken travel, that disturbed my peace of mind during the first few days, is a question put to me since by many. Should I own it openly, I should have to say that all such feelings were utterly foreign to my mind.

In the first place, the sympathy of my fellow-travellers appeared to me a sufficient guarantee of safety against all possible contingencies of danger. Secondly, the burthen, the hard struggle for existence during the first epoch of my mendicant life, had been softened in part by my previous hardships. Poverty I had known since my earliest youth. On the other hand, the charm of novelty which I met with during my strange existence amongst the Asiatics, and expected to find still more interesting in the future, made me forget the troubles of the present. Thirdly, the feeling of vanity to be treading on a virgin soil of geographical and ethnographical research, roused in my breast a sense of self-importance, and formed within me an ambition of such charm, and so mighty a sympathy, that to achieve something in this novel field of science I would not only have exposed myself to any toil and trouble, but would have dared any kind of danger. This consciousness went so far, that I often muttered to myself, "There never was any European here. Here thou art a Columbus! —a Pizarro!"

WOMEN WHO WORK.

THE LADY DOCTOR.

HE doctor? Yes, I am their doctor, inasmuch as I have attended the family for several years, brought the youngsters through their convulsions and measles, and just assisted at the introduction of a seventh baby. I have been up all night with the mother till the happy event was over ; and now I must hurry off to see a poor girl who is lingering in a painful, wasting illness, which might have been cured in a month if she had gone to a doctor in the beginning, and which I much fear is beyond everything but alleviation now. She lives in Chelsea, and thence I have to go to two cases in St. John's Wood, one in Russell Square, and another right up at Highgate. A large enough practice? Yes, certainly. Consider that there are about half a dozen medical women in the whole of London, and not hundreds, but thousands, of sick and suffering fellow-women crying out for their aid and attendance, and it stands to reason that each of the former must have her hands at least as full as five out of six general practitioners.

But yet I am not a doctor? No—not, in law, either physician, surgeon, or apothecary. The law, as at present in force in England, forbids the giving of any such degree to a woman. She may study from the same books and in the same hospitals as male students, attend the same lectures and pass the same examinations ; and after doing all this she cannot take even the lowest medical degree open to a man. She cannot obtain even the least legal recognition of her studies and qualifications. "I believe," a very well-known physician told me, "that you are quite as well qualified to practise as myself, or any other medical man. I have no doubt that others of your sex are equally so ; but all the same you are a quack, because it is not allowed, and never shall be allowed, that you receive the necessary degree which, in the eye of the law, separates a doctor from a quack."

Therefore, you see, I am no doctor in one sense, but simply an unlicensed practitioner ; or, as the doctor says, a—quack! So be it, say I. If at the price of an uncomplimentary name, after years of hospital work, hard study, and general practice, I could save but half a dozen girlish lives, otherwise sacrificed to scruples of delicacy, which it is the fashion of the world to deny and ridicule ; but which, however foolish, do exist and will exist as long as men are men, and maidens maidenly—if I could but train half a score of women to a calm and skilful practice of managing that ordinary event in the course of nature which, as Florence Nightingale says, is "not a fatal disease, nor a disease at all ; not a fatal accident, nor an accident at all ;" but which, in the hands of ignorant and uneducated women, hospital students equally inexperienced and fond of experiments, and surgeons fresh from fever cases and post mortem examinations, has cost more innocent and valuable lives than many a recognised and malignant disease—if I could do only so much, and no more, I would willingly bear and assume the title of quack, or whatever else ignorance and prejudice might be pleased to style me.

But how was it some medical women—Mrs. Garrett Anderson and Mrs. Elizabeth Blackwell—have been able to take a degree? How did Mrs. Anderson manage it? Well, in this way, by being the first, and therefore not so strictly guarded against by laws of regulation or precedent ; by what men would call a "fluke," in fact—I'm not fond of slang words myself. Mrs. Anderson studied at a public hospital, went through the full course, not as a recognised medical student, but under the guise of nurse, was given private lectures and instructions on all the different subjects by the hospital physician, passed her examinations as well as any man, and took her degree at Apothecaries' Hall, the lowest degree you can take, and that only available by virtue of the word "person" being used in the regulations of the society, without distinction of male or female.

It was after and in consequence of this, that a new regulation was enacted that no person not having passed the necessary examinations and gone through the regular course of study in a "public and properly qualified hospital," could take a degree as a "registered" medical practitioner.

Now, the College of Surgeons had already ruled that no woman should be permitted to enter herself as a medical student in any "public and properly qualified hospital." Ergo, no woman can take a degree ; or legally sign even a vaccination certificate as a "registered" medical practitioner : can—however perfectly qualified by hard study, careful examination, wide practice (all carried on under difficulties which would daunt nine out of ten men), and last, not least, womanly sympathy—obtain a legal right to interfere for the rescue of her fellow-woman from the jaws of death. A hard case? Well, yes, I think so ; but not so hard on those who would devote themselves to the work as on the patients they would succour.

What first induced me to take up the profession? Well, in the beginning, I suppose, a strong innate taste for the study of medicine—what, in fact, is called a vocation—and a great desire to be able to relieve the physical sufferings of other women and children. No woman, indeed, who does not possess these two primary qualifications in a very marked degree should, in my opinion, attempt to embrace a profession every step of which is not only hard and painful in itself, but made harder and more painful by the fact of its being associated so entirely with men, that they seem to think they have a right to drive a woman from it, as they might a poacher trespassing on their preserves.

When Dr. Mary Walker lectured in a London hall, the students of a large medical college signalled their manliness and chivalry by yelling at and pelting her, as a lot of street-boys would pelt a wild cat.

When another lady sat among a host of fellow-students in the amphitheatre of a great American college, during a most painful disquisition, striving to banish altogether from her mind the fact that there was any other audience present save herself, and to take into it every particular which could aid her to benefit her suffering sisters in a future day, a student from above dropped a sheet of note-paper containing some offensive jest on to her arm. It lay there a second in the eyes of everybody, and then, without moving head or eyes, or appearing in any way conscious of the insult, she just turned her arm sufficiently to allow the paper to roll off into the arena beneath. I don't know whether it was the silent contrast between the woman's dignity and the man's cowardice, but I am glad to say some of the young men in this case had the courage to hiss the scamp who had disgraced them.

Nerves? Well, I should think the preceding anecdote would have sufficiently answered that question, and proved that a woman can control them even in a most trying situation. If a woman's nerves are too weak for ordinary medical practice, how is it that, in the guise of sister of charity and army nurse, they can penetrate where the shells are flying thickest on the field of battle, kneeling by the wounded, or keeping at the surgeon's side, his coolest and most tireless assistant?

How is it that, as army nurse again, they can watch the most trying surgical operations, dress and bandage the most horrible wounds, and by their gentleness, patience, and nerve control even the outrageous fury of a delirious soldier? Nerves are not a question of sex, but of will. They have been considered as interesting and feminine in women, and therefore women have given way to and encouraged them; but, like most other moral and physical weaknesses, they can be subdued if the will be brought to bear upon them in sufficient strength, and a woman's will is no weaker than that of the opposite sex. She may indeed voluntarily submit it to a man; but independent of and apart from that submission, it remains as strong, if not stronger, in every way.

Besides, look at history. Pick out the principal characters of men and women, and ask yourself whether the latter are remarkable for a want of nerve, or the reverse. Look at Grace Darling at Gertrude von der Wart, at Lady Catherine Douglas! Look how women watch beside death-beds from which men have shrunk in horror, at times of pestilence, when they have kept up their own and their children's courage while strong men have sickened and died of sheer nervous fear. Boys are naturally much shyer than girls; and shyness is only a form of nerves. Train a girl in that respect as you would a boy, and the result will be the same.

One of the cleverest professors of anatomy that ever lived was a woman—Anna Mazzolini, he name. And I have seen the hospital surgeon and principal medical man in a large town, turn white and shaky at the sight of a little child in a fit, and have to be "kept up" with a glass of wine before he could take the proper means for its recovery.

No; nerves—and I have tried them by my own which were no stronger than other women's in the beginning—are nothing but a matter of will and training; and if, by over-fostering and weak indulgence, they have grown more noticeable in our sex that is only another reason why to get them into proper training and subjection is one of the first items in the "work" of a medical woman.

But about myself? Oh, I made my first essay in nursing. I nursed a cousin, of whom I was very fond, through a dangerous illness; and then he husband sickened, and I nursed him in like manner. At the end the doctor told me he had never had so able and efficient an assistant, either in man or woman; and knowing my desire to lead a workful life, and that my father had always had a great desire that one of his girls should study medicine, he not only advised me to embrace the study of medicine and nursing as a profession, but gave me a letter to the head matron of a certain royal hospital in Marylebone. I went there joyously; but as it happened the list of nurses was full. The matron, however, offered to admit me as a pupil, and agreed. I wanted work, and I knew that was work for which women were especially fitted, and for which they were often disgracefully incompetent.

Yes, you are right, I was in every way a novice to it myself at the beginning; but I didn't stay long. I worked very hard, and observed keenly for at the end of a few months the head matron remarked on my skill in attending to all regular cases (the others, a proportion of one to a hundred came under the medical men), and said she would give me the same certificate of merit as would have been given to a house-surgeon on leaving.

Well, yes, I felt flattered. You see I did not know then how little real use such a certificate would be in enabling me to enter on the medical career. Shortly after this the head matron was obliged to leave, and I was left in her place, with the direction of everything, and with full authority to manage. It was about that time that I began to examine and reflect on the abuses and mistakes in hospitals for women, as at present conducted; and to see the extreme need for having superior and educated women thoroughly instructed in all the branches of medicine and surgery necessary in the medical treatment of their own sex.

No, I did not stay very long at that hospital. After the head matron returned, I went to Melbourne in medical attendance on a lady who expected to be unwell on the voyage, and did not care to trust herself in the hands of a young army doctor. After that I went to another London hospital for women, under one of the clever men of the day. He was very fond of his ease and social enjoyments, and he found it so convenient to have some one on whose skill and judgment he could rely, that he gave me private lectures and instructions in surgical operations; and left general directions that, instead of troubling him, I was always to be called to manage every case of which I chose to accept the responsibility. In this way I attended many difficult cases, trained other women practitioners, and was in fact, though not in name, house-surgeon, for there was no other resident in the hospital. Indeed it occurs to me as one of the trials attending the life of a medical woman, that she may study and practise anything, be the doctor's right hand, or take his place altogether, so long, and no longer, as she does not attempt to claim the right to any recognition of her services, but will be content to keep in the background, and while doing a man's work, carefully hide from the world that it is done by a woman.

After this I went to Bern, and studied in the hospitals there; to Florence, and did the same; and on returning assumed the post of superintendent to a district body of Bible nurses, where I had to dispense medicines and attend in general practice over a thousand patients, among the poorer women and children.

No, I don't at all approve of women attending men, any more than I approve of men attending women. They are both unnatural and indelicate, one neither more nor less so than the other; and you must enter practically into the subject before you can see how widely spread, though carefully smothered, is the feeling that such is the case, even among poor and supposedly vulgar-minded women.

Have you never wondered why respectable females of the lower orders evince such a rooted horror of "going to the 'orspital," and prefer even to die in their crowded, miserable rooms, than be put under the students and surgeons of an airy, well-regulated hospital? There is reason enough, and many women besides lady doctors know it; but it is not a subject which will bear going into in a general magazine; though anecdote after anecdote might be given which would make even careless and frivolous women shudder and weep, to think of what their humbler sisters have to endure because of a class prejudice, and because the very nature of such endurance prevents its being discussed in general society. They would do more than weep, they would earnestly and unitedly demand that if—as is now proved to be the case—women can be educated to the same pitch as men in all things connected with the medical treatment of women, provision should be made for such education as early as possible.

Such provision has been asked for—and refused. The result is, women go on asking, and both study and practise without it.

About one's own delicacy of feeling? No, I don't consider that the medical profession need in any wise injure or rub off the innate delicacy or refinement of any lady's mind. It may give her courage to speak plainly on painful subjects, where there is necessity for her so to do. It may make her less tolerant with mock modesties and that false delicacy which is a betrayal and contradiction of itself; but to assert, as many do, that lady doctors must, without exception, become strong-minded, unfeminine, and coarse, is utterly and entirely false.

I know a lady doctor living near me, of whom a lady of position, and a most ultra-refined and delicate woman, said to me, "I had had a great prejudice against ladies of your profession; but I fell in love with her at once. It was not her skill only, but the halo of gentleness and dignity which seems to envelop her, the refinement of mind which took the unpleasant taste out of even painful words, and gave me a feeling of rest and security from any shade of unpleasantness, which a woman seldom feels when entering into the subject of her ailments with a medical man."

No; why some women accuse us of indelicacy, and do more to injure and hinder us than anybody else, is because we are too truthful. We will not pander to the self-deceit of those fine ladies who, falling sick of over-feeding and over-idleness, of dissipation and unhealthy hours, call in a doctor to flatter them in their weaknesses, and afford their jaded nerves the relief of a little pleasing excitement. Ask any fashionable physician how many of these he can count among his regular patients!

Call in male professional aid if needed? Certainly. In any case where there is risk to life, I always offer to call in a medical man. That offer has been accepted once! Indeed, I would always in such cases follow the general practice.

But here we are at our journey's end, and a bad case of neglect before me. Yes, I dare say I shall be up all to-night and perhaps to-morrow; but no one should be a doctor who has not trained himself to sleep at any hour, and at a moment's notice.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-NINTH.
IN THE SUNSHINE.

It was a hard fight, but, as Ailie said, she "warstled through wonderful." Youth and a healthy constitution were good allies; and so the doctor, who had regarded the case with such gloomy anticipations, was able to take credit to himself for one of the most remarkable rescues in the annals of medicine. Indeed, he wrote to the Lancet on the subject, and ceased his subscription to that journal from the date on which his contribution had been declined with thanks.

By-and-by Teenie was able to sit out in the garden, oppressed almost with shawls and cloaks to protect her from the keen breeze. She would sit looking at Baby being nursed by Ailie or Grace—she was too weak to hold him often herself. He was a perpetual wonder to her: his smiles were glorious; his howls and kicks were inexpressibly comic.

the grave discussion as to what name, he should bear.

It was a very grave discussion, renewed many times. Teenie and Grace had consulted endless lists of names at the ends of dictionaries and elsewhere, numberless grand names were proposed, but objections were found to all, and they came back to the point from which they started, that they must call him after one or both of his grandfathers. But Hugh was not a nice name, and Daniel, with its unavoidable contraction into Dan, was almost ugly. Walter was not bad, but they were desirous of giving precedence to the old people.

"I wish he had been a lassie," said Teenie thoughtfully.

"Why so?" asked her husband.

"Because then it would have been easy enough to settle his name—we would have called him Grace."

"I would have liked that very much," said Grace; "but as he is a boy, we must give him a boy's name."

Finally, it was agreed that he should be baptised Daniel Hugh, although there was a unanimous conviction that it was not a good combination.

Teenie grew stronger as days passed, and she was able to take long drives with Walter in the Dalmahoy gig which was sent over to the manse for her benefit. It was a delight to her to lean back, and stare about her and before her, feeling the pleasant breeze beating upon her cheeks, and inhaling strength at every step the horse made. Walter was beside her, and she was very happy, although she was often dreaming of the great sea—no land visible—waves rolling high, and the Christina tossing upon their foamy crests. Then she would look round upon the pleasant landscape, and wish that her father were with her.

There was the bright yellow corn, delicately tipped and tinged with green, waving and murmuring under the wind; at intervals there were groups of cots with white or reddish clay-coloured walls, covered with ancient thatch, moss-grown in parts, the rest embrowned by age and weather; or striped with earth-patches where the peasant had been repairing the roof.

Presently they would drive along the bank of a gurgling stream, where a band of boys who had probably raced there from the school were romping about, in well-patched clothes, with bare feet and with breeks—when they had breeks—rolled up to the thigh, whilst they waded in the water, in their hands very primitive rods—made of a branch, a bit of twine, and a bent pin—fishing for minnows. Others were rolling down the bank, in the simple enjoyment of mere life and freedom from school.

On the other side of the stream was a light green meadow, which had been closely cropped by sheep and cattle; beyond it a rich golden plain of full ripe barley, studded with stooks just cut; this plain was backed by the deep green of a turnip-field, and beyond that was a purple moorland seen through scattered trees of dusky green, fading into a blue-black background of plantation which formed a dark line on the horizon. Overhead, the sky clear pale blue, with fleecy clouds floating lazily eastward, forming into grotesque shapes fringed with bright silver and gold where the sunlight flashed upon them.

She was unspeakably happy in all this sunshine, although she was so weak and helpless. The brightness of the earth seemed to reproach her for certain dark and half-acknowledged wishes that she might be taken away then in order to allow Grace to be happy. The world was very beautiful, and Walter was very kind, and she clung to both with desperate fondness. No, she could not give them up, although Grace was so good, and must be so miserable.

She was regaining strength rapidly; every day she felt better and looked better. During this period she became aware of the many signs of kindly interest in her welfare which were made by people whom she did not know, and to whom she had never spoken a word, as well as by those she did know. Friendly inquiries were made for her daily, and little offerings were left at the manse by rich and poor.

"The house is just bock fu' of jeellies and wines," exclaimed Ailie. "I dinna ken how they'll ever manage to get through it all."

"There's a great deal more kindness and goodness in the world than we fancy," Teenie said to her husband one morning, when she began to realise all the stir and anxiety her illness had awakened in the district.

One of the most devoted of Teenie's friends was Habbie Gowk. Throughout the period of her illness he was at Drumliemount some time in the course of each day, always with a bunch—a "babb," he called it—of wild flowers; and when he learned that she was up, and able to speak to those about her, the flowers were frequently accompanied by "A Morning Salutation," in verse of course, written on large blue letter-paper, in a big text-hand.

Walter was rather vexed to discover in the course of these visits that Habbie's face looked somewhat haggard, his eyes restless, and his clothes unusually tattered. Even Beattie seemed to have grown thin, and to wear a dejected look. The happy spirit of the poet seemed to have vanished; his loud laugh was never heard, and all his pawky ways of pressing the sale of his ballads were forgotten. He was a man oppressed with cares, the weight of which even his donkey felt.

Teenie and Walter were at the door, she seated beneath the roses and honeysuckle, he leaning against the porch. Habbie dismounted at the gate, left Beattie to browse at the roadside, and advanced.

"I am blithe to see you, mistress," he said, with hearty goodwill, "and I hope it'll be long or you ever ken such trouble again. You'll no care for this now."

He uttered this last sentence a little ruefully as he looked at the wild flowers he carried, and which this time, moved by some curious fancy, he had encircled with a ring of pink and yellow sea-ferns, binding the whole with a broad band of thick brown sea-weed.

"It's bonnie, Habbie," she cried, with almost childish pleasure, as she took the "babb" and held it up admiringly, "and it was just uncommon kind of you to thin'k about them. This brings me to the woods and sea. Thank you, Habbie; I feel better and stronger looking at them."

"I'm glad, mistress, that they please you," he said simply.

"But what's wrong with you, Habbie?" she exclaimed, observing his altered appearance; "have you been poorly too?"

"No, no just poorly, but——"

He stopped, awkward, conscious of the very dilapidated condition of his wardrobe, and ashamed of being there.

"What is it, Habbie?" said Walter good-naturedly; "you are not the man you used to be. What has happened to you?"

The poet made a wry face, and scratched his tousled head.

"It's that fortune," he said, with a faint perception of the ludicrous contrast between his appearance and the cause to which he attributed it. "That—um—that siller Geordie Methven left; it's put a'thing wrang."

"How so?"

"I promised no to speak about it, but I winna hold my tongue longer. I wish I had gone to the Laird when he said I might go; but the writer Currie threatened me no to speak to mortal man, or he would drop the case; and so I was feared to speak, and it's just been a millstone round my neck. It's waur nor the gaswork yet."

"But if you are the heir, as Currie tells you, there should be no need for secrecy of any kind."

"I think Currie's a—beg your pardon, mistress; I'll no call any names in your presence; and I dinna ken that I should mention the matter here of all places, for you are both interested parties."

Walter and Tecnie laughed.

"Don't be afraid of us, Habbie," he said; "we have not the least notion of contesting your claim to the fortune."

"It's no that I'm feared about; I would be glad if it came to you; but Currie gar'd me sign a paper giving him power to do what he likes, and he's kept me on waiting and waiting, day after day, expecting that the business would be settled, and I would find myself a man of fortune. But every morning there's this plea, and that plea, and one delay, and another delay, until I'm clean worried out of my judgment wi' expectations that come to naething. Yet I canna gi'e up the chance. The craving for the siller seems to ha'e grippit me, and I can do naething but dream about it, waking and sleeping, and I wish to the Lord I had never heard about it. I can hardly keep from calling him ill names, even in your presence, mistress, when I mind what fine times Beattie and me had afore I ken'd that there was a chance o' my heiring a fortune. It's fair ruination."

He was much excited in giving this story of his troubles, and there was a pathetic sigh in his voice as he lamented the happy days when he had been a contented vagrant.

"You should place the business in the hands of another lawyer, if you think Currie is not acting justly," said Walter, deeply interested.

"Aye, but though, what better would I be? I ken nothing of the business, and the thing has grown upon me in such a way that I'm feared to do anything that might lose a chance; for I canna go back to the time when I never thought about it; I canna be as I was. I feel now as if the siller was really mine; and if it's decided that I have no claim till't, it will be just as bad as though they took it out of my pouch. I ken it's laughable that a ragged, guid-for-nothing creature like me should even himsel' to be heir to millions, but it was put in my head, and I canna drive it out."

"But what is the difficulty in your case?"

"As far as I can make it out, it's just this: My mother was one of the auld wifie Methven's daughters, but I was born in an out-of-the-way place in the Orkneys, and they canna prove that I'm the son of my mother. Whiles I'm tempted to run away from the whole affair, but then I come back, hoping and hoping, and syne I take a dram just to forget myself, or to feel as blithe as though I'd come into the fortune. But I'll no weary you any more. I'll speak to the Laird; he kens the law, and maybe he can help me. Guid day, mistress, and I wish you had the siller, though I'm no sure it's a good wish."

"I'll speak to my father too, Habbie, and if we can help you we will."

"Thank you, sir; it's kind o' you, but I'm doubtful."

He went away, refusing to have anything to eat (he was not offered anything to drink). He did not go to Dalmahoy that day however. He visited his acquaintances, got a dram here and a dram there, rarely saying a word about his fortune, but feeling his burden lighten with each successive dram. Finally he found himself in the evening seated in a cosy room at the inn, surrounded by a group of fishers, mostly young men, who looked upon him as a kind of butt for their frequently rude mirth, at the same time feeling a vague respect for him as a poet, and as the possible heir to the boundless wealth of the late George Methven. He told stories and sang his songs, his glass was kept well filled, and he was as happy as if he had obtained the fortune, or had never heard of it.

Somehow he reached his lodging, and during the night he roused his landlady, shouting—

"Tibbie! Tibbie, woman! I'm that dry; fetch in the well!"

His miseries returned to him in the morning.

CHAPTER THE THIRTIETH.
IN THE SHADE.

"THAT fortune is a shuttlecock," said Walter next day, as he was preparing to go out; "everybody seems to have a game with it, and to feel much the worse for the amusement. It was lucky we never had anything to do with it."

"Yes, it was lucky," Teenie thought, and at the same time she remembered what Dalmahoy had told her when trying to persuade her not to marry his son. It was curious that Walter seemed to have so entirely forgotten it.

He left her in his room; he had to pay a number of visits to his parishioners, and then he was going on to Dalmahoy. She had to arrange for him some old papers, which were untidily packed in a deal box he had brought with him from college. She was in a dreamy mood to-day, but the task before her was simple and interesting, for it would help her to realise his life during his student days.

There were old essays which he had written as exercises in his classes, or for the debating society to which he had belonged; his first attempts at sermon-writing; scraps of sermons and rough notes suggestive of other sermons; the letters of old college comrades, and some wild squibs and caricatures written during the contest for the election of the Lord Rector.

They were very amusing sign-posts of the past, and Teenie felt quite merry in going over them. There were many ridiculous things to laugh at, and to tease him about hereafter; many indications of wild notions which were as unlike the quiet resolute man who was her husband, as if they had been written by another person altogether. What a transformation there was from the youth to the man! and yet he had always seemed the same to her. She wondered if other people had noted the change which had escaped her eyes.

There was one more bundle of papers—letters, tied with a thick cord and crushed into a corner. The handwriting was a lady's. She opened the letters with a peculiar feeling of curiosity—a mingling of merry anticipations of something more to tease him about, with a touch of regret that his past had not been all hers.

They were Grace's letters, written to him whilst he was studying in Edinburgh, or during his absence on some excursion in the Highlands.

Although there was a smile on her face, her heart beat fast, and then fluttered feebly as if she were in the dark, conscious of the presence of some indefinable danger. She hesitated to read them; she felt that it would be wrong to do so, and she began slowly to retie the bundle.

It was very careless of him not to have destroyed them; most negligent of him to forget that they were in this box when he asked her to arrange its contents. Perhaps it was not owing to negligence that he had left the letters there, but because he knew that they did not contain anything which she might not see?

She paused, pondering that question.

The sophistry of the wife's curiosity prevailed. She untied the bundle of letters again and read them. One by one the letters were taken out of the envelopes, read, and replaced.

She did not think of the pain Grace would have suffered, had it become known to her that those letters had fallen into other hands than Walter's; but she did think that he had been cruel in not destroying them. Or was it possible that he could have been so blind and dull, that he had not felt the yearning woman's heart throbbing in every word and every line? Here was the revelation of a love so strong that under its grand halo nothing he could do seemed wrong; so self-forgetful that Teenie partly understood now how Grace could love him and yet surrender him to another.

The foibles which he confessed in his letters to Grace were treated with tender partiality; the little tokens of success which he was able to announce were hailed and magnified with loving enthusiasm; the few conventional words of affection which he wrote were received with eager gratitude. How utterly submissive to his pleasure was this woman; how grand he must have appeared in her eyes; and how cruelly unconscious he must have been to it all!

Teenie felt that her love was very poor indeed compared to that of Grace; yet he was her husband, and Grace still loved him, and was able to care for his wife.

She could not understand it at all: she thought there was a mistake somewhere. She was not given to tears, but she bowed her head over that sad record of a disappointed affection, and cried bitterly—not for herself. There was no jealousy, no angry feeling in her heart now; there was nothing but piteous regret that she had marred the happiness of one who deserved it so much better than she did. Why, why was it that one so good and generous as Grace was, should have to suffer, whilst she, a weak useless creature, should have her wishes granted?

She asked the question almost fiercely; and then she felt afraid—felt that she had done something unpardonably wicked, and, sobbing, wished that she had never been born, since she was the cause of sorrow when she wished most to give joy.

What agony Grace must have endured; and how bravely she had concealed it!

Teenie dried her eyes, irritated with herself for such weakness, and then, very tenderly, tied up those old letters. Holding the bundle in her hand, dazed with strange thoughts and self-accusations, and her heart aching, she tried to think what she could do to relieve Grace. Nothing, absolutely nothing; she must just sit still with the knowledge of all the sorrow entailed upon one whose life was blameless, without even the privilege of telling her that she shared her pain.

She replaced the letters in the box, and turned away from them. Since she could do nothing she would try to forget them: but she could not.

Walter found his wife looking much paler than she had done when he went out in the forenoon, and she was much weaker too.

"You have been wearying yourself," he said anxiously, and fearful of a relapse; "you should not have overtaxed your strength. What a stupid fellow I am, to have allowed you to attempt anything just now!"

He poured out her medicine, and tried to make her more comfortable in the chair. He moved about rapidly, performing all those little affectionate offices which relieve an invalid.

Her big dreamy eyes followed his every movement, with a strange eager look in which there was much sadness. She noted that, although he was trying to hide it from her, there were signs of agitation on his face and in his manner. Had he remembered about the letters, and was he vexed to think that she had seen them?

When he had done everything he could think of to relieve her, and stood by the chair anxiously watching her, she looked up at him with a quiet smile.

"I'm better now, Wattie; I'm always better when you are beside me," she said; "I'm getting strong fast—but what is the matter with you?"

He was disturbed by the question, and looked grave as he took her hand, patting it gently with his own.

"I suppose it's better to tell you at once than allow you to worry yourself wondering what it can be. My father is in serious difficulties, and——"

He stopped, for the words he had been about to utter—"he blames me"—would have vexed her. So he said quietly—

"And I do not see how to help him."

"But what are the difficulties?"

"Money—money—and money," he answered, trying to speak lightly.

"Is that all?"

He smiled at the question, and was thankful she had so little experience of that terrible condition, the want of money, whether it be little or much.

"Yes, that is all."

"Then we can help him—my father will do it for us."

Her face brightened, and she felt almost glad of this calamity which enabled her to be of some use. But Walter shook his head, as if her hopes were quite vain.

"Your father will not be home in time, and if he should be, I do not think he could advance the sum required—seven thousand pounds."

"Eh!" cried Teenie, in despair; if he had said seven millions she would not have been more startled. She only knew that he had mentioned a sum too large for her wildest fancies to realise.

"How could the Laird make away with such a heap of money?"

"He says it made away with itself. At any rate the money was borrowed on the security of Dalmahoy, house and grounds, and it was spent. The Laird was not much afraid of being unable to repay the money when called upon, and was sure that at the worst he could renew the loan; for Mrs. Dunlop, from whom he borrowed, was one of his oldest friends. But several projects upon which he had counted have failed; Mrs. Dunlop is dead, and her heir has just served my father with a terrible document called a 'Schedule of Intimation and Protest,' the effect of which is that, if the bond is not paid off three months hence, Dalmahoy will be sold."

There was a sort of grim satisfaction in talking thus calmly about a matter which was racking his heart with pain—a matter which meant the utter ruin of his family.

"And your father—your sisters—what will they do?"

"Who can tell?" he said, so quietly, but with a pale look which filled Teenie with dread. He was gazing down dreamily at the box of old papers, and his thoughts wandered back to the happy student days when the future seemed so clear, and his energies seemed great enough to overcome any difficulty life could present. He went on: "They cannot work, and I have no home to offer them. Droll, is it not?—there is that Methven fortune, which might make so many people happy, uselessly multiplying itself whilst a whole crowd of heirs are wrangling over it and making themselves wretched about it; and here are we, who might be saved from misery if we could only obtain a fraction of it. I shall learn many wise lessons from that fortune, if I can only escape the mania of craving to possess it. At present I am sorely tempted to desire it for my father's sake."

He spoke in much the same tone and manner as if he were reviewing a mathematical problem, or looking curiously at some psychological puzzle. He had not the least craving for the Methven estate; although he saw how much trouble a very small portion of it would have spared him, yet it was no more than an interesting subject for reflection to him. He was deeply distressed on his father's account; and he had been sharply reminded that the present crisis was entirely due to his obstinacy in marrying Teenie; if he had only fulfilled his engagement with Grace—"an engagement," said the Laird, "which your sense of honour as a gentleman should have compelled you to keep, no matter what she was willing to agree to—there would have been no trouble now. There would have been plenty of means to clear Dalma-hoy, and to save it from that scamp who is a mere gambler on the Exchange of Glasgow, and who is either hard pressed for money himself, or thinks this a good opportunity to set up as a landed proprietor."

"However," said the Laird finally, in his grand magnanimous way, "I've eaten my cake, and I am content; but then I have eaten your share as well as my own, and that's awkward—for you."

His frankness and generosity were beautiful.

These things running through Walter's head, he was still unconscious of any regret that he had acted as he had done, although he could not avoid acute suffering in the knowledge that the course he had found it necessary to pursue should entail sorrow upon others. He questioned himself, had he not acted selfishly? Then he looked at Teenie and simply answered the question—he could not help it.

At the same time he stooped down to the box of old papers; he turned them over tenderly, and presently he came to the bundle of Grace's letters. He took it up with a glow of sweet and sad remembrance on his countenance.

"Poor Grace!" he said, handling the letters fondly; "she was very kind to me; I wish I could show her what an exalted place she has in my thoughts."

He was unconscious that Teenie was watching him, and that her eyes were very wide and bright.

END OF CHAPTER THE THIRTIETH.

SOMETHING LIKE A FIRE.

WELL, you seem to have discharged the 'Whole Duty of Man,' according to John Murray," remarks a St. Petersburg friend to whom I have been retailing my experiences of the interior of Russia. "Is there anything left to add to the list?"

"Nothing that I can think of, unless it be a big fire."

"A big fire, eh? Why, you're worse than the rat that starved in the granary. I'm sure there have been fires enough this summer to give every tourist in Russia one for himself."

This statement, though rather "tall," can hardly be set down as a positive exaggeration. During the past summer Russia has been outdoing herself in fires, in a way astonishing even to those who remember the great conflagrations of 1862. All the journals have been teeming with fire after fire, to an extent which might lead a casual observer to conclude either that the Russians are in the habit of regaling themselves annually with a patriotic rehearsal of the burning of Moscow, or that the entire nation has attained the condition of the Chinese in Charles Lamb's incomparable "Essay on Roast Pig," among whom the only known method of cookery was by burning the entire premises. North, south, east, and west, the public at large appears to have been amusing itself by making a bonfire of everything that comes to hand, while the insurance companies of every degree are repenting in dust and ashes. One could hardly open a newspaper without seeing announced, in a careless off-hand summary of half a dozen lines, as a matter of no moment, the destruction by fire of "fifty houses," "one hundred and thirteen houses," "an entire street containing several public buildings." Hitherto, however, I have remained, like Gideon's fleece, dry amid abundance, not a single fire out of all this multitude having been obliging enough to come in my way; but it is decreed that this delay shall be atoned for by the spectacle of a conflagration worth all the rest put together.

One dreary September night, I had been sitting up late over the fifth volume of Count Tolstoi's "War and Peace," perhaps the best Russian historical novel ever written. I was just midway through the Borodino chapter, and had so thoroughly enjoyed the lifelike description of the great battle, that it was little wonder if it haunted me even in sleep. But I could hardly have slept more than an hour, when I was roused by a clamour that might have awakened a rural policeman, and, rushing to the window, found myself in the midst of a scene that almost realised the visions of battle upon which it had broken. Alarm-lights were hoisted upon the tower of the fire brigade station, which was next door to me; lamps were flitting about the courtyard; the trampling of horses and the rumble of wheels, mingled with the hoarse shouting of many voices, came echoing from below; and overhead, the whole sky was purple with the reflection of a fierce red glare that broke the darkness far away to the eastward. There could be no doubt of it, I had got my wish at last. I dressed myself as if "running it close" for morning chapel at Oxford, and was down-stairs and out of the house in a twinkling.

"Where is it?" ask I of one of the helmeted figures in grey frieze who are rushing about in front of the station.

"Tootchkoff Bridge," answers the man, and the next moment I am running at full speed towards the scene of action. There is no need to inquire further; at the mention of the Tootchkoff Bridge, I comprehend at once the whole extent of the catastrophe. The bridge in question crosses the Lesser Neva about half-way along the eastern shore of the island on which the Vasili-Ostroff suburb is built; and close to it, on the farther side of the river, lies an enormous hemp-wharf, containing four or five warehouses, and usually covered with piles of loose bales, in addition to the quantity stored within. Such a magazine of fuel, once fired, would make a blaze to startle all Petersburg; and, indeed, the whole neighbourhood is already in commotion. Heads are thrusting themselves out of windows; voices calling to each other; half-dressed figures running about the streets; and more than once, as I fly along, a fire-engine comes thundering past at full gallop, the brazen helmets of its men glancing redly in the fitful light. At length, as I turn the corner of the street leading to the Tootchkoff Bridge, the whole scene bursts upon me at once.

The entire front of the hemp-wharf is one sheet of dancing flame, which, tossed by the rising wind, swoops forward ever and anon as if to overleap the very river itself, casting out a heat which, even across the whole breadth of the stream, is wellnigh unendurable. Beneath the deepening glare, the river seems to run blood; the faces of the crowd, looking wan and ghastly beneath that infernal lustre, appear and vanish like phantoms; while, in the distant background, the tall lance-like tower of the great church of the citadel looms out through the rolling smoke like a threatening giant. Of the store-house in which the fire began nothing is left but a great heap of glowing embers, around which the flames rising from the loose hemp lap and surge like a whirlpool. A second warehouse is just bursting into a blaze, and the engines are working with might and main to save it, the long black line of the water-jet standing out against the flaming background like a bar sinister drawn athwart some gorgeous escutcheon. But all is in vain. The hemp within is already alight. The smoke deepens—thickens—reddens suddenly—and up through the roof leaps a great spout of fire, with a long rejoicing roar, accompanied by a sharp snapping like the report of a firework. The rafters crack and hiss in the blaze; the "chirr" of broken glass is heard from the upper windows; and right and left the fiery claws clutch at the adjoining timbers, till all is one broad flame, above and below.

Wilder and wilder grows the tumult. Engine after engine comes rattling up, goes thundering across the bridge into sudden darkness, and comes out again in the full glare of the fire—the faces of the men, and the very buttons on their uniform, standing out as clear as if under a microscope. What with the stifling heat, the fierce intensity of movement, and the deafening uproar, my battle-visions are more than realised. Every feature of the panorama—the hoarse words of command, the incessant play of the engines, the helmeted figures running and scrambling under the red glare, the crash of falling timbers, the masses of men looming shadow-like through the rolling smoke—is in grim harmony with the idea. It is the escalade of Badajoz over again!

As yet the great warehouse in the centre of the wharf has escaped unscathed, though environed on every side by a perfect wall of flame; but it has evidently not long to live now. Flakes of burning hemp fall upon it like rain, and a long jet of fire from the nearest of the blazing buildings keeps darting viciously out at it, in stroke after stroke, like the arm of a boxer. One blow, swifter and fiercer than the rest, at length gets well home; the dark mass is suddenly lit up from within, sparks and pieces of wood fly in all directions, and in a few seconds the whole building is in flames. And now the destruction has reached its height. From the head of the bridge to the furthest storehouse, the whole wharf is one great roaring blaze, the floating sparks of which shoot athwart the black sky overhead like the fiery rain of Dante's "Inferno;" and in its ghastly splendour, the whole length of the quay, the dark woods that cluster along the farther shore, and even the golden domes of the churches far away beyond the Great Neva, stand out in a weird unearthly picturesqueness.

At this moment—how or whence no man can tell—a fearful whisper runs through the crowd that there are men shut up in the great warehouse—probably stupified by the smoke, and unable to get out. The rumour speedily reaches the firemen, and the bare suggestion is enough to stimulate them to redoubled exertion. Half a dozen stalwart volunteers, with their clothes steeped in water to keep off the flames, dash into the glowing mass, flinging aside the half-consumed timbers with the strength of giants; but the stifling heat soon overpowers even them—they stagger, scorched and gasping, out of the furnace, and sink exhausted on the ground. One man actually plants a ladder against the burning building, and mounts it with the hose-pipe under his arm, in the hope of giving it a surer aim. For one moment he is seen outlined against the flaming background like a statue of bronze—and then an ill-aimed jet from one of the other engines strikes the brave fellow full on the body, and sweeps him like a feather into the very heart of the fire! Not a trace of him was ever seen again; and his very name is most probably unknown. Why should it not be? he was neither grandee nor general—

"Only an honest man Doing his duty ;"

and human life, like human labour, is cheap in Russia.

And so, through the long night, the fire roars and rages ; and when the day dawns upon it at last, there is but little left for the destroyer to feed on. Slowly and sullenly his rage dies away in hoarse growls and gaspings, and the silence of utter desolation now sinks upon that great wilderness of ruin.

While the fire raged, the indescribable magnificence of the spectacle made one half forget its horror, and the ruin which it entailed ; but in the grey of early morning, when the uproar and excitement are over, it is a dreary and hideous sight. Over the whole place broods a guilty silence, an air of hopelessness and lifelessness, a blank unseeing stare from the gaping windows, which makes one feel like the accomplice of some mysterious crime. The great warehouse, where the fire did its worst, is gutted from roof to basement ! only a few blackened beams, like the ribs of a skeleton, bridge the space between the smouldering walls. Overhead, the clear sky is blotted with creeping smoke ; while the ground is covered far and wide with half-consumed bales, mounds of singed hemp, masses of iron plating bent and twisted in every direction, charred planks and smoke-blackened rafters floating in pools of water ; and around the chaos stand groups of curious spectators, not noisy or excited, but with a cool scientific appreciation which seems to say, "We have seen the like often before, but it is always worth seeing again."

It needs little imagination to transform the whole scene into a great battle-field ; the blackened ruins of the contested entrenchment standing grimly up in front—the charred bales and broken planking strewn the ground like heaps of slain, amid which the strips of scarlet cloth show like trickling streams of blood—while the helmeted firemen who toil amid the chaos might well pass for the few survivors of the conquering army paying the last honours to their fallen brethren. And that nothing may be wanting to complete the tragedy, amid the thickest of the ruin lies a strange formless heap, oozing out a thick, white, nauseous smoke—a kind of unctuous, pitchy cinder, from which the most case-hardened veterans of the fire brigade avert their eyes in horror. There are five men missing this morning from the gang of the Tootchkoff Wharf, and this is all that is left of them !

Turning away in disgust, I suddenly come face to face with the Russian acquaintance mentioned at the opening of my story, who is surveying the dismal scene with the air of a connoisseur.

"Well," remarks he, with a quiet smile (he is a man who would make a joke upon anything), "one advantage of all this is, that after such a destruction of hemp it will be simply impossible for men of moderate means to hang themselves for some time to come !"

So goes the march of events. A catastrophe unparalleled within the memory of man, the destruction of three millions' worth of property, half a dozen men killed by the cruellest of all deaths—and all this is summed up in ten or twelve careless lines of print and the passing jest of a dilettante ! But the counter-observation of an old fireman who is working near us sends me away somewhat comforted.

"Poor fellows !" mutters the veteran, crossing himself, as he looks askance at the shapeless mass into which five living men have been melted down, "there's little enough left of them now, but God will know them when they come to Him."

THE FISHER'S WIFE.

HE fisher's wife she stood on the strand,
And watched him sail away ;
As she waved a last adieu with her hand,
He could hear her gently pray.
He heard her pray—for she would not weep
Till she saw his bark no more—
"God keep my fisher from harm, on the deep,
And send him safe to shore."

She prayed and wept, and the fisher was kept Secure on the storm-tossed wave ;
But she—ere he came back again, she slept
In a green and new-made grave !

None weeps for him now, but at times he seems,
When rocked in his bark by the storm,
To catch in his dreams faint shadowy gleams
Of a dear familiar form.

He sees her stand on the golden sand
That is washed by a crystal sea ;
And she beckons to him with a shining hand !
Ah, yes, it is surely she !
She watches for him, but she does not weep,
And he hears her pray once more—
"God keep my fisher from harm on the deep,
And bring him to this fair shore."

important business is as soon after the meeting of Parliament as will permit of a truthful calculation of the public income to the 5th of April, at which date the official year ends. In his statement the Chancellor compares the income and expenditure of the past year, estimates the probable receipts and payments of the coming year, and announces in what manner, if any, taxation is to be amended. He concludes by proposing to the Committee the renewal of those taxes which are annual, and, as such, cease at the close of the financial year. The great branches of the revenue, such as the Customs and Excise Duties, the Stamps and Assessed Taxes, the Land Tax, etc., are granted to the Crown perpetually, but the Income Tax must be re-imposed yearly by Parliament. The duty on tea, also, though an Excise Duty, is renewed annually, simply with the view of obviating the recurrence of a collision between the Lords and Commons on a point of privilege, which arose some years ago on this tax. The proposals contained in the Budget are fully discussed by the Committee of Ways and Means, which is thus enabled to forecast the financial operations of the year, and so judge whether more taxation is being imposed than the anticipated claims of the country will render necessary. If satisfied with the arrangements of the Chancellor, the Committee assents to the renewal of the expiring taxes, or to such modifications of, or additions to, the permanent taxes, as the necessities of the State demand.

The financial routine of the country, then, may thus be summed up. The Crown, in the Royal Speech, demands money; the House of Commons alone, by votes in Committee of Supply, authorises expenditure; Parliament, in Ways and Means Acts, provides the money to meet the expenditure; the Executive Government, acting under the authority of the Ways and Means Acts, applies the surplus of the Consolidated Fund, after provision has been made for prior charges, to the services thus voted in Committee of Supply. Each one of these processes has an importance in a constitutional point of view, while the system as a whole bears evident marks of the conflicting relations of the three estates of the realm, and of the struggle between them.

Thus the introduction of the Budget in Committee of Ways and Means, and the renewal or modification of the taxes consequent thereon, is in obedience to the great principle that all taxation without Parliamentary sanction is illegal. Again, the right of every member of the House of Commons to move amendments on going into Committee of Supply—a practice which has of late years been carried to such a pitch as seriously to embarrass the progress of business—is the modern form of the ancient constitutional privilege of making the granting of supplies to the Crown depend on redress of grievance. So with the Appropriation Act. As we have pointed out, the final grant of Ways and Means for the year is reserved for the Appropriation Act; so that although the House of Commons might, at an early period of the Session, have voted the whole of the supplies of the year, yet, by limiting the grants of Ways and Means to such an amount as is necessary to carry on public business, they can prevent an imperious minister from dissolving or proroguing Parliament. These are examples of the jealousy of the House of Commons in maintaining its privileges. On the other hand, proofs are not wanting of a corresponding recognition of the rights of the Crown. Thus no vote in Supply can be taken except in response to a message from the Throne, and Parliament is not at liberty to augment the grant beyond the sum that is demanded by the responsible ministers of the Sovereign.

Reverting now to the prior charges on the Consolidated Fund, we observe that the bulk of these charges, such as the interest of the debt, the Civil List, and the Pensions and Salaries, become due quarterly. Hence at the conclusion of each quarter there will be a considerable strain upon the resources of the fund. As a matter of fact, there is very frequently a deficiency at these periods. The question how to make good this deficiency adequately and economically is obviously a very important one. The plan at present pursued is this: At the close of the quarter, when the accounts of the funds are made up, the total amount due for the interest of the debt and the other charges is calculated, and the amount by which the balance in hand falls short of the charges upon it is ascertained. This deficiency is then made good by borrowing from the Bank of England, unless indeed the receipts accruing daily, as the revenue flows in, should render the loan unnecessary. Stringent precautions are laid down to regulate the relations between the Government and the Bank, so that the former should not be able by borrowing indiscriminately to escape the control and authority of the Legislature.

We come next to consider the question of a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure. Such a surplus may arise by the taxes yielding more than was expected, or by economy in expenditure; or, as has been the case of late years, by both of these causes operating together. There is some little confusion in the public mind as to the disposal of the surplus revenue in the Exchequer on the 31st of March in each year. Many people seem to think that this surplus is carried forward to the next year's account, and so enables the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reduce or abolish certain taxes. But this is not the case. Whatever surplus there is at the close of the financial year must, under Act of Parliament, be paid over to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, to be by them employed in the purchase of Consols or other stock, which is then cancelled.

To the extent, then, of such annual purchases the National Debt is reduced. But while the surplus revenue of the year is thus appropriated, it none the less serves to show what amount of taxes may be remitted. For if in the coming year the proposed expenditure will be no larger, and there is no reason to anticipate that the revenue will be less productive than in the year just closed, it follows that taxation may be reduced to the full extent of the surplus, and yet have enough to meet the demands on it.

And now, having seen how the Consolidated Fund is made up, how it is managed, and the measures taken to protect it, let us endeavour to see what becomes of it. What is the actual machinery by which the great total of taxation that flows into the Bank coffers day by day is distributed amongst the heterogeneous mass of claimants on John Bull's purse, whether the creditor be a holder of Consols, a Civil List pensioner, a private soldier, a dockyard employé, or a tradesman who has sold a coal-scuttle to a Government office.

The sums needed for the Interest on the debt are transferred quarterly by the Treasury from the Consolidated Fund, to the account at the Bank of England of the Public Dividends, on which account warrants or cheques are drawn by the Bank. Previously to 1845, the whole amount required for this purpose was transferred to the Bank on the first day of the quarter, thus swelling the private balance of the Bank, and to that extent impoverishing the Exchequer. This in turn necessitated loans from the Bank to make good the deficiency, with corresponding charges for interest. But in that year Mr. Gladstone altered this wasteful system, and, in spite of great opposition from the Bank, insisted upon transferring from day to day to the Bank such amounts only as were required to meet daily demands.

For the remaining charges upon the Consolidated Fund, for the Civil List, and for the Supply Services, the Paymaster-General acts as the Government banker. The army and navy votes are managed by the War Office and Admiralty respectively; the Consolidated Fund charges, directly by the Treasury; while each civil vote is controlled by a particular public department, called in reference thereto the Accounting Department, because it has to account to the Auditor-General, and through him to Parliament, for the due and legal application of the vote. Each Accounting Department issues orders on the Paymaster-General for the payments arising out of the vote under its management.

These Department orders are either for direct payments by the Paymaster-General to the person entitled to receive, or for advances of round sums to sub-accountants, such as revenue officers, army agents, dockyard paymasters, and others whose name is legion, who thus become accountable for its distribution amongst the actual recipients. The Paymaster-General applies daily to the Treasury for issues from the Exchequer, to enable him to meet the orders drawn upon him. The Treasury transfer the specified sums from the Consolidated Fund account at the Bank to the Paymaster-General's account, out of which the cheques of the latter are paid. The Accounting Departments submit annually to Parliament accounts showing the appropriation of the votes; and any questions that may arise thereon—such, for example, as an excess of expenditure beyond the Parliamentary grant—or any criticism of the Auditors, are submitted to a standing committee of the House of Commons, which is called the Public Money Committee.

A GREAT ROBBERY IN THE OLDEN TIMES.

It is a warm and pleasant afternoon this 17th of April, 1874, as we saunter down Whitehall on our way to Westminster Abbey. Past Downing Street, whose meagre proportions and secluded position are strangely unworthy of its historic fame; by the new Government offices, which make us wonder that King Street could have been endured so long; and we linger in the Sanctuary at the foot of Westminster Hospital. Assuredly, nowhere else in London is there such a marvellous variety of architectural beauty as may be witnessed here.

On our left, the Houses of Parliament, conspicuous for their ornate grace, contrasting not unpleasantly with the castellated outlines of Westminster Hall; on our right, the massive edifices of Victoria Street; before us, the elegant column raised by Westminster School to the memory of their comrades who fell in the Crimean War; and, towering in serene contempt above the stunted and ugly west front of St. Margaret's Church, like a monarch surrounded by ignoble courtiers, the Abbey itself, in hoary and majestic age.

The geologist, studying the features of this or that formation, will not unfrequently alight upon some monolith, brought there by glacial action ages ago, having nothing in common with the strata around it, an isolated memento of different climates and remote shores. And, contemplating this fragment, he may perchance be reminded of deposits more prolific in interest, and more responsive to research; and so, forgetting the immediate object of his study, may find himself absorbed in the dearer associations evoked by this relic of a far-distant past.

Similar effects are produced by Westminster Abbey. Around it are all the developments of nineteenth-century civilisation—the babbling Parliament, attempting always more than it can achieve, and doing indifferently well most of what it attempts; the hospital, worthy type of a benevolence at once sagacious and tender, fitted with every modern appliance for the amelioration of human suffering; the police court, insuring, without military interference, the maintenance of order and security, without which the complicated machinery of daily existence could not go on; and, surrounding and pervading all, the hum and bustle of active, practical, commercial life. And yet, to our minds, it seems that all these features of the scene lose their charm in presence of the associations which the Abbey recalls.

We turn gladly from contemplation of the present to the past—to those days when the piety of kings reared this venerable shrine—when the space on which we stand was indeed a Sanctuary—a place of asylum to criminals and vagrants. But, above all, our mind reverts to the long array of soldiers, statesmen, patriots, and ———“bards sublime,

Whose distant footsteps echo
Through the corridors of time,” while their ashes rest in the Abbey.

And now, quitting Broad Sanctuary, and winding round Dean's Yard, we enter the Cloisters. How vividly these black and crusted walls—in fit keeping with the chill and gloom which pervade the precinct—recall the austerities of that old monastic life! On these very stone benches, covered perchance with mats, did the novices con their lessons, under the eyes of the prior, or even of the abbot himself; on this very pavement, over which a few rushes were sprinkled, were the monks shaved and washed. Their dormitory extended over the eastern, and their refectory over the southern cloister. In this enclosure, in the centre of the quadrangle, they were buried. These windows were never glazed, and thus in a comfortless and often inclement atmosphere, the life of the ascetic brotherhood was passed. In this, the eastern cloister, we stop beneath an archway blacker and more hoary even than the surrounding walls. Through this passage, the stones of which are worn with the penances of many a penitent, we pass to the Chapter-house. Here, in old days, sate the abbot and other high officials of the Abbey. Here the business of the Chapter was conducted. At this pillar in the centre, which branches out to form an elegant roof, were the monks assembled to make confession of their sins, and receive flagellation! Here, too, for many a long year, met the House of Commons; and these walls have often resounded with the clamour of secular, as well as of religious debate. And thus were curiously linked, in their earlier history, two streams of life so diverse in their character, and so marvellously different in their destinies: the monastic life, inflexible and torpid, looking ever on the past, clinging to tradition, and destined to decay; the constitutional life, meagre at its commencement, but ever hopeful of the future, and vanquishing slowly but surely the pretensions alike of priest and king.

And now the afternoon service is concluded, and the clergy are passing from the Abbey into the Cloisters. With all the potent associations of the Cloisters clinging to us, we enter the nave. A crowd is gathered round a newly-dug grave. And to-morrow shall they lay there one who united in himself an unselfishness as great as any that the annals of monasticism have ever recorded, together with a practical sagacity which monasticism often lacked. And when David Livingstone shall have been buried here, there will be none here nobler than he—none who have done more to “wake this greedy age to noble deeds.”

In this nave, too, his epitaph is even now written. To his right, near the west front, sleeps Zachary Macaulay; and the felicitous sentences which tell of the “intense but quiet perseverance which no success could relax, and no reverse could subdue,” with which he too followed up the great aim of his life—the freedom of the slave—form a fitting inscription for the great missionary. Very clearly, as we stand by the grave, comes up the scene of his heroic and lonely death in that far-off land, the quiet “good morning” to his attendant, and then the fearless and resigned last sleep—

‘Take one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him,
And lies down to pleasant dreams.’

But we hasten to the scene of associations of a totally different kind—to memories in no way in harmony with the sacred nature of the edifice, or with the solemn repose that pervades the Cloisters. Passing up the nave, by Poets' Corner, through St. Faith's Chapel, we find ourselves once again in the vestibule of the Chapter house. In front of us is a door of great age, bound with iron clamps.

There are two other doors, also of massive thickness, in the cloister with which the vestibule communicates; and these three doors all open into a chamber, vaulted and dark, and supported by pillars of great solidity. This chamber, oldest probably of any of the Abbey precincts, is second to none in the wealth of the memories it evokes. Originally the private chapel of Edward the Confessor, it is now known as the Pyx Chapel, the most notable "treasure-house of mighty kings" in the realm—the old Treasury of England. Within, now-a-days, are kept the standard weights and measures.

But no stranger may lightly enter this gloomy chapel. That double door in the Cloisters, through which only admittance can be obtained, opens but to seven keys, some of them of great bulk, and all of portentous history. Hither, once a year, come the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Warden of the Standards, and other high officials, to carry out the Trial of the Pyx—in other words, the testing of the current coin of the realm by Government, as already described in a former number of this Magazine.

Here, formerly, were kept all the king's jewels, his wardrobes, and other valuables. Here, too, was deposited the royal revenue. The proceeds of aids and subsidies, of feudal rights and exactions of all sorts—the produce, in short, of the taxation of the kingdom—found their way ultimately into the Pyx Chamber. And what receptacle could be more secure than the Cloisters of the Abbey? what better plan could be devised than to entrust the monarch's revenue to the custody of men whose holy calling attested their superiority to temptation, and the permanence of whose abode insured ceaseless supervision? Moreover, the Abbey was a consecrated building, and, as such, possessed in the sacredness of its character and design, defences of quite as much value as the material bolts and bars which builder or smith might furnish. To plunder the king's money anywhere was bad enough; to plunder it from an abbey was a crime of no less gravity than sacrilege.

The Pyx Chamber, then, has played an important part in the financial history of this country. The solitude and gloom which surround it now, form a striking contrast to the bustle which pervaded its precincts when it was in daily use as the depository of the national revenue. We will, in imagination, let the centuries roll back as we stand in the Cloisters, till we reach the spring of the year 1303. Edward the First is king, and is engaged in war with Scotland.

King Edward's necessities have compelled him to resort to all sorts of modes, lawful and unlawful, to raise money. He has made his iron hand felt throughout the length and breadth of the realm. He has wrung from the clergy half their entire incomes; and when they have protested, he has outlawed them wholesale. In some parishes, bishop, priest, abbot, and monk have neither bed to lie on nor food to eat. He has seized all the wool and hides ready for shipping at the various ports; and when merchant, and burgher, and noble have made common cause against his rapacity, he has appealed to the patriotism of the mob. Standing on a platform in front of Westminster Hall, he has addressed the people. He grieves much, he says, for the heavy taxes he has had to levy on his dear subjects, but they were essential if he was to preserve them from the ravages of Wales, and France, and Scotland. And then tears steal down the royal visage, and he points affectionately towards his son; and the Archbishop of Canterbury weeps right loyally; and the assembled multitude rend the air with shouts of devotion. True, it turned out that those who had shouted most were not taxpayers; and the king had been obliged to confirm the Charter, and promise not to tax the nation without the sanction of Parliament. But the promise proved often a dead letter. And now (1303) a tax of the ninth lamb and the ninth fleece has been imposed. Every townsman must contribute a ninth part of the value of his movables.

The tax is being collected with great sternness. Each town has to contribute a specified sum, according to a valuation of property made some fifteen years before by Edward's orders. The sheriffs and their subordinates are bringing the proceeds of their collections day by day to the Exchequer. And then, after being counted on the chequered cloth from which the Exchequer derives its name, a tally is prepared and cleft, and the money passes into the custody of the Exchequer officials; and, at length, is brought by the Chamberlain, and placed in the coffers of the Pyx Chamber.

Now if any arrangements whatever of human devising could insure complete security against fraud, it would have been those in force in the old Exchequer. A long array of officials, a perfect catalogue of oaths, a most elaborate system of check and counter check, a minute record of every transaction, a staid and decorous mode of conducting business, which despised haste and forbade error, these were the characteristics of the Exchequer routine. But in this instance they failed lamentably.

The extraordinary wealth which was now in store in the Pyx Chamber, excited the cupidity of some of the monks. During the winter of the year 1302-3, a plot was matured for breaking into this chamber and plundering its contents. The ring-leaders of the conspiracy were Richard de Pudlicote, a monk; Adam de Warefield, the sacristan; and Alexander de Pershore, the sub-prior of the Abbey.

Their plans were laid with most remarkable care and forethought. Knowing that many of the valuables contained in the Pyx Chamber were bulky, and would not admit of removal to a great distance, they hit upon an ingenious expedient for concealing them near at hand. The enclosure inside the Cloisters, now grass-grown, was then used as a burial-ground. This enclosure they sowed with hemp, which, could in a few months attain such a height as to hide their booty. They introduced into the conspiracy one William le Feuere, porter of the King's Palace at Westminster, who was keeper of a house in the Fleet Prison, at which they met to concoct their schemes. Finally, they gained over the mason and the carpenter of the Abbey, so that they might have skilled assistance in the burglary.

Upwards of four months were spent in completing all necessary details. At length, in the first week of May, 1303, the attempt was carried into execution. In the dead of night, John the mason, and Adam the carpenter, broke through the wall of the crypt under the Chapter-house, which abuts on to the Pyx Chamber. Richard de Pudlicote and several accomplices entered, and forced the chests and other receptacles in which the jewels and money were stored. But the very magnitude of their booty perplexed the plunderers. Some of the more weighty articles were concealed in the hemp, others were secreted in the fields then surrounding the Abbey, or in a ditch which then ran round it, and on which there stood a mill (whence*the Millbank of to-day); while the smaller valuables, such as precious stones and rings, were hidden about the persons of the thieves. But although the robbery appears to have been free from interruption, still many articles of much worth, including the king's great crown and three other crowns, were left untouched.

On the whole, however, the plunder amounted in value to nearly two millions of money of the present day—a theft in those days of literally unrivalled magnitude.

The king was in Scotland when news of the robbery reached him. His indignation and chagrin knew no bounds. And indeed, in the circumstances wherein Edward was situated, the contempt for his authority which the crime indicated was only a degree less galling than the actual loss of the money. In order to raise the funds he required, he had had to humiliate himself before his subjects to an extent almost unheard of, and this robbery would render his humiliation useless. The Exchequer was simply beggared. However, no time was lost in tracing the culprits. Commissioners were forthwith appointed under Letters Patent, dated 6th June, 1303, with power to inquire into all the facts of the case, and to arrest and imprison all persons implicated.

The researches of the Commissioners rapidly produced fruit. The truth is, De Pudlicote and his fellow-conspirators, in order to dispose of the enormous mass of plunder, had been compelled to open up negotiations with nearly every goldsmith in the City of London. Hence, when once an investigation was set on foot, evidence was forthcoming on every side. In seventeen out of the eighteen wards into which the City was divided, some of the stolen property was found.

Witnesses came forward who had watched the mysterious meetings of the monks at Le Feuere's house; others had seen the furtive removal of large baskets by night from the Abbey to the King's Bridge, now Westminster Bridge; while Geryn le Lyndraper was proved to have received a share of the spoil from the monks, and to have hidden it in Saint Pancras Fields. All the evidence criminated De Pudlicote and De Warefield, and these, with a large number of monks and their friends, were committed to the Tower or to Newgate. At one time, it seems to have been thought that personages of higher rank were concerned in the robbery, for the abbot himself and forty-eight of his brethren were included in the indictment. Ultimately, Richard de Pudlicote and one of his confederates made a full confession of guilt.

Unfortunately, we have no information of the punishment of the thieves. They had, be it remembered, been guilty of sacrilege, a crime almost always punished with death. On this point it may be that the door of the Pyx Chapel, dumb and insensate though it be, can yet afford grim and ghastly testimony. In those good old times, it was customary to make a stern example of persons who had been found guilty of sacrilege. Pour encourager les autres, it used to be the practice to skin the culprit, and then, having tanned the skin to nail it over the door of the building which had been the scene of his unholy plunder. Now on the door of the Pyx Chapel, which communicates with the vestibule of the Chapter-house, there are, as we have stated, broad iron clamps. We pass our finger along the edge of the iron, and it encounters projecting fragments of a horny parchment-like substance.

These fragments have been carefully examined and are found to consist of human skin—the skin, too, of a fair-haired, ruddy-complexioned man.

On other doors in the Abbey precincts, similar fragments have been discovered. They have been said to be the skins of Danes, who were thus repaid some of the tortures they themselves inflicted.

But it may be that in this instance tradition is at fault, and that these fragments constitute the mortal remains of De Pudlicote, or some of his monkish confederates, who thus paid the stern penalty for the first and greatest robbery to which the British Exchequer was ever subjected.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.,

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-NINTH.

FOR HIS SAKE.

SHE was frightened at the mad impulse which stirred within her. Go away—where? She did not know. She might go down to the Norlan' Head, and resume the old life just as if there had been no marriage and no baby. But she could not do that, for Ailie, with her plain matter-of-fact way of viewing things, would seize her by the arm and drag her back to Drumliemount.

She was in a dazed state: thoughts quite confused, and uncontrollable: blood pulsing violently through her veins, and the sense of a big pain in her breast which would presently make her heart burst. But there was one leading thought which, like the air in a fantasia, although often apparently drowned by the loud notes of the variations, was always present, and was the theme and inspiration of all the rest. If she could only go away and hide herself somewhere, Walter would be free to think of Grace. If she were only out of the way, Dame Wishart would not hesitate to give the necessary assistance to Dalmahoy.

It was a foolish idea, but she was in a species of frenzy, in which she only saw that her presence there was the cause of infinite embarrassment to her husband, and would be the cause of ruin to his family. Love and pride combined to urge her to any sacrifice to serve them, and a childish ignorance of the world's ways made her fancy that she had only to go away, and all would be set right.

She was full of bitterness at thought of the quarrel with Walter; and her sufferings were all the more poignant because she was conscious that she had provoked it, and had taken the leading part in it. But he had not tried to save her from herself. If he had only spoken one kind word, if he had only crossed the room and kissed her, all her passion would have disappeared, and she would have been ready to lie down at his feet and die for his sake. But he had not spoken, although he must have known that it would have been the truest kindness to have done so. He could not care for her as he used to do, or he would have known that.

Kind acts are the crystals of affection, the beautiful tokens of love, which has no other visible presence. Clearly he did not care for her, or he would not have failed at this crisis to win her back to him by some kind act or word. Morbid meditations are a sort of waking nightmare; and with all the horrors of nightmare there came back to her just now the memory of that miserable assertion of the Laird, that Walter had believed her to be the heiress of George Methven when he asked her to be his wife. At that, Passion rose again, and she was ready to misinterpret his every action, from the day on which she had listened to his confession in the Witch's Bay till the present moment. But Love cried out; and although in the storm of Passion its voice was scarcely heard at first, the sound soon swelled, until it overcame all other sounds, and left her crying, only wishing that she could do anything—sacrifice anything to make him happy.

And she could sacrifice something—herself. She could go away, and that would remove every difficulty from his path.

"Oh, if my father would only come home!" she moaned again. "Maybe I could find him. Maybe he'll touch at Lerwick or Aberdeen, and I might meet him, and bring him back in time; or we could go away and never come back, and Walter would be happy."

There came a dreamy revival of the old yearning for the unknown something beyond the horizon of her life, and she got up slowly. Her eyes were dry now, and they had that expressionless inward look of one walking in sleep.

She went up-stairs, and put on her cloak and hat. She tied the strings very tightly. A slight cry from Baby's crib, and she stood like one petrified. Then she flew to his side and bent over him, feeling that here was a chain which held her fast to husband and home. Would she ever be able to break the chain? Could she go away, leaving the bairn for strange hands to nurse? leaving him to grow up to manhood without knowing his mother's face? Could she make this sacrifice, too, for Walter's sake!

Her heart was cruelly racked by the conflict of emotions; for Walter's sake she would go, for Baby's sake she must stay. She swayed to and fro above the child, now bent upon the one course, again upon the other. If Baby had only wakened, he would have conquered; but after that first little cry he had got the feeder in his mouth, and after a vigorous attack he dozed off again, without opening his eyes upon the yearning, troubled face of the mother bending over him. The openings to the right path and the wrong are divided only by such trifling accidents as this, the sleeping or the waking of a babe.

As she raised her head the room seemed to darken suddenly. It was only the candle which required snuffing, and the wick was spluttering in a ring of grease. But, with her nerves tense-strung, old childish superstitions possessed her; the shadows in the room assumed fateful forms; she looked at the candle with a dreamy eagerness to descry one of those tiny sparks on the burning wick, which were supposed to indicate coming messages of good or evil. She saw none.

She snuffed the candle, and in the bright flame which sprang up, her face appeared white and cold. There was a shadow on the brow, reflecting

If Grace had been selfish or unkind in any way, she could have endured everything; but the grand self-forgetful love of Grace shamed her, and made her feel that she had been mean and cruel. At moments she felt as if she hated Grace for her devotion; even the child turned to her with smiles of delight whenever she appeared. Next moment all the rage was against herself for the wickedness of her jealousy. She only thought that they would be very happy if she were away.

She moved towards the door, and then the the gloom and bitterness of her thoughts. How very bad she felt herself to be! how wickedly she had blundered, and blundered with her eyes open! If Walter had not told her about Grace, then she would have been able to feel that this misery had not been brought about by any act of her own. But he had told her everything, and she alone was to blame for it all. She ought to have known that it was selfishness which tempted her to say yes, when she should have said no. If she had only had a little pride, then she might have said no. But she loved him so very much that she could not turn away from him; and now it had come to pass that, even for his sake, she must go away.

mother's heart cried out again. She swayed a minute between the passionate yearning for her child, and the extravagant idea of self-sacrifice for Walter's sake, for the bairn's, and for Grace's sake, which was driving her to despair.

She wheeled round, dropped on her knees at the foot of the crib, her hands clutching the iron bars convulsively.

"Dear Father, which art in heaven . . . help me . . . teach me what I am to do, that they may be happy. Walter is very good and kind. . . . She is very true and noble. Dear Father, I have wronged them both very much. Help me to make them happy. I only want to make them happy, and I'll do anything that You will for their sake. . . I'm an awfully poor creature, but I dinna want to hurt anybody. Help me, then, and guide my steps so that there may be bright sunshiny days yet in store for them. You who see all hearts, look into mine, and see that I want everything for him and for the bonnie bairn You sent to me—nothing for myself. . . . Dear Lord, help me, and guide me."

She stayed a long time on her knees there, the past life and the many sad passages in it flitting through her mind; the wild act she meditated obtaining consistency and justification from the fancied regrets of her husband, and from her desire to do anything that might give him comfort.

She quite misunderstood him—misunderstood his words, his looks, and his sorrow—and she suffered accordingly. If he had only come up-stairs then! But he did not come; and she felt, in her rapid changes of humour, spiteful towards him that he could have left her in such distress without any effort to see her and to console her.

She got up, not daring to look at Baby, and went out of the room quickly. Down-stairs she halted at the door of his study. Her fingers trembled on the handle, and she listened. There was no sound. If he would only speak, only breathe her name—one word, and she would be saved. But he was silent.

She touched the door with her lips; then a passionate sob, and she ran out of the house.

He had heard the fingers on the handle: he had heard the sob, and yet he would not move. He remained with his eyes fixed upon a book, to the words of which they were utterly blind. His heart was very hard. She had been cruel to him—cruel to Grace; and his bitterest thought was that she had shown this cruel disposition when he most needed comfort, when he most craved for loving sympathy, which gives courage and strength. He would not move.

Yet a cold feeling of desolation crept over him as he heard the wind sighing wildly round the house, mingled with the distant roar of the sea. In the brief hush which occurred at intervals he heard that low piteous sob again, and he was filled with vague unrest.

Teenie was so fierce and impulsive, so reckless of herself, that when roused to passion such as he had seen her in to-night, God only knew what wild or silly act she might do. Then she was so generous—what pain she must be suffering!

He got up hastily and crossed the floor, halted at the door, turned slowly back towards his chair; wheeled round again, altered his mind once more, flung the book from him and sat down, pressing his hands as in a vice between his knees.

He would not go to her at present; he would leave her to think out the matter for herself, leave her to sleep off the fit of passion, and in the morning he would endeavour to show her how mistaken she was. She had gone to bed, no doubt; he would not disturb her this night.

He took up the book again, and applied himself to its perusal resolutely. His eyes wandered over the words; mechanically the leaves were turned—the mind grasped nothing. Impatiently he looked out half a sentence, then went on as before—Teenie, the quarrel, the vague fears, dancing like tiny silhouette figures before him, and not a word of the book was plain to him.

A door banged, and he started quite nervously. What a draught swept in, how cold it was, and how fiercely the wind blew! The air was full of strange voices, and the silhouettes became more frantic in their eerie dance.

His elbow on the arm of the chair, he rested his cheek on his knuckles. This was a bad preparation for the Sacrament Sabbath: to-morrow, Saturday; then the Sabbath. He had worked hard preparing the younger members of his flock for the Sacrament; he had given out the tokens, and he felt himself now to be the most unfit person to approach the tables. He made a stubborn effort to wrench his mind into a better form, and failed. It was Teenie who flitted before his eyes, disturbing him and rendering all thought, except of her, impossible.

He did not blame her much—he was full of sorrow on her account and his own. He had made her so miserable—she who had always been so happy, always like a gleam of sunshine, beautiful in herself, and a source of joy to others.

Whatever his frailties or errors might be, Walter was thoroughly honest in thought and intention, always more anxious to see the right of the other side in any argument than to justify himself. His love for her never changed. In all the troubles which had come upon them, he had never repented the marriage; his only regret was that she had to suffer with him, when he had hoped that their life would be so quiet and simple!

How terribly he had miscalculated his position, and the possibilities of happiness which it offered! Petty squabbles in connection with the kirk, disputes with the heritors and elders; the pitiful need of pence, in spite of the most niggardly economy, which was a torture to him, not because he had to exercise self-denial, but because he had to deny her so much, and because there were so many things he wished her to have. He writhed under this miserable necessity, thinking of her. How many bitter thoughts he had hidden from her; what agony he had suffered when her eyes had gazed wistfully at some woman's prize in a shop window—a bonnet, a shawl, or a jewel—which he could not give her. He knew all about covetousness and the wickedness of it, but such a very little money would have made her so happy! Self-denial is an admirable principle; economy is beautiful—in the abstract—but when one is obliged to practise it constantly, the heart becomes hard and miserly, or it suffers torture.

Then he saw so many people rich and mean, or rich and merry, never requiring to deny anything to those they loved, and apparently not a bit the worse for their wealth and self-indulgence; he sometimes trembled at the gloomy view he was inclined to take of the distribution of the elements of happiness. But it was never of himself he thought in this way—it was always in association with his wife. All their troubles descended to the bitterly mean level of a want of money.

He scorned himself for the miserable condition of mind into which he had fallen, when all the noble aims and hopes of life disappeared, and only the craving for money seemed to possess him—only money seemed to contain the charm which would bring back joy and peace to his heart.

"God forgive me," he groaned, "but money would have saved us, and I cannot help feeling that poverty has a sharp sting. Well, I shall not try to cheat myself by hiding my head in the sand. I accept the fortune that is given to me, and in my own suffering I shall learn much that will help me to help others. Earnest work must bring peace."

A brave resolution, and his thorough sincerity in making it seemed to lighten his heart of some of the gloom which lay so heavily upon it. He would turn his face to the future, and he would refuse to look backward.

She went out and ran down to the gate, flung it open, and stopped, listening. Was that Baby crying, or was Walter coming after her? No; just the wind blustering, and the sea dashing wrathfully against the rocks. Rain was beginning to fall in big drops.

She dragged herself away from the gate, and her steps were very heavy. She suddenly started into a run, as if she were eager to escape the temptation to return. He would follow, he would overtake her and bring her back, and she would be so overwhelmed with shame. She struck into a field in order to escape him. But she halted, for there seemed to be a cry from Baby which stayed her steps, and drew her back towards the house in spite of herself.

How dark it was, and how fiercely the wind blew! Then the vague terrors which darkness always suggests to the superstitious—robbers, ghosts, and warlocks—rose before her. What might not happen to her in that weird night? Above the din of the storm there was in her heart that faint baby's cry, now low and pitiful, again sharp and shrill, dragging her steps back when she would go forward. But she was going to save

Walter and his family; Dalmahoy was to be rescued from ruin, and Grace was to be made happy. So she would be very strong, and she would suffer anything for their dear sakes.

Then she would run again, looking back at intervals, and suddenly she came into collision with something. Her head came round quickly, and she could see in the uncertain light the broad cap of a man, his coat-tails and an armless sleeve fluttering furiously in the wind. Robbery and murder were the least of the horrors which this solitary encounter suggested to her mind.

She dropped on her knees before the figure, crying excitedly—

"I have no siller but a half-crown—I'll give you that, and it will do you no good to murder me."

She fumbled for her pocket to bring out the half-crown, but the man made no answer; and she trembled, for silence is always terrible when there is much at stake.

As she held up her piece of money, a broad flash of lightning crossed the landscape, and illumined the figure—the armless sleeve, the coat-tails and rags fluttering in the wind—and she gasped with the sense of relief she felt. She was kneeling in supplication to a "tattie doolie"—a scarecrow, an old coat and cap tied on to a stick—which she had mistaken for a man of the most villainous character.

She went on again, stumbling often, and trembling, not at the storm or darkness, but at the cry within her breast which blamed her for what she was doing. Every sigh of the wind seemed to give that cry words, and they called, "Come back, come back!"

But it was for their sake, and she would be brave. She would endure the pain. She would pass beyond that distant horizon-line, and lose herself in the mysterious beyond, or she would meet her father, and bring him back in time to save Dalmahoy from the auctioneer.

The night and the storm seemed to be in league against her, they interfered so much with her movements, misled her so often, and so often tried to turn her from her purpose. God help those who were at sea on such a night as this; and God help her, for she was at sea too, without compass, almost without hope, and in greater danger even than those whose lives were entrusted to the wind and waves.

She hurried along, still halting, and then running away from the temptation to turn back. She was going towards Aberdeen, as she hoped, where there was a possibility of learning something about the Christina. If not there, then at Peterhead. It was an utterly vague and uncertain chase, but she hoped for something, and she did not know what. All that was clear to her was that by going away she would leave Walter free to be happy, and that her absence or loss—would it be thought a loss?—

would induce Dame Wishart to help the Laird, and so help Walter. She was ready to sacrifice anything for that end—they never could know how much she was ready to suffer so that they might be happy—quite content if they would think of her sometimes kindly.

CHAPTER THE FORTIETH.

AFTER THE STORM.

A WHITE, wet morning, and a loud sobbing wind; the sea still rolling in high long waves, but with a slower movement than during the night, as if its fury were spent, and these were only the fitful upheavings of the subsiding passion. The sun shot great shafts of fire through the mist, dividing it into white streams, which slowly lifted from sea and shore, revealing the flashing waves, and rocks and trees and grass glittering with watery diamonds.

The wind penetrated the marrow of the bones with a chill, damp feeling. So Walter found when he stepped out of the house, and he buttoned up to the neck his black coat, which he had not changed since yesterday's visits to the parishioners. His face haggard and pale, his hand clutching a staff with nervous firmness. He found it necessary to grasp something, in order to help him to endure the pain and vexation caused by the discovery he had made.

Baby crying without any attempt being made to soothe him, Walter hurried up-stairs, his heart beating fast with fears to which he dared not give shape. He found that Teenie had not been in bed that night. Her hat and cloak gone; that was a relief; she had doubtless gone down to the Norlan Head, to spend the night with Ailie. He felt pained that she had done this, which would create such a scandal in the district; and vexed that she could have left Baby without any one to mind him. (He did not think that she had expected him to seek her long before this hour.)

But it was an intense relief to know where she was. He summoned the girl, Lizzie, to attend to Baby; then he put on his hat, took staff in hand, and set out with the intention of giving Teenie a good scolding for her ridiculous conduct. He never doubted that in her fit of passion, just to annoy him, she had gone off to her father's house, and he would find her there. He had hoped to meet her in the morning in a calmer mood, and ready to listen to kindly counsel and loving words; perhaps the violence of her action might render her the more willing to listen.

He knew nothing yet of the poor girl's wild scheme, or of the devotion and love which had driven her to sacrifice everything—child, home, name—for his sake!

He had only proceeded a little way down the road when he encountered Habbie Gowk, leading Beattie instead of bestriding him, and leaning heavily on his staff. Man and donkey looked more and more haggard and weary than the last time they had been seen.

"It's that fortune," growled Habbie, looking wistfully at his faithful companion; "even the brute-beast kens what a vexation of spirit it is, and is just dwining awa' like myself. But I'll pay that writer Currie out yet if he doesna get it for me!"

So, in pity for Beattie, he walked instead of riding. As soon as he saw Walter, he saluted him—

"Good morning, minister; I'm real glad to see you out already. I suppose you're going down to help the folk; they're in sare trouble, and I was just coming up to tell you. It's been a wild night, and a heap o' the boats were out; twa o' them have come hame keel upmaist and a' bashed. Red Sandy's was aye of them, and there's a wife with four bairns to sing wae's me for him. The salmon-stakes have been broken down, and there's nae saying what harm has been done. There's mony folk will feel the losses of last night as long's they live."

Walter felt that he was one of them, for he had lost the peace of his home. He glanced down towards Rowanden, and as the mist lifted from the shore, he saw women and bairns, old men, and a few of the younger ones who had been by some fortunate circumstance restrained from venturing out to sea during the night, moving about excitedly on the rocks and sands.

He understood what it meant, and he did not hesitate a moment; his own business must wait; his duty was to be down there amongst the afflicted people, striving to help them by words and acts, to save all who could be saved, and to comfort those who were mourning.

"Thank you, Habbie," he said. And he went off with long rapid strides, which soon left the poet and Beattie far behind him.

The boom of the sea rolled over the people as they rushed about in wild confusion, beating their hands against the air, striving to do something that might help those whom they loved, and yet bitterly conscious of their powerlessness. The cold green waves lashed the shore, and their retiring murmur seemed to mock the cries of pain of which they were the cause.

"Oh, minister! can you no help us?" cried Buckie Willie's wife, rushing up to him with dishevelled hair; "my man's out, and there's no sign of his boat yet. He was cankered when laid up with the rheumatics, but he was a guid man for a' that; and there's our bairns and his mither to fend for. Will not the Lord help us?"

"We must hope for the best and do our best," was the grave answer; "very likely your man has been obliged to put in at some other port, and you'll have news of him during the day."

"Maybe that's it, minister, I'll no doubt your word; but it's cauld and eerie waiting for the news." And the woman shuddered as she drew her children round her, the little ones staring in wonder at their mother's anguish, the eldest rushing about the beach, gathering scraps of wreck which were cast up by the water. Maybe the boy played with a bit of his dead father's tackle.

"It's been terrible work yon, sir," said Tak'-it-easy Davie, who with his usual luck had spent the night comfortably in bed; he nodded towards the sea as he spoke. "I'se warrant it'll take two or three thousand to replace the tackle that's been lost, to say nothing o' the lives and the fish. There's a heap o' fine salmon lying up there, but a' bashed and useless. It's been a bad night for fish and folk."

Walter assented to that practical view of matters, and passed on to a group standing near the edge of the water. There were several old men, a number of women, and, behind, white-headed half-dressed bairns, striving to get a glimpse of the something the elders were all bending over.

It was Red Sandy, who had been washed ashore, much cut by the rocks, and one of the men was covering the body with an old sail.

"We've done our best, sir," said Mysie Keith, as Walter approached and way was made for him (as usual, she had been first on the scene of trouble, and was supporting the head of the man); "but it's a' by, and there's no help for him in this world. Speak to his wife."

Mysie drew the sail over the face, and bade the men carry him up to his house.

She moved quietly away, to see where help might be most needed next.

The wife was standing dull and stupified, looking on; two children clinging in terror to her skirts; two others standing a little way off, pressing their knuckles into their eyes, crying, they did not know why, and wondering why "father" was lying there so quiet with all the folk gathered about him.

Walter took the woman by the arm, and gently led her away from the place as the men prepared to lift the body.

"You have a heavy sorrow to bear," said Walter; "but God will help you."

"He would need," muttered the woman, somewhat dourly; "there are four bairns to feed."

It was one of Walter's principles never to attempt to deny the apparently unmerited hardships with which people were often afflicted. He could not use the conventional phrases of consolation. He said outright, "Yes, it is bad—it is terrible, and the cries of agony are natural and necessary. But only have faith, and resignation will soon come. You must suffer, and you must cry; that is a relief. Have faith, and by-and-by you will find happiness; the suffering only endures a little while."

So he did not tell her that she must not grieve, but that she must try to get over her grief as quickly as possible for the sake of her bairns. Since it was His will to leave her their only guardian, she must endeavour to do her duty faithfully.

There was a simple earnestness in his manner, a sympathy in his low voice, which reached the woman's heart, and she was comforted a little; she would remember his words in a few days, and find strength in them.

But he had a difficult task to perform as he moved about from one to the other where there was a voice heard, lamentation and weeping and great mourning; Rachel weeping for her children, and refusing to be comforted, because they were not."

Suddenly there was a loud shout of joy. Three boats were seen in the distance beating towards the haven.

The shout of joy recalled Walter to his own anxiety; but he resolutely put it away from him; or rather he endured the pain, and went on steadily with his work.

"That's my man!" shrieked Muckle Jean Houston, almost rushing into the water; "I ken him by the newly-barked sail. He's safe, he's safe! the Lord be praised!"

She had been married only a few weeks, and she was frantic with joy at his escape.

"And that's my Donald, yonder!" cried old Meg Carnoustie, whose thin white hair floated in the wind; "that's my bairn; I ken by the white patch in the sail; I put it in wi' my ain hands. My bairn is safe! oh, God be thanked!"

The young wife and the aged mother were in their happiness selfishly indifferent to the agonies of those around them. They rushed to the farthest point of land, followed by others, to be ready to give any assistance that might be in their power.

"And yon is Gleyed Tam wi' the smack rig," said Peg Johnstone quietly, but with sufficient interest to warrant the suspicion that she felt a great deal more pleasure than she chose to display.

The boats tacked to windward of the Wrecker: the eyes of those who watched starting in the sockets, hands reached out, straining towards the men in eagerness to help. The water rushed up to the knees of the women and men who stood in front. The interest of all was concentrated for the moment upon the three boats, and personal affliction and fears were forgotten.

A sudden silence fell upon the crowd. Muckle Jean Houston's man, Donald Carnoustie, Gleyed Tam, and their crews seemed to represent all that the folk of Rowanden had at stake, although twenty boats had gone out.

They passed the Wrecker—a long breath of relief, that was almost a groan, escaped from the crowd. They crossed the bar and ran in shore safely. The boats were seized by eager hands and dragged up the beach before one of the crews could spring out. Then all the men were surrounded by friends; voices rose loud, joyful, and sad. The interest became again personal, and women and men shrieked out inquiries for the loved ones who had not returned. The boats had been separated by the storm; each had made for the port, which the skipper thought he had most chance of reaching; others had gone down in sight of their comrades, who were powerless to help them. All the gear and tackle of every description had been lost; but a portion of them might be recovered by the Government lugger which had put out for the fishing-ground to render what assistance might be in its power. A few boats would be picked up, and possibly one or two crews who had managed to beat about and keep their crafts afloat; others would be heard of from different stations; but the losses would be heavy in any case.

Gloved Tam, the water dripping from him and forming a pool round his feet whenever he halted, made his way to Mysie Keith.

"For God's sake, Mysie," he said hoarsely—and the ugliness of his face did not mar its expression of deep sorrow, and of humble gratitude for his own escape—"speak to Buckie Willie's wife. She's standing yonder wi' the bairns, saying never a word when a' the folk are clattering. Try and cheer her—she kens that he was next to me when we gaed out."

"And is he no to come hame?"

"No; his boat capsized no three yards from me. I could not do anything. I saw him in the water holding up his laddie, Jock, in his arms, and fechtin' wi' the waves to save the loon. He held him up when he was going down himself. He was making for our boat, and I watched to get hold o' him. He was gey near us too; but the laddie couldn't swim like his father; and I just heard Buckie. 'It's God's will,' and there was a big wave, and I never saw them again. Try and cheer her, puir sowl; tell her that she'll no want as long as I ha'e a bite to share wi' her and the bairns."

Mysie bowed her head and went over to the woman, to discharge the task for which her own suffering qualified her. She took the youngest bairn in her arms; bade the other children follow; then she seized the dumb woman by the arm and led her up to the trim cottage. The kettle was hanging over the fire—placed a link lower on the chain before she had gone out, so that it might be ready on her return from that sad quest which had no end and no comfort for herself, save that she could comfort others. She made tea for the widow; and presently, without a word spoken, the woman comprehended that she had lost her husband and her eldest born.

On the beach at Rowanden there were women who had been, during the night, deprived of husband and children, children who were now fatherless and old men whose mainstays in life had been taken from them.

And Walter worked earnestly amongst them—speaking to each those homely words of comfort and hope which seem so commonplace and dull to us when we are well and happy, but are full of sympathetic meaning and consolation when we are in sorrow. All his own troubles were forgotten, and when remembered they seemed to be insignificant in view of the despair which he encountered here amongst his parishioners. So he worked, devotedly and lovingly, and many hearts were lightened, many vicious thoughts corrected by his words and acts of simple kindness. Some who would have been ready to "curse God and die," were softened and helped to bear their burden.

Ailie came down from the Norlan' Head to see what was going on, and to do what she could for the sufferers. Walter saw her, and the storm in his home came back to him. He could not restrain himself—he ran towards her with the breathless question—

"Did Teenie send you for me?"

"Teenie—I have not seen her since yesterday forenoon!"

Not seen her?—was she not with you last night?

"Wi' me?—no; what gars you spier such a ridiculous question. She was at hame."

He stood dumbstricken, his hands clapped bewildered and stupefied.

END OF CHAPTER THE FORTIETH.

AN AUSTRALIAN FRIEND.

BETWEEN the years 1792 and 1799, two very peculiar and hitherto unknown animals were added to the lists of naturalists. In the first-mentioned year the Echidna, or Porcupine Ant-eater, of Australia and Van Diemen's Land, was described by Dr. Shaw, a naturalist of some repute; and in 1799 a still more curious and extraordinary form, belonging to the same group as the Felidna, was brought under the notice of the scientific world by the same naturalist. This latter animal was at first named the Platypus, and from its singular conformation and strange structure, it at once received the earnest attention of zoologists both at home and abroad. A creature resembling an otter in size and in general appearance; its body covered with a short fur of brownish hue; its tail broad and

 Are rippling to the west,
 And the chime from Saint Roche's belfry
 Dies on the ocean's breast ;
 And the dimpled waves are rocking
 The fishers' barques to rest.

"Babette ! Babette !" the mother calls,
 Far up above the strand,
 "Bring in your father's nets, my child,
 And lend your little hand
 To turn the wheel ; nor linger there
 So long upon the sand.

The sun is sinking to the sea
In crimson robes and gold ;
A chilly breath the ocean stirs,
And roughs her ringlet's gold.
It feels to her like a farewell kiss
From lips now dead and cold.

The yellow light is on the wall,
The sea-wall old and grey,
With weed and lichen mantled all
In sober-hued array.
The children on the pier above
Are laughing in their play.

The quaint, old, red-roofed, clustered town
Looks downward on the wave :
That sea from which her wistful eye
Some answer seems to crave :
That sea which took her love away
And gave him back a grave.

Oh, eyes that once so lightly laughed !
Oh, sad, sweet lips apart !
Once crushed with passionate kisses when

He held her on his heart,
That day she stood this wall beneath
To see her lover start ;

To say again the last " God speed,"
And wave her kerchief white,
And smile in hope—Ah ! God, who raised
Those breakers wild and white,
And bade the tempests to arise
And rage that livelong night,

And smote the little quiv'ring barque,
And tore the planks in twain—
Deal gently with the broken heart
Of her who all in vain
Poured out her soul in fervent prayer
Her love to see again.

Nay, not in vain ! The morning dawned,
The sunshine glittered fair,
And bathed in light a battered corpse,
A gleam of golden hair—
God only heard the cry of her
Who found him lying there

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE SIXTH.

EVERY new feature of life which I detected while among these frightful robbers, I looked furtively around me to see whether or not some other European might be mixing in our society unawares. My transport, my happiness had no bounds ; and the reader will comprehend me, that one incited by so immoderate an ambition as I was, thinks least—and for his own good—of fear, death, or repentance for having dared so far.

I am bound to communicate it to you in a straight manner, that it was just the reverse in my case. My abode among the tents of the Turkomans, the success which I enjoyed playing my part among these wild, but in truth simple children of nature, heated my fancy sometimes to boiling point ; and being just now in the chapter of confessions, I will try to amuse my readers with the narration of an episode, whose carrying out then appeared to me by no means supernatural, but now would appear to most, even to myself, comical.

I stood in the zenith of my authority, of my dignity as saint, come from the distant Rum (the West). Young and old hurried to me, to receive my blessing, to accept my holy and sanctifying breath ; when one day a greybeard, grown old with robbing and murder, approached me with modest steps, and in full earnest made to me the following proposition :—

"Sheikim" (My Sheick), said he, "how would it please you, if at the head of a numerous alaman" (predatory expedition, or raid) "we, under thy blessed leadership, could invade with a mighty force the land of the heretic Shiites ? I promise to you five thousand lances. Heroes of iron and fiery steeds can effect much, under the protection and with the help of God."

And probably my reader thinks I took the proposal with a jocular smile as it deserved. Very differently did his offer affect me. The words of the grey Turkoman wolf awakened within me some enthusiasm. I took the unparalleled anarchy of the Persian army into account, considered the cowardice of the Persian soldiery and their uncontrollable fear at the shadow even of a Turkoman horseman ; and as I knew as well, on the other hand, the mad impetuosity, the love of spoil, and the fanaticism of the Turkomans, these ideas passed like lightning through my brain : "Think, what could be the consequences of your carrying out such a romantic scheme ? Commencing from Shahrud the Persian boundary is open. Five thousand Turkomans would prove a match at any time for double that amount of Persians. And where could the Shah amass in a hurry ten thousand soldiers ? In Teheran I should meet with some adventurous Italian and French officers, who might join my expedition. Anyway a stroke against the capital could be carried out effectually, nor is it impossible that by such good luck I might—though but for a few days—be placed on the throne of Persia.” I forgot one essential condition of success, that five thousand Turkomans are not so easily united by discipline ; or, to speak correctly, the thought flashed across my mind, but I did not listen to it.

My heated fancy roamed wild over the history of the Middle Ages, when the leaders of freebands could achieve similar projects. The dream of the Persian throne and sceptre hovered several nights over the dreams of the poor and ragged dervish.

How altered are my views this moment, by climate, circumstances, and experience ! It is well to sacrifice one's vanity for the guidance of others, who also, within the influence of unaccustomed natural circumstances, might be exposed to similar temptation next to aberration. I wish also to show how unexpected success can incite, delude, torment into spasmodic affections an over-excited imagination.

In Asia the furthest extremes meet, and the most incredible contrasts in the world may be found standing in closest juxtaposition. While some of the Asiatics in humble awe stared in my face, and admired me like a demigod, there were others amongst them—and not a few—who, led less by experience or by the study of my strange facial expression, but simply induced by the romantic fanaticism of their mind, and by love for anything mysterious, arrived at the most curious, sometimes most dangerous conceptions of my insignificant enough personal worth. They saw in me now a sorcerer, who had supernatural powers at his command ; again an ambassador of the Ottoman Emperor, who sent aid in shape of invisible treasures to the Islam ill-used by extortions on the banks of the Jaxartes ; there were some who saw in me a bewitched prince ; and all approached me fearlessly, to clear, by my answering their most bizarre questions, their respective points of surmise as to my person.

What could I do in a similar position save offer unconcerned ease and icy indifference to all ? And as this questioning was daily repeated, I soon got schooled into my logical strategy, and hid without effort, by an assumed countenance, the secret workings of my soul. When finally earnest suspicions arose as to my European descent, and as to the secret mission of my voyage, these found my nerves already sufficiently steeled, that no outer sign could betray the struggle within.

After a lapse of four weeks from the assumption of my dangerous incognito, I was not able to blush. I had occasion to assure myself of the truth of this by a psychological experiment. I could sit still like a statue, without more than moving my lips as in quiet prayer, while people stationed opposite to me carried on the following conversation :—

“ I bet this is a Russian spy, who traces with pencil all our mountains and dales, our rivers and sources, into his secret pocketbook, to enable the Russians at some future time to enter our land without guides, and then steal our cattle and children. I hope in Khiva Government will know how to use the ready rack, and under the application of the red-hot iron it will soon be found out of what metal he be.”

It was no small matter to me, though I mastered the art, not to move a muscle of my face, not to stir my eye, that mirror of the soul, most easily betraying its emotions, on hearing of the above not over-pleasant prospects.

A celebrated sovereign of his day may have been right in saying of me, that an excellent actor was lost in my person, for I had all the talents of one. But in Persia I was aided by the practical success imparted by continued practice and experience, which indeed whenever required can do wonders.

In like manner must the absence of fear of death under constant danger of detection, that would have been followed by destruction, be judged. In the commencement the interest of novelty deadened such fear within me. But when nature's tortures—sand-storms in the desert, excruciating thirst—awakened fear of destruction and starvation, and especially during the continuance of suspicions aimed at me, and the everlasting want of confidence displayed by the Central Asiatic tyrant, then indeed the pale phantom of the fear of death could not be any longer exorcised.

When on my wanderings across the Hyrcanian Steppe, in the glowing atmosphere of noon, the fata morgana with tender vibrations danced in my sight, and my comrades in the fanciful atmospheric reflection perceived rich meadows, surrounded by charming castles, and bubbling sources, and again in another direction the picture of fighting Uzbeks, fettered Persian slaves, and filled jewel-boxes—there my eyes detected but grim torturing appliances, omens of my own likely fate. I saw there people hung up by their legs, flayed alive, and other brain-racking fancies of cruel treatment ; and, by way of contrast, a distant view of Constantinople mocked me, and the dim outlines of European social scenery.

The fear of death is certainly one of the most harassing beasts, which grins at us, showing us its teeth with maddening awfulness. But time, the panacean balm to all evil, and accustomedness take the dread even from this by its getting familiar to us ; the evil keeps its form of a monster, but void of flesh and blood, by experience harmless except by self-torturing, a phantom of air, or a monster hewn in stone, it finally ceases to awake dread within us.

It was thus face to face with me for months. As may be easily imagined, death threatened me from two quarters: by the inhospitable nature of the soil and climate, and by the malice of men. That of these two the former appeared less grim, though also irreconcilable, the reader may well believe.

The sufferings during my tour as a dervish, in the shape of privation in food, dress, and cleanliness, appear to myself even at present superhuman. I had for weeks to eat black unleavened bread, baked in the burnt ashes of camel-dung—bread refused even by my camel. I drank foul bitter-salt water, whose odour alone sufficed to turn the European sick. I waded for hours beneath a burning sun in the deep sand, with dry throat and cracked lips. I ran the risk of being buried in the hot sand-rain. When near dying of thirst, in the desert of Khal-Ata, I wished death to end all my agonies. And yet the fear of death was not imminent under all these circumstances, as it was during my persevering struggle against the doubts, suspicions, treachery, and malice of men.

The terrors of nature, however fraught with danger, pass away at times, encouraging us thus, and we enjoy rest. But the malice of men never tires, it is restless, never ceases at day or night, knows no mercy or pity. That I came forth as conqueror from out such struggles, and escaped its vile snares—may the reader forgive my seeming want of modesty—I consider my own merit. The preceding theoretical studies of the Islam, my experience in literature, in the habits and customs of several different Mohammedan tribes, and finally my exercise in the different Turkish dialects, were mighty levers for the removal of great difficulties. What I did not provide against, but what deadened my nerves to the utmost, were the several single difficulties of changing circumstances of daily life, appearing small to the view, but the performance of which proved hardest to me.

I had, as a main duty, to get the mastery over every single muscle of my face, so as to hide every trace of especial attention, excitement, curiosity, astonishment, which would have betrayed me in a moment among these acute-witted, sharp-eyed, primitive sons of nature. I had to be careful during conversation, meals, or while walking, not to use gesticulations which would appear foreign to a thorough Asiatic. And when I once was told that I spoke in my sleep a foreign language, I was careful ever after not to take any supper late at night, to prevent the recurrence of a nightmare, or heavy sleep and lively dreams.

How far I had done myself violence during this process of assimilation, and how far I succeeded, all this astonishes myself. Especially, I remember often the day on which we reached the goal of our destination, the grave of Bahe-ed-dins, near Bokhara. I stood with my fellow-travellers from eight o'clock in the morning till late at night before the resting-place of this arch-saint of Turkestan. They prayed and sang, howled, sobbed, and wept bitter tears; and how I could weep for hours in company, and how I could open such fountains of tears without any inner emotion, that is a riddle to me to this very day.

During religious discussions, to cut a long pious face at every formula of sorcery and imparting of what they considered my sanctifying breath, so to assume a superlatively mysterious face, is indeed, as shown by European experience, where such parts of incognito are played in Western lands over the whole tenure of life, nothing particularly difficult. But tears provoked by mere imitation, flowing for hours, that can be effected only by the command of a powerful necessity in a struggle for endangered existence.

Of a similar nature were my emotions when placed face to face with the tyrants of Central Asia—namely, with the Khan of Khiva, the Emir of Bokhara, and their zealous, slavish, and ever-ready masters of torture. I was received, as seen in my books of travel, at all these places with the utmost suspicion and doubt. They searched and pondered, they gave themselves every trouble to detect what part I did not dare to play but masterly concealed. And the fear of the termination of all this made me nervous. My tongue, my peculiar self-mastery, could for some time ward off every inimical cut of distrust, with some skill. I thought already of being in safety, when my ethnographical betrayer, my still European physiognomy, though hidden under a very crust of dirt, renewed their doubts, and endangered the fortunate result. In the first moments of my audience, all my senses were so tightly strung, I was so occupied with the regular carrying out of my part, that I could not even think of my original individuality, and thus I took very little notice of all that went on before me. When the first moments of the life-endangering comedy were over, and I came to the persuasion that the princes in question, together with their surrounding suite, were wrapped in the thick veil of deception, then I raised myself indeed on my "Kothurnus," looked proudly around, and could not keep off the thought how dreadfully and how soon my end would follow, had but one of the ruffians surrounding me the slightest suspicion of my real character.

The above-mentioned scenes were, so to speak, but pauses of the most dangerous drama, for I had soon to apply all my levers to raise these audiences, which were vouchsafed for my dismissal, into benevolent and gracious receptions.

These inquisitorial scenes were most severe and most frequent in Bokhara, the seat of the craftiest knavery. Though the then highest official of the Emir, in his subsequent conversation with the Russian, as was told, said to State-Counsellor Langenau how he detected instantly the dervish, and how he spared him only on account of his rich scientific proficiency, and high religious lore, I cannot help doubting it. He might have had suspicions, but he was in want of a main point for condemning me and giving me over to destruction. Had I committed but the slightest error in the explanation of one or the other law of religion, I am sure my kind readers would never have had to read this outline of my autobiography.

But it is time that I should terminate this prolix recital of my difficulties and struggles on account of my played incognito. I have to mention how even my steeled nerves got at last unstrung, and my bodily constitution, formerly full of health—yet not of stone or granite—had to give way. Possibly this relaxation allows me to look back with complacency to the gained experiences of my travel, and hence I may over-value them. I did not yet dare to continue my game at Samarkand, and gave up my original plan of following up the line towards China to Peking, and I decided to return to Persia.

As I had to separate here from my companions, I cannot refrain from giving them my due acknowledgment in a few words. Mr. Chanikoff told me once the trick had succeeded because there had been no Bokharite among my companions. The learned man was to a certain extent right, because with the exception of a Tadshik from Khodshend, who lived for years at Bokhara, and who beset me often very hard, my other companions, for the most part natives of Khokand and Kashgar, showed me only friendship, love, and truly brotherly protection. That under such circumstances my taking leave of them must have been painful, and left for days a bleak emotion behind, is easily understood. I had, since my return, time to send some words of thanks to Hadshi Bilal, my captain.

The good man lives now at Mecca, where he intends to end his days, and has remembered me since by a few lines of friendly communication. When he was told he had lavished his kindness on me, a sham Moslem, the old man laughed, and replied, "I know Reshid Efendi too well; he is just now in Europe, where he plays his part of a sham Christian, but finally he shall yet be saved for heaven."

UP AND DOWN THE STREETS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "EPISODES IN AN OBSCURE LIFE."

"PARSON," THE CROSSING-SWEEPER.

For any one wants to realise, as the phrase goes, the little army of crossing-sweepers we have in London, let him take a walk—say for a mile or two—on a muddy day, and give a penny to every one who touches hat, makes a bob, as if shutting up like a spy-glass, or trots after him, trailing broom in one hand, and tugging at tangled forelock with the other. I remember when it would have cost any one, disposed to give in this way, between a shilling and eighteenpence to walk from the Archway Tavern, Highgate Hill, to Highbury Cock and back. For any one of a squeezable temperament, therefore, it was decidedly cheaper to take the 'bus.

It is simply as a statistical experiment, just for once in a way, that I recommend this penny-giving. It would be a great misfortune if all crossing-sweepers had pennies given them indiscriminately. I would not make a clean sweep of the sweepers, but I should like to see their ranks thinned considerably—viz., by the elimination of the adults who are able, and the young who might be trained, to do something better than what, in the most favourable instances, is little better than a make-believe of work, as a pretext for begging, either directly or by suggestion.

Still, there are people for whom crossing-sweeping seems to have been provided as an occupation by "pre-established harmony"—cripples, and old men and women, shrivelled like dry wrinkled apples, who are just strong enough to give the public that real convenience, a clean crossing, and who at the same time, tottering and shivering day after day at the same post, have a chance of attracting substantial sympathy from which they would be shut out if they burrowed all day in the holes to which they retire at night to hide. I do not happen to remember what is the dictum on such cases of our self-constituted charity conscience, the Organisation Society. It seems to me, however, that alms-giving, regular or occasional, to these poor people, can scarcely be called demoralising. They shrink from the degradation as well as the dreary confinement of the workhouse—try to fancy, at any rate, that they are working for their living. After all, the chance coppers and the little allowances they receive do not come to much. In bygone days, one or two crossing-sweepers may perhaps have died in possession of considerable sums. I am inclined to believe, however, that even in these cases the amount has been exaggerated. Mnemosynal is very different from optical perspective. Things of the past loom larger than they were. At any rate, crossing-sweepers of the present day leave no wills. If they did, the amounts under which the personalty would have to be sworn would be comico-pathetic.

"Parson"—so called from the long, shabby, loose, once-black frock-coat he wore, so long that the tails, which mischievous street-boys were very fond of pulling on the sly, swept the ground like a lady's train—was a short squat old man, with a wooden leg. His hair was the colour of an unwashed frosted carrot—the little of it that could be seen peeping from the dustman's fantail, reaching almost to his waist, with which he nearly extinguished his monkey-like face. At least, it was monkey-like in its wrinkles and its fun, but there was not a trace of monkey-malice in it. A more civil, obliging little fellow than Parson there could not be. He would hop off on little errands for people from whom he expected, and got, no fee. The impish street-boys were the only persons who seemed able to sour greatly Parson's milk of human kindness. The police and the omnibus-men, the news-vendors and the miscellaneous loungers hanging about the inn in front of which Parson's crossing, or rather crossings, stretched, did their best to protect the old fellow, and soundly cuffed his persecutors when they chanced to run their way; but, nevertheless, he was shamefully tormented.

"Little pot, soon hot," says the proverb. That was not the case with Parson; but even he could not always keep his wrath from boiling over, and when wrought up to that pitch of exasperation, he would proceed to take the law into his own hands. Brandishing his broom like a broadsword, he made fierce dot-and-go-one charges on the foe. Sometimes the poor little fellow tripped, and when he had picked himself up out of the mud, was obliged to slink back discomfited to his crossing before a hostile chorus of derisive laughter. At other times, perhaps, he succeeded in mowing down a straggler in the rear of the retreating enemy. Generally, however, they escaped scot-free. Occasionally, when the old man saw that they were getting beyond his reach, he would hurl his broom after them like a javelin; a young varlet would snatch it up, and then poor Parson had to begin another weary dot-and-go-one chase.

On a foggy night, the old man was run over, breaking three or four of his ribs. Whilst he was laid up, I heard him relate his history.

"I'm a native o' Whitechapel," he said; "Goodman's Fields is where I was born an' bred—sich breedin' as I hever 'ad, an' that worn't much.

Peter's my name. I s'pose I must 'ave another somewheres, but that's the on'y name I hever went by, 'cept Parson, which them howdacious boys calls me. No, I can't say whether it's surname or chris'n name. Bless your 'cart, I was never chris'ned. Father an' mother couldn't spare time for thinx like that. Father's name worn't Peter. I'd a uncle lived at Barking, an' they called him Peter. In the barge line, or the fishin' line, he were—I can't recollect which on 'em it was. Mother made hout as he was a-goin' to do summut for me, on'y he didn't, 'cept give me a clout on the 'ead one day. That was the on'y time I hever see him, an' that's all I hever got from Uncle Peter. An' 'tworn't much I hever got from anybody helse. Father worked at the docks, when he could git work, an' worn't too drunk to do it, an' that worn't allus.

"It's 'ard work, ye see, for a woman to keep on lovin' a man when he can't give her a gownd to her back, an' blackens 'er heyes as ofen as he gits drunk. Father were a decentish sort o' man when he worn't on the drink, but anythink he'd do—beg, borrow, or steal—to git 'old o' drink, an' when it were hinside on 'im he were jest a brute; an' mother worn't much better. There was two younguns—an' that was two too many—me an' Poll. I was wery fond o' Poll, an' so she were o' me, though you mightn't think it to look at me. I never were a beauty; I s'pose it was becous we used both on us to git drubbed. Many an' many's the time we haint 'ad a bit to heat all day, 'cept it was some rubbish we'd picked up in the markit. Sometimes a-Sundays, when it was cold, we went to church—Whitechapel Church—in the heavenink, jest to git a warm. Leastways, that's what I went for, but Poll was diff'rent from me. She liked to 'ear what the parson said. No, the parson never took no notice on us. P'raps he would if he'd a-seen us, but he didn't. They say he was good to poor folks.

"'Tworn't ofen we went. The people looked as if we 'adn't any right to. Pull in their clothes, they would, as if we'd give 'em ty'us fever. That ain't pleasant. I ought to be pretty well used to it by this time, but I ain't. An' some o' them as gives themselves sich hairs is no sich great shakes arter all. It's them as is the wust. I've been spoke to a deal kinder by them as was real gentlefolks than by them as wasn't much better than me, excep' they'd got better clothes; an' yet they've talked as if I was the dirt beneath their feet. A swell knows he's a swell, an' don't mind who he's seen a-talkin' to, but them stuck-up people don't know what they are. They want to be summut, and can't. I s'pose they thinks, if they speaks civil to me, folks 'll think I'm their father; an' p'raps he worn't no better. But there, what's the good o' makin' a fuss about sich nonsense? What do it matter? It'll be all the same a 'underd 'ears to come.

"Mostly we went to the Lane a-Sundays, Poll an' me. The shops was all hopen, an' there's sich a crowd o' people. It was livelier than where the shops was 'shut, an' now an' ag'in we'd git a bit o' fried fish give us, or the like o' that. The Jews 'as a name for bein' 'ard at a barg'in, but some on 'em is very good to poor folks, 'specially kids. They're oncommon fond o' their own, an' so I s'pose they don't like to see 't'others a-starvin'. No, I never stole nuffink. I should, though, if it 'adn't a-been for Poll. When yer inside's as hempty as a drum, it's 'ard work to see thinx layin' houtside the shops as you could heat, or sell to git summut to heat, an' keep yer 'ands off 'em. It's heasy for ye to git rid o' a'most anythink you like to steal—find's their word—down Whitechapel way. One day I'd cotched 'old on a bit o' bacon that was put out with a ticket on it at a shop in Whitechapel High Street, but Poll snatched it hout o' my 'ands an' put it back. There was a long feller with a apron down to his toes, watchin' an' shoutin', 'Buy, buy, buy!' houtside, but his back was turned. Jest then, though, he looked round. 'Lucky for you, you did,' says he to Poll, an' he shammed as if he was a-goin' to ketch us, an' off we went like a fire-engine. But it wasn't as she was afraid o' bein' nabbed that made 'er put it back. It's wonderful 'owever she picked it hup, for she'd never been larnt nuffink good, 'cept the little bit she'd 'eared at church; but she'd a notion as she should like to do thinx on the square, so as she might git to 'eaven; an' she wanted to keep me straight, too, for says she, 'Peter,' she says, 'I shouldn't like, if I was to git into the good place, an' they was to shut the door in yer face.'

"She's been there, if anybody is, many an' many a 'ear, pore gal. I was oncommon cut up when she died, but I'm glad now, for she was a pretty gal, an' a pretty face is a cuss to a pore gal like her. She'd ha' been sure to come to grief, though she was so good. It was becos she 'adn't enough to heat—that's 'ow pore little Poll come to die. The parish buried 'er, in course—there worn't no velvet palls an' feathers. She was put into the coffin, an' a chap carried 'er under 'is harm jest as if she was a parcel. She worn't much to carry, for she were pretty nigh next to nuffink but skin an' bone.

"They weren't long a-buryn' of 'er, but what do it matter? She didn't git to 'eaven none the slower. I'm sometimes afraid I shan't never git there, but I'm suttin sure Poli's there, jest as safe as if she was Miss Coutts, an' she's a good lady, she is. But I didn't think about 'er bein' in 'eaven when I see 'em a-buryn' of 'er. When they shovelled in the hearth, I wished it was a-top o' me as well as 'er. I 'adn't a soul left in the world as cared for me, an' I hain't 'ad since—not like Poll.

I dunno what become o' father an' mother Poll an' me was left to shift for ourselves. All sor o' thinx I've been. Anythink as turned up I'd d—anyways try at—'cos if I didn't, yer see, I mus ha' starved. Beggars can't be choosers. That' the wust o' bein' poor. You can't git the righ vaily o' yer work when you hain't nuffink to fal back on. Folks takes advantage on yer. 'Tak it or leave it,' they says, free an' easy, when all th time they are glad to git 'old on yer, an' ud give y yer own axin's, if yer could on'y 'old hout—but they know yer can't, ye see. I never did nuffinl as was downright bad, so as I could be pulled up for 't, but some o' the thinx I've been forced to d was oncommon shady. Poll wouldn't ha' liked it if she'd seen me at 'em. It was thinkin' o' 'er kep me from wu's. Yes, an' keeps me now, p'raps. It's queer the way I can't forgit 'er—'cos I'd never no one else to care for me, I guess. I can see her as plain now as I could sixty 'ear an' more ago—it's hall that since she died. She don't never seem to ha' growed, or altered one bit.

"She was a bit proud of 'er curly 'air, an' kep it clean an' tidy, though 'twas 'ard work, for some times we'd nuffink better than cinders to go to bec on. There's a field they used to shoot rubbish in out by Bow—leastways, it ain't a field now, bu covered with 'ouses as thick as they can stand. Poll an' me used to go there with the other folk to see what we could pick up, an' sometimes we slep there. We'd scoop out a 'ole, so that the wine couldn't git at us, an' pick the softest place to pu our 'cads on, an' kiver ourselves hup w' any old rotten bit o' sacking, an' sich like, we could find an' sleep like tops we would. We looked like chimney-sweeps when we woke in the mornin', bu Poll allus went down to the ditch an' give 'erself a wash, an' combed 'er 'air hout, if she'd on'y go 'er fingers to do it with. An oncommon pretty ga she was, though 'she were 'all starved, an' dresse pretty nigh like a scarecrow. If she'd been figgec hout an' dressed proper, there ain't a gal I heve see as could 'old a candle to 'er—not a patch on 'er back they wouldn't be. I should like to see 'er jest as she used to was for once in a way, but i hever I git along w' 'er agin, I shouldn't like 'er to keep like that. If she was a child, she wouldn't be able to git on as we used w' an old chap like me.

"My luck seems to be gittin' runned hover—that's 'ow I lost my leg. I was a-'elpin' a drover in the Mile End Road. I'd gone out lookin' arter sumfink to do as fur as Romford, an' he picked me up at the market there, an' give me a job to 'elh drive some ship to the Cattle Markit—it was ir Smiffle then. Well, I'd run on to 'ead 'em back from the Cambridge 'Eath Road, when up come some fellers in a cart, 'alf sprung. The 'oss was goin' as fast as hever it could, but the chap as was drivin' kep' on leatherin' it wi' the hend o' the reins—he 'adn't got no whip. So I shouted to 'em not to run hover the ship, an' flung up my harms—but they never took no 'ced. On they come, an' down I went, an' the cart went hover me, an' scrunched my leg like a snail. They carried me to the London Hospital, an' arter a bit the doctors cut off my leg—they said they couldn't mend it—an' I've been a hippety-hop hever since. I shall be glad, though, when I'm peggin' away on my timber-toe ag'in, for it's lonesome layin' on yer back wi' nuffink to do.

"Sundays is my best days. People ain't in sich a 'urry to git to church as they are to git to their business, an' then they're kinder a-Sundays. There's a sweet-lookin' lady goes hover my crossin', as true as the clock, hevery Sunday, with 'er three little gals, as like their mar as little peas is to a big 'un. They takes it in turns to give me my penny, an' they speaks so pretty to me. I reg'lar look hout for seein' of 'em. Real gentlefolks they are, I'll go bail, though they ain't dressed nigh so smart as a good many as goes by an' never gives me nuffink."

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIRST.

TEENIE'S DOUBTS.

THERE was a sharp pain in Tecnie's heart, and wild thoughts performing a confused dance in her brain, as she watched him handling those letters.

He was thinking about Grace evidently, and maybe he was lamenting the folly which had tempted him to marry one so useless and helpless as she was to him. She saw him in despair from which he might have been saved, if she had only been brave enough to refuse to be his wife. She saw him in sore need of help, and she was so poor—so weak that, with all her love, she could not say or do anything that might relieve him in the least degree.

Like a sudden and dense mist upon the mountain, the thought fell upon her—blinding her, stupifying her so that she did not know which way to move towards safety—that he must be sorry for having married her. It seemed as if there were a great load within her breast, bearing the once strong and upright form down to the floor.

Shading her eyes with one hand, she asked in a very low voice—

"Has the Laird no friend who will lend him the money?"

Without looking up, and his thoughts far away in the old days—how far back they seemed!—of gay youth, bright dreams, and impatient hopes, he answered—

"Our only hope is that Dame Wishart may advance it; but if she refuses, I am afraid the sale will take place."

He drew a long breath, and she saw that his lips were compressed as if he were in pain.

There was a curious sense of silence in the place; even the wind outside seemed to pause, and the rustle of the honeysuckle against the window was not heard.

The only hope was in Dame Wishart—Grace's mother. If he had married Grace, there would have been no difficulty about this business; it could all have been settled quite easily, and he would have been happy. So, in her morbid broodings, she began to see how cruel she had been, how wisely the Laird had spoken, and how wickedly and selfishly she had acted. Her love was bringing to him fast the ruin and misery of which Dalnahoy had warned her. She had turned away from the warning, because he had pleaded and she loved him so, and now—

He must be bitterly repenting the foolish passion which had tempted him to marry her in spite of reason.

That pretty fairy story, in which she had lived for a little while, had changed into a very dull and prosaic reality. She was surrounded by struggles and difficulties which she had never known at home; she shuddered with a cold fear that she had done wrong—that she had involved him in the wrong, and that both were now doomed to pay the penalty of the error for which she alone was to blame.

In a painful, dreamy way, she seemed to be conscious that he was fighting with a wild sea—that he was calling to her for help, and that, although quite near, she could not lift a hand to save him. The anguish to her was intense—it was like a nightmare which she tried to shake off and could not; yet every circumstance of their position, and everything around her, was coldly distinct and sharply defined to her senses. She saw and felt everything with the supernatural vividness with which the mind is gifted in moments of great peril.

How vexed he must feel with her now! By-and-by he would come to hate her as the cause of all his misfortunes, and poor Baby would become a trouble and an annoyance to him. If she could have foreseen—if she could have known or suspected what suffering he was to undergo on her account—she might have prevented it all, and that was the bitterest thought of the many which afflicted her. She might have prevented it all, and she would have been so glad to do so—only to save him the least pain, and, lo, she was the cause of all his pain!

Still in her dreamy state, she wished that she could have dropped into the cobble and sailed away out upon the strange seas, no matter whither,

He placed his arm round her so tenderly, and drew her to his breast with such affectionate warmth, that but for the extravagant fancies which possessed her, she must have known how much she had wronged his thoughts. She was grateful for the touch of his hand—grateful for the loving sound of his voice; and at the same time she experienced a twinge of pain, that he should lavish all this care upon her who had brought him so much sorrow.

"There's nothing wrong with me," she said

"YOU WERE RIGHT, LAIRD!"

so that she never came back to Rowanden any more—so that she might leave him free to marry Grace, and to be happy, as he would be with her. She had a pitiful weary feeling of being all alone in the world—of being so much the enemy of those whom she loved, that they must wish her to be away; and for their sakes she desired nothing better than to be taken off at once, and hidden out of sight, no matter where.

As her brain throbb'd with these sad fancies, a big sob burst from her, and Walter started up amazed and distressed; it was a very unusual sound to proceed from her.

"What is the matter, Teenie, my own bonnie wife—what has happened to you?"

stubbornly, and even with a degree of petulance in her fierce determination to overcome every sign of weakness. Then, sobbing in spite of herself, and wistfully, "It's an awful pity."

Her pity was for him in having married her, and so entailed upon himself all this suffering; he attributed it to the position of his father.

"It is a pity, and it will upset the old man terribly—to be turned out of his home, to be set adrift in the world, and to begin life anew when he is so near its close—oh! it vexes me, so that I do not know what to say or think."

"But you could not help it"—timidly, and half against her will, craving for some balm for the self-accusations which were torturing her.

"No, I could not help it; and yet, Teenie, I feel as if there were some blame due to me, and the feeling makes me smart keenly. I ought to have been able to relieve him in this crisis. Perhaps I should have been if I had followed his advice, and applied myself to engineering. That is a profitable business, once you get into the groove; but preaching is a poor trade at the best—there are no fortunes made at it. Still, I do not feel that my choice has been a wrong one; I have adopted a poor trade according to the ordinary measure of success, but have I not chosen the one in which the real measure of success is largest and most substantial? It is surely a vulgar thought to measure God's love by worldly prosperity; and if that were to be the rule, it would be a sore temptation to ignorant minds to try to cheat themselves and Providence. They try it often enough as it is. I am content to be poor even when I must look on such sorrow as my father's, if I may help men to realise what is true happiness."

"If I could only help you!" she muttered, to herself rather than to him.

He looked at her, puzzled and much grieved by her white face. Still, he had no conception of the vein of thought she had fallen into, and of the cruel confirmation which his words gave to the convictions that distressed her. He smiled sadly, and tried to comfort her.

"Get well, Teenie—look happy and bright as you used to do, and then I think it will be possible even to hear the tap of the auctioneer's stick at Dalmahoy without despair. But if you go on being so unlike yourself as you are just now, I don't know how I shall stand it."

"Aye!" she cried with a wild sort of bitterness of heart—shutting her eyes and thinking of the blunders they had made—"there would have been no need for all this fash if you had only married Gr——"

He placed his hand tenderly on her mouth, a quick and painful suspicion of her feelings running through his mind, and filling him with more acute sorrow than even the knowledge of his father's distress had done; for he saw how much his careless words must have pained her, and he felt that she had not the unquestioning faith in him which he had hoped she possessed. It was a double shock to him, and very bitter.

"You are my wife," he said quietly, "and you must not think that it was possible for me to marry anybody but you, as indeed it was not, and could not be, even if I were free to make choice again to-morrow with the knowledge of all these troubles staring me in the face. I would act just as I have done, unless perhaps I had hesitated in the fear that you were not willing to share poverty and sorrow with me."

"Oh, Wattie! I would be proud of your poverty, because it brings you so much nearer to me. But when I see you suffering, and so many others suffering, because——" She hesitated, and then impetuously, "because you have married me, I feel wild!"

He was startled by this passionate outcry, and strangely disturbed.

"You are all the world to me, Teenie," he said softly; "you can never guess half the happiness you have given to me, and I can never forget it, I hope."

She was looking at the floor, her face clouded by unpleasant emotions, but it was an unspeakable relief to hear his words and to mark his tone. The doubts which afflicted her were quieted, although not dispelled. She did not speak again.

From that day there was a marked change in her manner and ways. The frank, fearless girl of old times was gone, and her place was occupied by a quiet, somewhat shy, and often sad woman, whose nature was occasionally roused by under-currents of passion, which, however, found no further expression than in the quick flash of the bright eyes—like the sea at night illumed for a minute by lightning, then dark and incomprehensible again.

Out of her very love there was a slow growth of fierce despair. She looked often across the sea, yearning towards it, thinking of her father, and speculating upon what might have happened if she had gone away with him before the marriage. Dalmahoy would have been saved, the Laird would not have despised her as he must do now, and Walter and Grace would have been so happy! Grace would have suited him so admirably; she was interested in all his work, and she would have helped him in it; he could have discussed his sermons with her; she would have taken charge of the Sunday-school, and she would have managed the soup-kitchen and the coal-fund in winter. Teenie blamed herself that she was utterly unfitted for any of these duties—at least in the way they were usually performed.

There was always in her mind the self-upbraiding cry, never a thought of blame to others. Yet at times she looked and acted as if she were angry with everybody, just because she felt so bitter towards herself. Wild, wicked feelings surged in her breast, and they were all the more fierce because she tried so hard to conceal and suppress them.

She watched her husband with a sharp aching at her heart, and wistful eyes. As she saw the shadow of trouble deepen on his face, her despair was quickened until it seemed as if all the world were against her, and that every hope of peace was gone from their home. And she was the cause—she alone was the cause! She felt that her whole nature was changing, that her brow was becoming contracted with a constant frown, and that her heart was swelling so with pain, it must surely burst very soon.

Yet she was vitally submissive to him, watching his every look, studying his every wish, and trying with all her might to make up to him, by her affectionate care, for the ruin which she fancied was the dowry she had brought to him. Now she prayed and prayed that her father might return in time to rescue Dalmahoy! She would have him give up the last farthing he possessed for that purpose; and then if she could only disappear from the place—die perhaps—she would be satisfied.

To Grace she was more gentle, more loving than she had ever been before. Everything Grace said was as gospel to Teenie; everything Grace did she praised and admired—and it requires a good heart to be pleased with the successes of one's friends. The conviction that she had stepped into the Dalmahoy family as a sort of marplot grew upon her, until it became a sort of waking nightmare. The poor girl's heart was breaking, and her only relief was found in exceeding tenderness of thought towards those whom she fancied she had wronged; whilst often she was in appearance dour to them, and quite unsympathetic. These were the moments in which she hated herself most, in which she was longing most to discover some great sacrifice to make by which she could help them, and show how much she loved them.

When alone with Baby—the little thing laughing, crowing, and kicking in the animal enjoyment of mere existence—she felt the bitterness of her position most keenly. But even when alone she rarely allowed the tears which filled her breast to find vent. She was either dour in her anguish, and would sit for hours watching the little one, and dreaming sad dreams, or she would be fierce in her affectionate hugging of the child, and, as with dry hot eyes she looked at him, would try to croon some of the old sad ballads, or to tell him pretty stories of gay lives, as if he could understand, and as if her heart were not bursting with pain.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SECOND. FALSE STEPS.

TEENIE'S white face haunted Walter; it became a terror to him, and added cruelly to the anxieties which at the time engaged his thoughts. He feared that she was very ill, and spoke to the doctor. Lumsden, the baillie, in his rough and hearty way, assured him there was nothing the matter; it was just the natural effects of the birth of the baby, and she was not half so bad as many women were under the same circumstances. He prescribed cheerful conversation, good feeding, and as much open-air exercise as possible—driving best.

Obedient to these directions, Walter tried to be cheerful. It was a very ghastly result, for he was in sore trouble. He knew that he made a bad show of mirth, and he was much vexed by it. But he did the next best thing, as he thought—he said never a word about the various matters which were annoying and worrying him so that he could with difficulty get up even the faint appearance of cheerfulness with which he attended her. He was very earnest in the effort, but he was very grave all the same, and in spite of himself; for his father's prospective ruin, and various irritating petty inconveniences in his own affairs, were pressing sharply upon him. Unfortunately, he was not one of those who could take life lightly; life was a very serious business to him, and its responsibilities not to be shirked or postponed on account of any personal sorrows or weaknesses.

She was not in the least deceived by his pretences at indifference to the way things were going. She questioned him, and he told her that all would be right by-and-by; that she was not to trouble herself, but just devote her whole attention to getting well, and that would make him quite happy, for his chief distress was due to the fact that she was so ill. And to a certain extent he spoke absolute truth.

But she looked upon this as another sign that she was unfit to be his wife; she regarded it as a final proof that he thought so; and at every fresh attempt he made to hide his sorrow from her, she kept murmuring to herself—

"He feels that I am the cause of all this wreck and ruin, and he will not tell me. He sees that it is my fault he is in difficulty, and he is trying to shut his own eyes to it by hiding it from me?"

So the very means which he adopted to assist her recovery retarded it. If she had only spoken out, then he would have understood, and he would have explained everything to her; or if he had only spoken out, she would have understood, she would have been spared much pain, and she would have helped him by getting well, and also by the sturdy spirit in which she took in hand those matters which were plain to her.

But each trying most earnestly to help the other, each loving the other most devoutly, and each striving hard to save the other from pain, did exactly what they wished not to do—inspired doubt and grief.

There was no foolishness on either side; each was capable of very bold and resolute action as soon as the course was visible. It was just one of those commonplace positions in which what we wish to do blinds us to what we ought to do.

He was deeply grieved that she showed no signs of improving health; she was bitterly vexed with him that he did not think her worthy of his confidence—just at the time when it would have been the greatest conceivable relief to him to have poured into her ear the whole history of his vexations, when her sympathy would have helped and strengthened him beyond measure, and when the loss of it was the greatest of all deprivations!

He tried to interest her in the events which were passing around them, but he found it difficult to get her out of the house. She had grown almost a hermit, and she could not bear to pass the garden gate. He thought that a very bad sign, and he tried all sorts of little persuasions to induce her to go down to the village, to Kingshaven, or for a drive to the hills. She yielded, but it was only because she wished to please him; she seemed to derive neither pleasure nor benefit from these excursions.

In her present humour the number of petty aggravations which she discovered increased rapidly; the beauty of home was fading, and by-and-by it would wither. Already the pitifully small beginnings of misunderstanding, of doubt, which, if unchecked at first, develop into fierce words and distrust, had entered the house; and yet each was striving honestly to be faithful, dutiful, and loving to the other.

It was at the flower-show that Teenie encountered the Laird for the first time after she had heard of the calamity which loomed before him.

The flower-show was in the school-house. There were tables with rising shelves along the walls and down the centre of the room, brilliant with flowers—chiefly the old-fashioned ones: verbenas, petunias, hollyhocks, roses, pansies, and two or three ruddy cockscombs. These, for the most part, were nurtured in cottage gardens by hard-working weavers, shoemakers, and farm labourers. The gardeners of the gentlemen in the neighbourhood contributed the rare flowers which their masters' hothouses produced.

The dominie, the doctor, the exciseman, and a goodly number of the ladies and gentlemen who lived on the outskirts of the town—spinsters and widows of limited income, half-pay officers and retired tradesmen—were also amongst the exhibitors, and as eager as any of the others in the contest for the prizes. The show was a great event of the year; it was the climax of much devoted labour and many anxious hopes. It was the cause of many heart-burnings, for the flower-growers identified themselves with their favourites, and failure to win a prize—or at least special commendation—was regarded as a deep affliction; by some accepted contentedly and wisely, with the determination to make a more strenuous effort next year, guided by the experience of this one; by others with a spiteful grudge towards those who had succeeded; and by others again with self-satisfied feelings of contempt for the ignorance or partiality of the judges—who were generally gardeners from distant gentlemen's seats, and nurserymen of the neighbouring towns.

For months previous to the event, the dominie was in a state of excitement, arranging the list of prizes, settling with the committee and the judges for the most convenient day for the show, and writing letters about everything to everybody. The labours of a Secretary of State were small in comparison with the dominie's, and still smaller if viewed through his notion of their relative importance to the country.

Then he had his special anxiety about his own roses and pansies, for which he had obtained several prizes, and to which he was as much devoted as if they had been living things. At four o'clock in the morning he was in his garden, busy with his pets; there again after school until late in the evening, sometimes even working by lamp-light. To make the show "a grand display," to win a prize, and to be complimented for his "indefatigable exertions on behalf of horticultural science," constituted to him the glory of life.

The day came, and it was exceedingly beautiful to him: the clear sunshine, with the cooling breeze from the sea; the warm moist atmosphere of the room, gorgeous in colours—pink, red, purple, blue, green, and the innumerable shades of these—with the sweet odour of the roses. "Paradise must be a flower-show," thought the dominie, meaning anything but disrespect to Paradise.

The ladies—flowers in their way, and quite as gorgeous in attire, although not so perfect, perhaps -- and the gentlemen streamed into the room; passed slowly round, admiring, simpering, coquetting, and making comments of more or less, or no value.

"The colours are so very fine," exclaimed Mrs. Dobbieside; "they are almost equal to the artificial!"

McGilchrist, the manufacturer, observed that if he could only obtain a dye equal to the dominie's prize pansy—a deep velvety purple—he would make a fortune by it. Others were able to admire the perfection of cultivated nature without any commercial speculations; but a large proportion of the visitors came because it was a show where other people were to be seen, and passed round and round, blind to the beauty which was laid before them.

It was in this room Teenie met the Laird. For an instant she had a desire to avoid him; then with a momentary frown and a sharp mental reprimand—"Why should I?"—she walked up to him and held out her hand.

The eyes of all the people near were upon them; for there had been curious rumours going about—rumours not yet fully developed, but promising a fine crop of absurd falsehoods at no very distant date.

He was perfectly aware that they were observed; and the Laird, on the brink of ruin, was as grandly courteous as ever, and smiled as gaily as if he knew no care in the world.

He took her hand, greeting his daughter-in-law as respectfully as if she had been the richest lady in the land.

"I am glad to see you looking so well, Christina. I have been hearing bad accounts of your health, and it is a charming surprise to see you here to-day with a colour on your cheeks that rivals the dominie's roses."

The compliment was disagreeable to her, for the colour was due to her anxiety as to how he would receive her; and she thought his tone drier than usual.

But the onlookers were satisfied that the Laird was most considerate, and that there was no breach between him and the minister's wife. The Laird was slyly conscious, and he determined to give the good folk still further satisfaction.

He drew Teenie's arm within his own—much to her astonishment—and walked slowly round the room with her, directing her attention to the choicest flowers, and making pleasant or patronising comments upon the growers of the plants he praised. He never paused, never hesitated for a word, or for a sentiment, because he had such sublime faith in himself that he never doubted what ever words came uppermost were worth uttering.

It did not matter to her what he said, for she was busy thinking how kind he was to forget or to forgive so readily her share in bringing about his present unfortunate position.

He was vastly admired by the onlookers, his condescension, his courtesy and flow of language were much praised; and several ladies vowed that he was the handsomest and youngest old gentleman they had ever seen. The Laird was sensible of the admiration he excited, and for the time he was really indifferent to his impending ruin.

When they had passed round the room and reached the door—where the dominie muttered his thanks for Dalmahoy's presence on that occasion, and the Laird replied with a neat compliment about the dominie's management in general and his flowers in particular—he did not leave her as she expected.

"Wattie is busy with some of his elders—arranging about the Sacrament, I dare say—so I'll walk down the road with you till we meet Drysdale with the gig," he said.

They walked along the high road on the edge of the cliffs, the sea glancing and surging below them. Her head was bent, her eyes fixed on the ground; he still retained her arm, discoursed upon the beauties of nature—the flower-show—or inquired about the baby; and she replied in monosyllables, her breast swelling with other thoughts.

Suddenly she lifted her head, and looked him straight in the face.

"You were right, Laird, and I was wrong," she said decisively.

Even he was slightly taken aback by this frank admission, for he was quick, and he had a fair idea of what she referred to.

"My dear child, I do not understand you, and you look as if the matter were serious."

"I mean about the marriage—I should not have taken him, as you said, especially when he was expecting a fortune which I knew he could never have. You were right, and you must hate me—although you try to be so kindly."

The Laird had a disagreeable remembrance of his fib, and he spoke all the more earnestly.

"It is a principle of mine, Christina, never to cry over spilled milk. I would have been glad if you had followed my advice when I offered it to you; but you and Wattie have thought otherwise and acted otherwise; there is no more to be said. We must make the best we can of matters as they stand."

"But I have not got the education to fit me for his wife—you know it—you knew—why didn't you hold him back?"

In his surprise at this attack, the Laird found himself trying to reconcile her to her position.

"You can still learn, my dear child. Education develops, it does not create. It seems to me clearer daily, that we are what we are by the force of nature, and not by education. Education refines, modifies, improves natural faculties, and renders us more or less useful, or more or less harmful to society. That is all. Education will never shorten the ears of a donkey."

"And it will never shorten mine."

"I did not mean that, Christina," he said hastily, shocked by the construction she had placed on his words.

"I know. What are you to do about this money you require?"

Dalmahoy was surprised to find himself put out of countenance by this child. Clearing his throat, and not quite so calmly as usual—

"Walter has told you then?"

"Everything."

"Well, we are going to my sister—there is Wattie coming for me—and I expect her to remove the difficulty."

"And she will not do it—I know, from what she said to me."

This was spoken with a dogged conviction which startled him.

"I hope you are mistaken, Christina," he said very sincerely; "if not, you will soon see the auctioneer at Dalmahoy, and me a beggar."

"And it is my fault," she muttered bitterly, as Drysdale came up with the gig.

Teenie walked home. The Laird and his son entered the gig, and drove over to Craighburn.

They were received by Grace, who looked somewhat uncomfortable: the cause—she had not been able to learn what her mother intended to do ; but she smiled all the same, and gave her friends a hearty welcome.

Dame Wishart was in her chair, looking much brisker than usual, and evidently prepared for visitors. She had on a new cap of somewhat gaudy colours ; she wore a brocaded gown which had belonged to her mother, and which was never used except on state occasions ; it was a piece of family grandeur, and had passed through several generations. Her face was keener and her eyes brighter than they had been for a long time. She seemed, indeed, to be nerved up to some great effort.

Both Dalmahoy and Walter expressed the pleasure they really felt in seeing her look so well ; but the former experienced an uncomfortable doubt that all these preparations indicated the fulfilment of Tecnie's prophecy.

Grace stood behind her mother's chair, ready to supply any of her wants. She looked with a curiously anxious gaze from her mother to the two men seated before her.

END OF CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SECOND.

SMUGGLING-ANA.

HAVE got one or two smuggling stories to tell. New ones, do you ask ? That depends very much upon whether you have heard them before. Picturesque smuggling being pretty nearly obsolete, anecdotes connected with it can rarely be both new and true. Now these at least are true.

One fine morning, a good many years ago, a party of Revenue men were clustered on the shores of Whitsand Bay, in a state of some excitement, for the clearing off of the early morning mist had revealed a suspicious-looking lugger, lying becalmed and motionless, and they hoped that the fastest smuggler on the coast, that had shown them her heels many and many a time, whose repeated escapes had caused them to become the laughing-stocks of the country-side, and had even excited a suspicion of connivance in the breasts of the authorities, had at last fallen into their hands.

"It is her, safe enough," shouted one who had the telescope ; "that is the Lottery, or my name's not Bowden !"

There was no time to be lost ; the breeze might spring up at any moment, and the best vessel, and the crew most conversant with the coast, handiest in bad weather, and most reckless of consequences, remain free to renew a career of fraud and violence. So the officer in command ordered a couple of boats to be manned at once, and put off to secure the prize.

But the Lotteries made up their minds not to give up their valuable cargo and fine craft without a struggle, and made all the usual preparations against boarders.

As the attacking boats approached shots were exchanged, and they were finally beaten off ; Ambrose Bowden, who pulled the bow-oar of one of them, being killed. Indeed the officer in command would not have been justified in persevering with the attack at the risk of his men's lives ; for the object he had in view, that of suppressing the Lottery, could now be attained without further sacrifice. The crew were well known, and though it had been impossible to surprise them in an overt act of smuggling, it would be a very different matter now that they had the brand of Cain upon their foreheads. So it proved ; when the affray was reported, the authorities, determined to make an example, issued orders to arrest the vessel, and or any members of the crew, wherever they might be found.

And now commenced the punishment of the smugglers, who led the lives of hunted rats. Officers of justice, with soldiers to aid them, were perpetually on their track ; dragoons scoured the country, prowling for them. They could not visit their families without the strictest precautions, and had to move about by night. In the day time they lay concealed in barns and granaries, where they constantly heard inquiries being made about them.

Of course their only chance of escape lay in the fact that the whole country-side was in their favour and against the Revenue people ; there was not a farmer, an innkeeper, a shopman, or a labourer unwilling to do his best to aid and conceal them. Still, at every game of hide-and-seek the searcher wins in the end. To lie in concealment beyond a certain time is trying to the nerves. One of the smugglers, named Toms, grew tired and allowed himself to be arrested, when he turned king's evidence, and pointed out Tom Potter as the man who had fired the fatal shot.

You may imagine the storm of execration which arose against the traitor, especially when the dragoons managed, by a stratagem, to elude the precautions taken for the concealment of Potter, who was at length arrested in his own house, and carried to London. The only chance of saving him lay in getting the one witness for the prosecution, Roger Toms, out of the way. But this was difficult, for Toms, knowing well that his life was in danger, had taken refuge on board a Revenue cutter, which he never left. However, certain influential and responsible persons whom she could trust sought out his wife, and prevailed upon her to use her influence to lure her husband away from the neighbourhood of his protectors the first time that he landed to see her.

Satisfied that no violence would be offered him, and anxious to save him from the disgrace of his comrade's blood, she consented, and was the means of his falling into an ambush. The word given, however, was faithfully kept; no injury or unnecessary discomfort was inflicted upon him, but he was spirited away to Guernsey, with the intention of sending him to some place where he would be out of the way and unable to give evidence at the time of the trial. But Toms was traced by the Government officers to Guernsey, and found in the hold of a ship just sailing for America.

His evidence on Potter's trial amounted to this—that he, Toms, was in the cabin of the Lottery during the attack, and that Potter had come down and said, "I have done for one of them."

For the defence, an old coastguardsman, one of the boat's crew of which the murdered man was a member, was called, and he swore that Bowden was killed by an accidental shot fired by one of themselves; and in confirmation of this it was shown that the shot had entered his breast, he rowing the bow-oar of a boat going towards the ship.

However, the smugglers had fired on the boats, that was evident, and some one ought to be hanged; so judge and jury were not particular to a technicality or two, and Tom Potter was condemned and executed.

The fate of Roger Toms, who informed against him, was a far worse one. The people of his native town execrated him; even his children were brought up to detest him, for his name was a byword of reproach.* He would certainly have been killed if he had gone freely about, so he remained in a menial capacity within the walls of Newgate till the day of his death.

That is such a tragic story, that we must give you something lighter to follow.

In 1832 there was a very heavy duty on all articles of bijouterie passing from Switzerland into France, and the usual effect of protective imposts upon goods which are easy to conceal and carry followed. Smuggling became an established and a lucrative business.

The largest jeweller at that time in Geneva was a man named Beauthé, who had reduced the contraband system to so simple a matter, that for an extra charge of five per cent. on the price he undertook to deliver any goods in Paris, duty-free. One day a gentleman entered his shop, and purchased jewellery to the amount of several thousand francs. He then mentioned the report he had heard about the evasion of the duty, asking if it were true.

"Certainly, sir," said Beauthé; "sign this memorandum of agreement to pay me five per cent., and the goods shall be sent to your hotel in Paris without further charge."

The gentleman smiled, took up the pen, and signed—"De Saint Cricq, Director-General of Customs."

Beauthé, without being in the least taken aback, bowed and said—

"Monsieur the Director-General of Customs, the goods shall be at your hotel as soon as yourself."

Monsieur de Saint Cricq, being put on his mettle, started at once for Paris, and on passing the frontier made himself known to the custom-house officer in command, told the story, and offered a reward of fifty louis for the seizure of the jewellery. Arrived at his hotel, he embraced his wife and children, and went presently up-stairs to change his travelling dress. On his dressing-table there stood a neat little casket with a silver plate upon it bearing his name. Opening it, he found the jewels. Beauthé had managed somehow to get it placed amongst the count's own luggage during the process of packing; and the valet, finding it there, had placed it naturally upon the dressing-table.

To return to British smuggling. There is a story which illustrates yet another phase of the difficulties that beset a Government in its endeavours to suppress a fraudulent trade, the profits of which are very large. Quis custodes ipsos custodiet? Who is to guard the guards? Game-keepers will sell their masters' pheasants, and Revenue men have been known to employ the Government vessels with which to run casks. The Revenue cutter Providence was thus caught by a sister vessel in the very act of smuggling, was tried and condemned, and having passed through the form of sale by auction from the Revenue Service to the Admiralty, her name was changed to the Grecian, and her old crew were sent in her as a punishment to the West Indies. Here they fell in with a pirate, ran her aground, lowered their boat, and attacked the retreating crew, fighting in the surf, and killing a good number of them, while the rest they took prisoners to Jamaica, where they were hanged.

For this brilliant affair the crew of the Grecian were all graciously given their freedom and permitted to return home. Whether they were ever employed in the Preventive Service again, however, or whether they engaged in open and professed smuggling, I have not been able to learn.

LEWIS HOUGH.

THE FLOWER AND THE BIRD.

BY J. R. PLANCHÉ.

A WOODBINE, as the story goes,
 Was once enamoured of a Rose—
 A sweet, young, blushing, lovely flower
 As ever graced a maiden's bower.
 Both had sprung out of the same earth,
 And he had loved her from her birth ;
 And in the language of the flowers,
 Which is more florid far than curs,
 Expressed for her his ardent passion ;
 But though after a certain fashion
 She seemed to show an inclination
 Towards an innocent flirtation,
 Beyond a bow it never went.
 Once, as he o'er her fondly bent,
 A breeze so nearly to him brought her,
 He thought his tendrils must have caught her ;
 But, reddening, she in haste retreated,
 And begged it might not be repeated.
 One eve to his dismay he heard
 The low, sweet warble of a bird,
 Who, as the light of day was fading,
 His darling Rose was serenading.
 It was a wild young Nightingale,
 Who told of love the usual tale,
 But in so exquisite a strain,
 Unmoved she could not quite remain ;
 And the poor Woodbine saw the danger
 Of listening to this tuneless stranger,
 So took the liberty next morning
 To give the flower a friendly warning.
 "It is not for my sake, dear Rose,
 I caution you your ears to close
 Against this too seductive lover.
 My chance I know has long been over,
 'Tis but on your account I speak ;
 Your happiness alone I seek.
 Choose any of my comrades here—
 All in the garden hold you dear—
 But wed not one who, though he love you,
 Must feel that he was born above you,
 And, being wont at will to roam,
 May weary too soon grow of home."
 Indignantly her head she tossed,
 His good advice on her was lost,
 As in such cases I have known,
 Too oft it has away been thrown.
 Night after night, the warbler came ;
 Ambition fanned the flow'et's flame.
 Birds in the order of creation
 Are above flowers of any station.
 That fact her faithful friend had mentioned,
 Unwisely, though 'twas well-intentioned ;
 For what he trusted would alarm her,

Proved to have much more power to charm her.
 So true it is, though told in fiction,
 The sex delights in contradiction.
 A wish you've only to oppose,
 And, be it Woman—be it Rose,
 The more decided the objection,
 The stronger grows the predilection
 But to be brief—ere Whitsuntide,
 The lovely flower became a bride,
 And proudly for a while, poor thing,
 Saw every morn her spouse take wing,
 And thought how grand it was to fly ;
 Yet sometimes, with a fragrant sigh,
 Felt happier still had been her lot
 If he were rooted to the spot,
 Or if it had been Nature's whim
 To give her power to soar like him.
 Home every evening came her mate,
 Sometimes perhaps a little late,
 And rather weary with his round,
 And then occasionally found
 There was a pearly drop or two
 Upon her leaves—she said 'twas dew,
 And he was too well-bred to doubt it,
 Or if he did, to care about it.
 The Woodbine, from his lattice nigh,
 His darling watched with anxious eye ;
 And oft unnoticed o'er her stooping,
 With pain perceived that she was drooping.
 Later and later still the Bird
 Returning to his Rose was heard,
 And one or twice, to her affright,
 He never came home all the night !
 Of course, 'twas business or the weather—
 What could it signify a feather ?—
 And if she ventured to complain,
 My gentleman was off again,
 Darting away, swift as a swallow,
 Well knowing that she could not follow.
 In fine, ere o'er the wedded pair
 The honeymoon that shone so fair
 Had ceased to shed its silver light,
 The Nightingale had vanished quite.
 And the poor Woodbine stood aghast,
 To see the Rose was fading fast ;
 While, unaffected by her grief,
 Around her whispered every leaf,
 And twittered every busy bird,
 "The match was perfectly absurd !
 It serves the silly flower right ;
 She held that honest Woodbine light—
 Treated her equals with disdain,
 And, of a winged lover vain,
 Wedded with one who, born to fly
 Now leaves her to despair and die."

MY IRISH STORY.

BY NUGENT ROBINSON.

"THERE WAS ME SALMON KNOCKIN' AT THE HALL-DURE, AS DOWLD AS BRAY."

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

I SENT a sensation fizzing through the smoking-room of the Marathon Club, by announcing my intention of passing my Christmas holidays in the wilds of the Western Highlands of Ireland.

"Don't ask me to witness your will, old boy," cried one. "I can recommend you to an insurance office which holds out special inducements to would-be suicides," exclaimed another.

"If you are not heard of before 1880, we will ask a paternal Government to organise an exploring expedition," suggested a third.

"I can lend you a grey Russian overcoat: you'll run a less chance of being potted in it than in your ordinary raiment," added a fourth.

"I'll lay a pony there's a chignon in the business," chimed in a fifth; and thus the jokes went flying round my devoted head, until I read aloud the contents of the following telegram which I had received during the day:—

"GEOFFRY GREVILLE,
"Derry Bawn Hotel,
"Carrig na Golliogue,
"Near Dhudheenoe.

"To HENRY GREVILLE, Esq.,
"Marathon Club,
"London, W.

"Come to this place as soon after receipt of this as possible. I am in a mess. It's not money."

I was fairly puzzled. That there was a daughter of Eve in the case, I entertained not the slightest particle of doubt, but the nature of the dilemma was a source of wonderment and mystery. My Cousin Geoffry had not long been gazetted to the gallant —th. He had joined his regiment at Athlone, in which classical locality, until the receipt of his telegram, I was under the delusive impression that he was still sojourning.

Geoffry was of an "amorous complexion." The best dancer and the fastest—the best man to flirt and the fastest—the best man to disconcert Materfamilias, and to avoid the stereotyped interview with Paterfamilias. Fifty men have been married for paying one-tenth less attention to a marriageable daughter than Mr. Geoffry Greville. He was always in love, but the idea of matrimony never seemed to flicker across his brain. "Pshaw! I shan't marry till I'm fifty; all the old fellows get all the young girls," was his invariable reply when remonstrated with upon the subject of his dilly-dallying.

Under ordinary circumstances I should have allowed my gay and festive kinsman to wriggle out of his mess as best he could, but the Chetwodes, with whom I invariably passed Christmas-tide, had elected to remain in Rome, and I was left on the bleak shore of London, alone. Consequently, it was rather a relief than otherwise to receive the telegram—a telegram that bespoke a most agreeable mystery. I use the word "agreeable" advisedly, on the well-known principle that there is something not utterly displeasing in the misfortunes of even our best friends. Having consulted Bradshaw, I found that the 8.25 from Euston would place me fairly en chemin; so ordering a nice little dinner, for which the chef at the Marathon is so famous, and a pint of Moët—dry—I gave myself up to pondering upon the situation, and the rôle I was destined to play in the forthcoming sensation scene.

* * * * *

On the evening of the 24th day of December, 187—, at about five o'clock, a traveller might have been descried standing upon the steps of Daly's Hotel, in the town of Westport. The traveller was enveloped in a massive Ulster coat, and the Ulster coat which surrounded the traveller, was itself surrounded by a motley crowd, consisting of a group of mendicants in every conceivable stage of deformity, each of whom was engaged in jostling and villifying his neighbour, but all of whom were actuated by a common motive, that of delivering the frieze-coated traveller of as much current coin of the realm as the generosity of his disposition, and the exigencies of the occasion, might move him to dispossess himself of.

The traveller was Harry Greville, and "he didn't see it."

"How long will it take us to reach Carrig na Golliogue?" I asked as I lighted my cigar, preparatory to mounting the rickety-looking outside car which stood in readiness to convey me to my destination.

"The roads is very heavy, yer anner," was the evasive reply of the charioteer, who was also engaged in the process of igniting a "bit o' baccy," concealed within the depths of a very short and very black "dhudheen."

"Divil resave the sight av Eriff Bridge ye'll see, let alone Carrig na Golliogue," observed one of my constituents in a solemn and prophetic manner.

"That the snow may swally up all naygurs is me prayer," added another.

"Av I wor Micky Delany, I wudn't face that road this blessed an' holy night for less nor a goolden guinea an' a pint o' sperrits," cried a ragged little old fellow, with a view to improving the financial prospects of the drive, even at the expense of his own.

"Guinea, indeed! Troth, he'd be a poor-hearted crayture that wud put a dacent boy off wud the likes av a guinea, such a murdherin' cowl'd night as this."

It was, in good sooth, a bad night for a journey out into the mountains. The snow was descending slowly and steadily, falling noiselessly on every available object, enveloping all in a seamless shroud. The bitter blast was whistling through the gaunt and leafless trees, and the river plashed onwards with a dreary, chilling, moaning monotony. Hastily looking to the safety of my pocket-flask, as travellers in the olden time were wont to examine the condition of their fire-arms, jerking the collar of my Ulster up into my hair, and pulling my hat over my ears, I sprang upon the car, and wrapping a rug over my knees as closely as though it was sticking-plaster, I quitted Westport amid the jeers, execrations, howls, curses, and snow-balls of the baffled and disappointed mendicants.

Our progress was necessarily very slow, but it did not require much power of observation to discern that the horse was of that description known as a "garron," and that in addition to constitutional weakness it was endowed with a considerable amount of the well-known characteristics of the mule. It also possessed a peculiar habit of stopping without any premonitory symptoms, which produced the unpleasing effect of sending me forwards with a jerk that threatened to fling me head-foremost into the snow, as though I were about to take a header into a foaming plunge-bath.

"It's conthrairy he is," observed Mr. Michael Delany, upon being remonstrated with; "it's conthrairy; divil a ha'porth else."

"Contrary! What do you mean?"

"He has quare ways, yer anner. What wud ye think av a baste that wud do the likes av this?—Wan day he swallied a half a soverin, an' all we cud get him to give up was sivin-an'-six, all through conthrairiness."

"Do you ever give him a drop of whiskey, Micky?"

"I did wanst, and mebbe I didn't suffer for it!" This was uttered with so much unction that my curiosity was awakened, and I asked him to enlighten me.

"Story-tellin' is dhry work, sir."

"Did you have a drink before you left Westport?"

"I will, sir, an' its plazin' to ye," was the prompt response.

Having mutually partaken of a modest quencher, Mr. Delany proceeded—

"Well, sir, there was wan night last winther, and a murtherin' wet night it was, when wan o' the militia sint for me, for to dhrove him beyant Leenawn, this very road, for to go to a party given be a gentleman's family. I didn't care for the job, but as all quollity was goin', there wasn't a yoke for love or money but the very car yer sittin' on. So we kem to terms aisy enough, for I never fall out wud a gentleman, an' shure enough just all as wan as yerself, sir, he had a sup in a flask, an' bestowed it wud an open an' divartin' hand. Well, yer anner, just as we got about half-ways th' axle gev, and left us roarin' murder in the middle o' the road.

"What am I to do now, ye villyan?" says he.

"Sorra know I know," says I, 'barrin' ye walk,' says I.

"I'm bet," says he, 'be raisin av my dhress boots,' says he.

"Thru for ye," says I.

"But there was luck in store for him, for up comes a shay bound for the same party, that gev him a sate. He ped me honest, and it was only whin he was a mile off that I found the flask on the sate that you're sittin' on now. I dhrank his helth, and made the baste drink it too; and somehow or another, begorra, the next thing I remimber was me dhraggin' the car, an' that baste there sittin' up in me sate as unconcerned as the Chief Baron chargin' for murther, an' beltin' me wud the whip as hard as he cud lick."

"And what then, Micky?"

"I never giv him a taste o' sperrits from that night to this, yer anner."

"I'm greatly afraid that you were drunk, Micky."

"I wasn't drunk."

"Were you sober?"

"I wasn't sober."

"Well, if you were neither drunk nor sober, what were you?"

He pulled up the too willing steed in order to give emphasis to his reply—

"I was upon the difinsive, yer anner."

This happy condition between the Scylla of intoxication and the Charybdis of sobriety was one which struck me as being so exceedingly novel, from the fact of its being delivered with the gravity of conviction, that I burst out laughing.

"Troth, thin, I was much the same way the night I went for to ketch the salmon for Father Myles Donovan, may the heavens be his bed this blessed an' holy night"—here Micky crossed himself most devoutly—"an' if your anner has a sketch o' sperrits contagious, I'd tell ye all about it."

Having promptly complied with Mr. Delany's request, and politely asked him if he would like another sketch, he replied—

"No, I'm thanful to ye, sir; that's hapes, as Mrs. Murphy remarked whin she swallied the crab.

"Well, sir," he continued, after a ringing smack of the lips, like the crack of a whip, "when I was a likely lump av a gossoon, I lived over beyant at Leenawn, an' I was a powerful fisher. There was nothin' to bate me. I med me own flies, and invinted the choicest av bait, an' sorra a fish that ever lept could take the consait out o' me. Well, sir, th' ould ancient Martins was dhruv out o' Ballenahinch be raisin av the hard times, and a set of naygurs, called the Great Life Assurance—the curse o' Crumwell on thim!—tuk the roof from over the heads of the lawful owners. Troth, we had plinty av law, plinty av assurance, but dickens a bit av life in the counthry sence they kem in it. I was put out o' me sheelin' an' sint over to live on a bog that was half the year undher water and th' other half strugglin' to dry. No Christian at all at all cud live in it, barrin' he was a say-gull or a dispinsary dhochor; the very snipes was bet up wud the newralgy. Well, sir, poor Father Myles Donovan, rest his sowl, come to me wan evenin' at th' ind o' Siptember, an' says he—

"Are you there, Mick?" says he.

"I am, yer rivirence," says I.

"I want to spake to ye particular an' private," says he.

"Troth, you're welkim, yer rivirence," says I, an' out we walked up the bog.

"'Me Lord the Bishop is coming to Derrymalooney to-morrow,' says he.

"'Och, murther, but that'll be a great day for yer rivrence an' the Holy Church av Room !' says I.

"'It will,' says he, 'but he has tuk me short,' says he. 'I only got his letther tin minutes ago,' says he, 'an' to-morrow is a black fast,' says he.

"'Murther, an' shure it is,' says I ; 'what's to be done at all at all ?'

"'Father Myles looked very hard at me, an' says he, 'Mick,' says he, 'you're a good fisher.'

"'Divil a finer in Ireland,' says I, for I was proud o' me talent in that way, don't ye see.

"'Av I don't get a salmon for me Lord the Bishop for to-morrow, Micky,' says he, hooking me wud his eye, 'I'm bet up intircly.'

"'I seen what he mint while ye'd be winkin' at a leprachaun.

"'Keep up yer sperrits, Father Myles,' says I, 'for av there's a salmon in that lake now, he'll be smoking undher his lordship's nose, or I'll be contint fur to lose me stick.'

"'Yer a dutiful son av the Church,' says Father Myles, and away wud him across the bog like a young deer.

"The night was murtherin' dark, an' rainin' that powerful that I was as wet as a gauger whin I got to the edge o' the lake. I was afraid to thry for the fish in daylight, for the Great Life, bad cess to thim, had their keepers as plinty as blackberries, and these villyans wor always lookin' out to get a dacent boy into throuble. Well, sir, I got out me tools, and havin' swallied a good tent o' poteen, I set my nit, and down I sot. It was the lonseomest night I ever spint, only the water splashin' and the sheep-dogs yelpin'. I kep me hand on the sthring reddy for a haul, but dickens a sign av a fish stirrin' at all' at all. 'This won't do,' says I ; 'av the Bishop doesn't get a taste o' fish, poor Father Myles will never get a parish.' Well, sir, I sot there, wud the sthring in me hand, takin' an odd scoop at the bottle, an' me heart was very frctful all for the sake of Father Myles, whin all of a suddint the sthring was pulled wud a jerk that nigh dhraggd me into the wather, and begorra, I had an illgant salmon. 'Hurroo!' says I, 'I'm not bet yet,' and I hauled in the nit—and now, yer anner, comes the quare part of the story, and mind ye, it's as thrue as you're sittin' foreninst me on that sate. I tuk the fish out av the nit (he was about eighteen pound) an' was goin' to give him a rap to lave him aisy, whin he stud up on the ind av his tail, threw out his fins, and med for to wrastle me. I thought I'd humour him, for there wasn't a boy in the barony cud stand foreninst me, an' I ketched him be the fins. Sorra a word aither av us sed, but we set to and—ye'd hardly credit it, but he curled his tail round my right leg, and givin' a jolt wud his body, tuk a fall out o' me.

"Well, sir, it was very hurtful to me seclin's to be thrown be a fish, an' I was resolved to give him no 'quarther, whether he axed for it or not, but whin I scrambled to me feet the thief av a salmon was gone. Well, sir, I was so bet up be me disgrace, an' as daylight was comin', I picked up me tools, and I ups to Father Myles's house for to tell him av me misfortune. It was fair light be the time I got there ; 'an' jist as I was comin' up to the house, the sight left me eyes, for there was me salmon knockin' at the hall-dure, as bowld as brass. 'Ye won't escape me now, anyhow,' says I, and I med at him ; but the dure opened, an' I fell into the hall."

Here Micky Delany paused.

"Well, what became of the salmon, Micky ?"

"The Bishop et him," was the sententious reply.

"And did Father Myles get a parish ?"

"Shure enough, yer anner."

"And what did you get, Micky ?"

"Och, I got his blessin', and sorra much good it done me."

I did not proceed with the investigation, as I perceived that Delany did not wish to prolong it.

It had ceased to snow, and the moon evinced a decided anxiety to have a peep at Micky Delany and myself. She pushed away two or three troublesome clouds from before her face, and at length took a dull watery stare at us, much as if she had been suddenly awakened from her slumbers. This little feminine curiosity on her part enabled us to perceive a dark object some hundred yards in advance, lying right across our path.

END OF CHAPTER THE FIRST.

THE TRIAL OF THE PYX.

HE absolute accuracy of weight, and the precise composition of our money, are matters with which few of us concern ourselves. So long as our sovereigns have a tolerably respectable look about them, and are readily convertible into bread and butter, there are few of us who care much whether 9166 or 9666 represents the gold in them in every 1,000 parts ; and there are, perhaps, not many who have any very clear conception of the consequences likely to result if, to-morrow, the Mint authorities were to begin turning out sovereigns with five-and-twenty per cent. of copper in them.

Yet the matter would appear to lie in a nut-shell, too. The more valuable a thing is, the more we can get for it, and this of course applies to sovereigns as well as to everything else. If all sovereigns were reduced in intrinsic value, the less we could get for them; or, in other words, the dearer everything would become. If so, then, in these times of high prices, the annual "Trial of the Pyx," or testing of the coin of the realm, is a proceeding which ought to have a peculiar interest for most of us.

This ceremony is a very old one, and it was at one time a great deal more important than it is now. At one time of day the Master of the Mint was simply a contractor with the Crown for the manufacture of coins, and whether he made sovereigns of gold or principally of copper was clearly a matter of considerable importance. After every coinage, the Mint Master, who had entered into a heavy bond for the due performance of his contract, was formally placed on his trial. A solemn court was held, presided over by the King or some great officer of State, and if the coins were found to be of the right weight and goodness, the contractor was released from his bond. Of late years and until recently, these trials were of comparatively rare occurrence, and were instituted at the discretion of the Privy Council, and presided over by the Lord Chancellor. On a pre-arranged day representatives of the Privy Council, the Exchequer, the Mint, and the Company of Goldsmiths assembled at the Exchequer Office, in Old Palace Yard, where a room was fitted up as a laboratory for this purpose.

The Goldsmiths formed a jury, to whom, at nine o'clock in the morning, the Lord Chancellor addressed a charge, leaving them to proceed with the examination at their leisure. The Pyx chest—the box containing sample coins from the Mint—was ordered to be opened; the Comptroller of the Exchequer produced a number of standard weights, ranging from 500 ounces down, by decimal gradations, to one-thousandth part of an ounce; and representatives of the Exchequer and of the Treasury brought out from the cloisters of Westminster Abbey the gold and silver standards of quality. The bringing forth of these plates was in itself something of a ceremony. The outer door of the chamber in which they were secured was unlocked by the Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury, who would require three keys, and then he could not get in till the Comptroller-General of the Exchequer brought three keys to bear on an inner door. The interior of the chamber being gained, the Chief-Clerk of the Exchequer would unlock an old chest, and the Comptroller-General of the Exchequer complete the process by unlocking the strong-box in which were the actual plates. Everything being in readiness, a number of coins would be taken from the Pyx chest brought from the Mint, melted into an ingot, and the whole mass compared with small pieces cut from the standard plates. If the two were found to correspond within certain limits, and the coins were found to be of the proper weight, the Mint Master was held to have duly fulfilled his contract with his Sovereign.

Substantially the ceremony of the present day is the same, though several important modifications have been made in connection with it. The Mint Master is no longer a contractor, but a Minister of the Crown—the Chancellor of the Exchequer—and, even if he were able to do so, has no such motive as a contractor might have for departing from the standard prescribed by law.

Notwithstanding this, so important is it considered to be that the intrinsic value of our coins should be fully sustained, that the law now requires that "a trial of the Pyx shall be held at least once in every year in which coins have been issued from the Mint;" and the test applied is, moreover, far more stringent than formerly.

In one of the last trials under the old system, the gold actually compared with standard plates was an ingot formed by melting down 224 sovereigns and 39 half-sovereigns, while the block of silver contained 42 florins, 60 shillings, 30 sixpences, and 35 "Maundy" coins. From each of these ingots a small piece was cut to be analysed. Thus it was not the composition of individual coins that was required to be within certain limits of "fineness," but the average composition of a large number of them. In the same manner the weight of the coins was tested, by the pound troy.

The modern trials are of a far more stringent character.

It need hardly be said that, before it is issued from the Mint, the coin of the realm is subjected to a very rigorous examination. From the Operative department it is on three days in each week delivered to the Mint Office, or Counting-house, in what are called "journey-weights"—bags containing 15 lbs. of gold and 60 lbs. of silver—and on its delivery a formal "Mint trial," or examination of the contents of the bags, takes place in the presence of officers of the three departments of the establishment—the Counting-house, the Assay, and the Operative department. From each of the bags, as they are brought in, are taken specimens for examination by the Mint officials, one from each bag being reserved for the annual Pyx trial.

The coins for this purpose are made up in packets, each of which is secured by the seals of the Deputy-Master of the Mint, the Chief-Clerk, and the Assayer. The packets themselves are deposited in the Pyx chest, which is locked with three keys and, in due course, dispatched to Goldsmiths' Hall, just at the back of the Post Office, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, where the trial now takes place—presided over, not by the Monarch or the Lord Chancellor as formerly, but by the Queen's Remembrancer.

The jury charged with the duty of pronouncing upon the contents of the packets is composed of "not less than six out of the competent freemen of the mystery of Goldsmiths of the City of London," who are, upon their oath, to "well and truly, after their knowledge and discretion, make the assays of these moneys of gold and silver, and truly report if the said moneys be in weight and fineness according to the standard," etc. They are, in the first place, to take out from each packet as many coins as they think necessary for the purpose of the trial, and weigh them separately, so as to ascertain whether they are within the prescribed "remedy" as to weight, this "remedy" being a margin of two-tenths of a grain of gold in each sovereign above or below the exact standard, allowed by the Coinage Act. After that the jury are to melt up the coins they have weighed into an ingot, as under the old system, and compare its fineness with the standard trial-plates, which are now consigned to the custody of the Board of Trade. They have next to weigh the residue of the coins in bulk, so as to ascertain, as in former trials, whether, on the average, they are correct in weight; and lastly, they are again to pick out a number of coins indiscriminately, and assay them one by one, stating whether they are within the "remedy" of fineness—that is to say, whether in 1,000 parts they have from 914·6 to 918·6 parts of fine gold.

Thus the test now applied to the workmanship of our great coin-factory is about as severe as it well can be, and may be considered to afford absolute security against all danger of a light or deteriorated currency, either of gold or silver.

The success of the Mint, as evidenced by the result of the trials already held under the new Act, is something rather remarkable. At the one held in July, 1871, the latest of which the Deputy Mint Master has issued a report, the coins submitted to examination represented a total coinage of no less than £13,298,000 in gold, and £996,000 in silver. Of the gold pieces examined individually, five out of nine were found to be of the exact standard of fineness. The greatest variation from the standard was only six parts in ten thousand, while the mean result of the test applied to the nine coins showed that 916·7 represented the average fineness, the standard prescribed by law being 916·666, from which however, as in the weight, a departure is permitted to the extent of two parts in 1,000, above or below—a "remedy of fineness" allowed, as an eminent scientific man has stated, "not as an arbitrary stipulation," but as a necessary recognition of "errors which belong to every thought, to every chemical analysis, and to every composition of alloy."

Thus it is that, all the world over, the British sovereign is recognised as a genuine golden standard of real intrinsic value, and, unlike any other coin in existence, will at all times realise just about its weight in gold. Englishmen abroad are apt to be proud of it when in comparison with the paltry-looking token coinage of many other countries, and, it may be, are sometimes in danger of mistaking the deference with which it is wont to inspire foreigners, for respect for John Bull himself. Thus much is certain, were John Bull abroad at all times as genuine and honest as the sovereigns in his pocket, he would have at least one real and substantial title to respect. GEORGE F. MILLIN.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES.

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBEY.

CHAPTER THE SEVENTH.

ESTWARD, Westward! how full of pleasure was this word at the time when, turning my back to Bokhara and Samarkand, to the Oxus and the Steppes, the ideals of my longing youth, I now prepared to return to Europe! The struggle I had to be ready to encounter on the road stretching from the old residence of Timur up to the holy capital of Khorassan, was by no means so void of danger as to allow me to lull my thoughts in hopeful fancies. The Central-Asiatics, to whose care I was committed at the time of my separation from my old travelling companions, could be considered rather as men placed under my protection than protectors. It was the first time, on this occasion, that they undertook the long pilgrimage; and having been myself much richer in experience than they, our taking counsel together, on one of the very first days of our travel on the Steppes between Karshi and Kei, necessitated my election to the leadership of this caravan of mendicants.

My reader will scarcely doubt my aptitude for this dignity. Impudence, imperturbable obtrusiveness, a filthy loathsome appearance, an inexhaustible store of hymns of praise and a flood of maledictions, together with all attributes belonging to the business—all these were richly represented in the part I was doomed to play. And whenever leaning on my dervish staff, whose top was armed with a kind of small axe, embodying the weapon for the spiritual combat with the evil spirit, with jerking changes of my position, I exclaimed in a deep sonorous voice, "Sewab Lillah" (Do good for God's will), I should have liked to see before me any hardened sinner, or obdurate miser, who would have had the courage to refuse to me or to my followers the expected small coin !

It was a great loss to art and science, that loves the truth, that there was no photographer on our way to Herat, to take a view representing me at the head of my procession. Indeed, my very dressing up deserves a narrower description.

The carefully shaved head was covered by an immense turban, formed of more than seven yards of material ; this head-gear served in the parching sun by day as umbrella, at night as pillow. In its folds tooth-picks, needles and twine, a tooth-brush made of a piece of wood whose tissue was very fibrous, and other useful things of small consequence were hidden ; while one end of the turban, hanging down during prayer half a yard over the left shoulder, offered the advantage of a towel, of a sudarium, of a pocket-handkerchief, and so on.

The neck remained down near to the shoulders uncovered. The body was first surrounded by a suit of coarse linen. Over these came one, two, or if climatical considerations required it, three loose garments of the form of jackets, and over all the "djube," the overall, or crowning piece of a dervish attire. It was sewed together out of innumerable small odds and ends of linen, of all patterns worn, multifarious in colour as in design, the stuff itself representing an exhibition of woven materials. In many places the djube, where already worn through, betrayed the wadding, the wool, and the camel's hair used below its kaleidoscopic surface as doubling, and was at its lowest extremity and at the collar so torn and jagged, that the most cunning connoisseur of the tailor's art could not have acknowledged these parts as homogeneous with the rest of the djube. The legs below the knees, and down to the foot-joint, remained bare.

The feet, enveloped in coarse rags or loosely planted into a wide pair of shoes, in both cases fastened by thongs. Over this costume was placed on the left breast the Koran, over the right shoulder hung the bread-bag and the tea-can. As leader, I was armed with a rusty sword, which hung girt on the wide, thick woollen girdle, the best and most useful part of my attire. He who dies unarmed on the road, goes unconditionally into the pit, thus teach the Islam's tenets.

Please now to imagine, for the completion of the picture, within this costume the complexion of a traveller exposed for months to the heat of the sun, and to the frost of the night blasts, withering gusts of dust, and the pervading sprinkling of thaw promiscuously ; add to all this the staring expression of his looks, and his fleshless skeleton, to get an approximate idea, even without knowing Wereshagin's masterly illustrations, how a dervish looks, and what I represented in person on my return towards the West.

The nomade within his tent, the merchant beside his bales of goods, the universally feared Kadi, the most distinguished and most important official, yea, the prince ruler himself had to lend a ready ear to my "Ya hu(r), ya hack !"—had to keep his right to his beard until I finished my prayer, after which ceremony he had sharply to plunge his fingers into his pocket, to get out the present ready to be offered at the words pronounced by my lips : "Sewab Lillah !" The blind superstition, and the awe—quite independently of their own will, as if instinctive—of mendicants and mad people, made, back in the age of classical Asiatic history, the dervish the king. And the power of his position is not only to his own person remunerative, but he can defend and aid even others by his intercession. In Meymene, when two of our travelling companions were suspected of being runaway slaves, and kept in custody, I had but to show myself to the tyrant detaining them, to release both instantly. And is it to be wondered at, if the feeling of such a security, of such a power—able to effect almost all that is just or equitable—of such a privilege and liberty, charms into ecstasy, the heart of a complete dervish, as I then had the right to consider myself to be, and recompenses him for many a want and privation in his material life of troubles ?

This lustre of dervishdom shone, however, but in that part of Middle Asia which enjoyed the equivocal happiness to be illumined by the genuine light of past centuries, whose twilight no ray of Western or European enlightenment could brighten. Life in these regions reminded me indeed only of the times that might have been under the Abbassides in Western Asia. In Afghanistan I perceived with antagonistic feelings a decided decrease of the holy radiance of my mendicant crown. Loud crying, and violent thundering, and all my "hocus-pocus" were ineffectual. I got nothing ; the toll-keepers levied contribution from me, after searching me to my very skin. What bitter days had I to pass amongst these Afghans, who paraded European shakoes and cartouches—how bitterly the pinchbeck of civilisation deceived me !

In spite of the well-known episode when in the company of the young prince of Herat, the six weeks' stay in that capital will remain unforgettable by me for ever. How agreeably thrilled the idea through my body, to feel myself near to that Persia which constitutes the eastern boundary of European civilisation ! In spite of the fact that Eastern Persia cannot but remind one of Turkestan, in respect of the insecurity of its roads, and the rough manners of its population, yet it kept in me that comforting consciousness that it formed the gate leading to the final goal of my adventurous travels, and thus to the hoped-for grateful acknowledgments of the merits of such a bold enterprise, whenever again in Europe.

The circumstance that I had to be encamped before this gate for weeks, while longing in feverish impatience for Europe, was a most painful one to my mind. To enhance the unpleasantness of my position, I had to bear here the hardest wants. Literally I famished—without even bread; I felt the want of raiment to cover my shivering limbs against the inclemency of the cold autumnal evenings, not to mention my hard struggle against the fanaticism of the ignorant Afghans, the issue of which made me sometimes truly afraid for my personal safety. To be under any circumstances safe, I chose, with a very correct psychological paradox, a bold step, by seeking the lion within his own den—that is, by selecting for my abode one of the dirtiest cells, half fallen to pieces, void of door or windows, in a caravanserai where it was well known that none but Afghans used to dwell. The greater part of them considered me a disguised Englishman; but some few bigots of the tribe of the Lohanis, who are easily satisfied by a few outer acknowledgments of religion, granted me some protection.

Most interesting proved to me the hours which I had to spend amidst the praying parties, on a terrace built in the middle of the yard. The sceptics looked at me with grim condemning eyes; rage radiated from out their orbits; yet they durst not actually do me any harm, as, according to the precepts of the Islam, it behoves men but to judge the open deed, leaving to God alone to fathom the secret intentions. In the precincts of this sacred place, similar to an asylum, not one might have been found ready to commence a quarrel with me.

While lying on my miserable straw couch, employed with reading, it happened often that some of the Afghans, who even in undress carried a small arsenal of arms about them, would find their way to my door, regaling me with nothing more hospitable than the following provoking conversation:—

A would say, "I bet the lameness of yonder leg is a work of my excellent Shikarpurean gun. I sent at Lahore some of the red-haired dogs to perdition; others escaped with broken limbs. Among the latter must he have saved his wretched life."

B said, "After all, I acknowledge myself very anxious to know how many thousand rupees that knave may get for his clever spying service. I dare say you remember yet the small shrivelled man who sold greens in Bokhara during some ten years, and now parades about on a richly caparisoned horse as Governor of Peshawur, bejewelled and begilt."

C said, "It is his good fortune indeed that Shir Ali Khan (God forgive him his sins!) became a serf of the unbelievers, and now needs to protect all Kafirs, else I might have paid him off sooner, in the clinking coin of my blade, than the Governor Dshornel [Governor-General] could pay him his reward."

Thus it went on in all possible variations, without my being allowed to betray any attention even to what they said, far less any fear. Such fear, as I mentioned before, would not have been, however, justifiable. Notwithstanding, this position proved to my mind very depressing, and I can say that I felt over-happy as I chanced to meet a Shiitic driver of beasts of burden from Herat, who proved willing to let me hire a lightly packed mule of his caravan going to Meshed. I did not pay him, for I had no money; but he chanced the possibility of my being able to pay him after my arrival there.

This wandering from Herat to Meshed, though it lasted but twelve days, was a worthy conclusion of my already chequered career, full of unspeakable troubles and sufferings. It was as late as the commencement of November, and in the high lands which separate Iran from Central Asia all was fast frozen. How I could endure several degrees of cold, especially during the night, unsheltered in the free air, in a poor dress, without the natural aid of warming my body by wholesome victuals, this astonishes, now I think of it, even myself. I remember having found one morning, at awaking, my tattered garment frozen to the ground that I lay on.

Some one must have upset the water-can in the night, purposely to annoy me, or by carelessness. I had first to break up the ice before I could rise. The Afghans lying beside me, well enveloped in their good fur cloaks, laughed at me and at my embarrassment; and treated me again with derision when, later on, with my teeth chattering, I requested from them the loan of a superfluous horse-cover.

Need I say that the first gleam reflected from the richly gilt cupola of the mosque of Imam Riza, in Meshed, smiled at me like the riches of heavenly happiness, the signal of "no more miseries henceforth?"

Indeed, it would be just as difficult to describe my turn of temper of that time, as the emotions at the commencement of my adventurous voyage. On the tedious marches through Khorassan, whose extent the Persian can but compare to old women's twaddle, these agreeable and gladdening thoughts raised me into the serenest, most cheerful temper.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-THIRD.

WANT OF MONEY.

DAME Wishart sharply interrupted the Laird's commonplaces about her looks and the weather.

"Very well, since you will have it that way," said the Laird, feeling himself altogether at a disadvantage, and not relishing the position, more particularly when it was his sister who spoke to

"SHE PUT OUT HER HAND."

"It's siller you want, Hugh. What's the sum?"

"You are abrupt enough, sister, to make one go away without saying a word about it."

"You may, if you like."

But the Laird did not like, especially as he could not help himself otherwise.

"I wish to explain to you——"

"What's the sum?" she interrupted.

"If you would only listen one moment, you would understand the whole position."

"What's the sum?" she repeated.

"I would tell you if you would allow me to explain——"

"What's the sum, and no fraising about it?"

him; "the sum is seven thousand, with a few hundreds for interest."

"You can renew if you like."

"No."

"What for?"

"Because the bond has fallen into the hands of a dissolute rascal, who wants the money."

The Laird was sometimes very severe upon spendthrifts, and could preach beautifully on the subject.

"You can borrow elsewhere."

"Not without paying a Jew's interest, that would bring me to the same pass as the present, and worse, in a twelvemonth."

"So you came to me as your only chance?"

"Yes."

"Seven—say eight thousand. It's a heap of siller," she said meditatively.

"Yes, but the property is worth twice that," observed Dalmahoy, beginning to feel himself again; "and if I can only find minerals, as I am almost sure of doing on Brunton's farm; why, there is no saying what wealth is in store for us."

"Aye," she replied drily, "but you've been seeking the minerals a long while, and you have not found them. You want eight thousand. Very well."

There was a long pause, during which the Laird eyed his sister eagerly, and she sat staring at her lap, nervously moving her fingers, and apparently considering the proposal. She put out her hand, drawing Grace towards her; then, with a curious twinkle in her faded eyes, she thrust her daughter towards Walter.

"There," she said, with a kind of vicious pleasure, "marry them, and you shall ha'e three times what you need."

"Oh, mother!" cried Grace, bursting into tears.

Walter rose, pale and agitated, taking Grace's hand tenderly in his own.

"Hush, Grace; she forgets."

The Laird became white, then red with chagrin. He got up, and with much dignity put back his chair as if in preparation to leave.

"I am sorry your mind is so weak, sister" (he knew that he was hitting her on the most sensitive part), "that you forget Wattie is already married. However, I see that you are resolved not to help me over this ditch, and so there is no more to be said."

"You're wrong, Hugh," answered the dame, in a dry hard voice. "Stupid as I am whiles, I have not forgotten that you have broken our paction, and that Wattie has wedded a useless thing from Rowanden—a fisherman's lass! I have not forgotten that you, between you, have made my daughter miserable! Make her happy as she was, and all that I have is yours; but you have broken her heart, and you come to me for help. Fie on you, Hugh!—and fie on you, Wattie! You should have begged your bread rather than come here for the siller you would not take when it was offered to you, with the life of the best lass that ever drew breath. No, man; no, I do not forget. I mind well."

"Mother, mother, mother!" cried Grace in bitter shame, dropping on her knees and hiding her face on the dame's lap.

With a frightened look the mother bent over her child, and she seemed to become slowly conscious that in upbraiding her brother and Walter she was most cruelly wounding Grace. The furrows on her face were drawn closer, and deepened with pain; her bony hands played nervously with Grace's hair, the while her eyes seemed to darken with fury.

"Whisht you, my lamb," she muttered in a quivering voice; "I did not mean to hurt you. Whisht you, now. I have forgotten you too often, and I did it again to-day. But I'm growing old, Gracie, and I dare say it's just as well, or better, that you are not taken from me, for I could not live long without you. I ken what you are, and that's what makes me wroth wi' these fools, that could pass you by, though it's the better for me—it's the better for me. Whisht you, now, and I'll not say another word—the stupid gomerils, that could shut their e'en to such a jewel. Ah! they have little notion of what they have lost, but I ken, I ken—the idiots they are—but whisht you, my bonnie lamb; you'll soon forget."

Alternately trying to coax her daughter into resignation, and uttering angry reproaches against her brother and Walter, the old lady seemed to forget the presence of the gentlemen.

To them the position was humiliating in the extreme. The Laird was indignant, yet conscious of having behaved ill, and assumed a coolness which he did not feel. Walter heartily sympathised with his aunt, and with her half-doiterated expressions of love for her daughter, notwithstanding the harshness with which she judged his conduct.

"Will you let me speak to your mother alone, Grace?" he said, stooping down and placing his arm round her to assist her to rise.

How the touch thrilled her! She got up immediately, and except that her eyes were red, and the face pale, there was no sign of the recent outburst of grief. She was calm and thoughtful as usual, and quietly set about arranging the cushion at her mother's back.

"You can say what you wish to say before me, Walter," she said softly, "and my mother will understand you the more readily when I am beside her."

Walter hesitated, for he was going to speak about Teenie; but he had such faith in whatever Grace advised that he obeyed.

The Laird stood swinging his glasses, looking as if he had no greater interest than that of simple curiosity in the proceedings.

Dame Wishart's face had become dull; her thoughts were wandering away to other days, and to hopes indirectly associated with the present circumstances; but she seemed already to have forgotten the scene which had just taken place.

She sat staring at the place where her daughter had knelt, and muttering to herself words which were unintelligible to the listeners.

Walter laid his hand gently on hers.

"I wish to speak to you, aunt. Will you listen?"

"What is it about—not the siller?"

"No, we do not wish to ask you for that now. What I have to say is about Grace and myself."

Her face cleared again, and her wandering faculties seemed to be concentrated upon her nephew's words.

"Say away."

"I want you, aunt, to understand that my father is in no way to blame for the breach of the engagement you and he made for Grace and myself. The fault is entirely mine——"

"And mine, mother," interrupted Grace. "I refused to have him when I knew that he thought better of Teenie Thorston."

"But I might have held my tongue, Grace," he said sadly.

"And I would have found out the truth when it was too late to mend matters," she replied firmly. "No, Walter, it is best as it is, if my poor mother could only see it as we do."

"Choot!" cried the dame angrily, "I see it better than you do. You don't think I'm blind or doited, do you? I tell you, Wattie, you ought to have spoken to me as well as to Grace. But now that you've had your fling, see if you can pay the piper. I will not."

It would have been useless to have attempted to explain to her that she was, or seemed to be, incapable of understanding anything at the time when Walter spoke to Grace.

"I only wish you to relieve my father of any blame," said Walter earnestly. "Blame me for it all, and try to think kindly of my wife."

"I'll not think of her at all. I dare say she's good enough for you—but you shall not have the siller."

She reiterated that resolution as if she found a pleasure in the mere sound.

"At least you will understand, aunt, that in what I have done I was trying to do what I believed to be right, and therefore best."

"I understand nothing but that you have broken the bargain made between your father and me, and that you have made her unhappy—though she's a fool for her pains."

Grace, now quite calm, touched her mother's arm hastily and, with something like a flush of pride—

"I tell you, mother, Walter acted as I wished him, and you vex me and pain him when you say that he has made me unhappy."

Dame Wishart turned sharply upon her daughter.

"Do you think you can cheat me? Have I not seen how poorly you were, though you would not say it? Have I not seen you in the weary nights when you thought I was sleeping?—but I'm not aye sleeping when my eyes are shut. Have I not seen you greeting to yourself, glowering at nothing, and trying to make believe that you were reading the paper or a book? I've seen it all; I know how wae and weary is your heart; and it's his fault.—Look at her, Wattie, look at the bonnie white face, and the colour that's on it now because I'm telling truth. Look at her—has your wife such a face as that?—she cannot have such a heart. You have cast all that away; but look at her and you'll ken why I am bitter against you, and bitter against your father, and why you shall not have the siller."

"Will nothing make you spare me, mother, if you will not spare them?" cried Grace again, confused, pained, and vexed.

"Choots! you're but a bairn."

To Walter, his aunt's words afforded a bitter revelation. He seemed to awaken as from a pleasant sleep to the full knowledge that he was guilty of a terrible crime. It was only at this moment that he really understood the sacrifice Grace had made for him. Blinded by his own selfish love for Teenie, and with a stupidity partly due to his want of that vanity which induces some men to fancy every woman who speaks kindly is in love with them, he had accepted literally her declaration that she would be content in seeing him married to the woman he loved. Still blind and stupid, he had regarded her friendship for Teenie, the frank and devoted services she rendered her, as guarantees that she was satisfied, and that whatever disappointment she might have felt at first had been completely forgotten. Now he learned that she was still suffering, and he could partly imagine what she must have suffered on his account.

All his senses were quickened by the pain of this discovery; he remembered so many things he had done and said which must have been torture to her—he looked back upon so many trifles which must have wounded her acutely—that he marvelled at her submission and at her generous concealment of it all, whilst, for himself, he could not have felt more humble or more afflicted had he been found guilty of murder. And it was a kind of murder that he had perpetrated—he had murdered her youth and doomed her to long years of sorrow.

If he had only awakened sooner! But the wrong was done and could never be requited.

He could not speak; he only gazed at her with such sad, regretful eyes, that Grace could not bear to meet them. She would have given worlds if she could have foreseen what her mother had intended to say at this meeting, so that she might have prevented Walter from being present.

The awkward pause was broken by the Laird, who, without the least evidence of vexation or disappointment in his manner, advanced to his sister.

"Good-bye—come over to Dalmahoy if you can some time between this and the next three or four months, for about the end of that period the sale will probably take place, and I shall no longer be able to offer you hospitality there. May I make a suggestion? I would advise you to tell your man of business to buy the property for you; it is worth all that is likely to be offered for it, and in that way you might still keep it in the family, as it were."

"And let you sit rent-free," said the dame drily.

The Laird made a deprecatory movement with his glasses.

"Upon my word you are too suspicious; I give you a useful hint, and you instantly charge me with doing so for my own profit. Well, perhaps it is natural for you who have money to suspect one who has none—especially when that one is your brother. Will you allow me to come and dine with you occasionally, when I can find no other table than yours? I shall keep out of the way of your friends, if possible; and I shall try not to borrow half-crowns. You will find me the most discreet of poor relations—indeed I would go into the poor's house at once, but that my being there might be somewhat discreditable to you."

"You know whose fault it is," she muttered, gazing at him vaguely as if her mind were wandering in search of his meaning.

"Undoubtedly, no one has a better right to know than I have," he went on; but he was not so successful this time in concealing the bitterness he felt, under his assumed air of jaunty sarcasm. "Some men in my position would endeavour to excuse themselves—I don't. Some men would blame their luck—I don't. Some men would be disposed to blame you, sister, for refusing me this temporary assistance which would save the property—but I don't. You are quite right, there is no excuse for poverty—unless it may be the ability to endure it with fortitude. I shall endeavour to display that commendable talent."

"It'll be the first talent you ever displayed, Hugh."

The Laird put on his glasses and looked at her.

"You are remarkably well to-day, Sarah. I congratulate you; may your present health continue long. Good-bye."

As he pressed her hand, there was a painful twitching of the dame's features, as if some relenting thoughts were passing through her mind which she could not or would not utter.

The Laird paid no heed: he took his leave in the same friendly manner as if the interview had not determined the ruin of Dalmahoy.

Walter, bending over her and pressing her hand, whispered—

"Try to forgive me, aunt; I did not know the harm I was doing."

Full of pain, and full of regret for the trouble he had brought upon Grace, upon the dame, and his father, he was loyal in every thought to his wife. The position was extremely awkward. To have saved his father's property he would not have married Grace, for in his eyes that would have been the blackest injustice; but to have spared her pain he would have fulfilled the engagement from which she had released him, and he would have tried to forget Teenie. As matters stood now he could only regret his blindness, and hope that Grace felt less than her mother imagined.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FOURTH.

IN THE GLOAMING.

GRACE followed the Laird down-stairs. She saw how the placid face became rapidly scored with wrinkles; how the jaws fell, the head and shoulders stooped as if under a heavy burthen.

"Uncle, you must have some wine before you go," she said, drawing him into the parlour.

"Dear me! you're there, Grace," he exclaimed, instantly straightening his back and trying to assume the customary expression of calm self-complacency. But he saw her pitying look, he knew that she had observed him, and head and shoulders drooped again as he said faintly, "Yes, child, I'll take some wine—I require something to stimulate me just now, for I feel ridiculously weak."

He took a glass of sherry and drank it hastily, which was quite unusual with the Laird, who liked to sip and relish every drop of his wine. He filled the glass again, and was more patient with it; but his nerves were evidently much shaken.

"You'll not think too hardly of my mother, uncle," she pleaded softly; "she is in a strange mood to-day; but she will do what you want by-and-by."

The Laird shook his head and tried to smile, but failed.

"I shall not think hardly of her, my child, because she is doing just what I would have done myself, and I think she is quite right. Wattie is a fool, and I am no better to have yielded to him; but——"

He took some more wine instead of finishing the sentence; he was thinking of the blunder those confounded lawyers had caused him to make about the Methven estate.

"She will give you the money before you require it," repeated Grace.

"There is not the least likelihood of that; she is in one of the stubborn moods for which our family is famous, and once 'No' is said, 'No' it remains, however much we may become convinced that it ought to be 'Yes.' But I would not care for myself, or for the boys—they can manage—but what is to become of the girls, Heaven knows. They are helpless creatures, and can neither toil nor spin—maybe on that account, like the lilies of the field, they will have the fine raiment which is their chief concern ; but the lilies have a certain beauty which recommends them to the eyes of men, and I can't say as much for my daughters."

With that wicked joke he finished his wine and walked out to the hall. There Walter was waiting, and there Pate instantly joined his mistress, rubbing his nose against her dress and seeking the recognition which was at present denied him.

The servant was holding the door open, the groom was holding the horse, and so Walter had no opportunity to speak to Grace, of which she was very glad.

"Will you drive down to the gate, sir, and I will join you there," said Walter, as his father stepped into the gig.

Dalmahoy drove slowly down the avenue. Walter took Grace's shrinking hand ; without a word spoken she knew what he meant, and, although her heart trembled at the idea of speaking to him alone just after the trial up-stairs, she felt afraid of doing anything that might appear strange in the eyes of the servant Mary, who was still holding the door open. She could not explain to him there : his pale face and sad eyes pleaded, and because Mary was looking on, she yielded.

But she yielded hurriedly, as if she were anxious to get breath, and without hat or shawl she walked out with him. Mary was a dull lass ; but she knew something of the relation in which the cousins had formerly stood to each other, and she could not help observing the flurried manner of her mistress.

There was a footpath leading down to the gate through the narrow belt of wood on one side of the avenue, from which it was entirely screened by a high trim hedge : a soft moss-grown path, in which there was a perpetual twilight, cool even when the sun was hottest. Now in the gloaming, when the trees were tipped with the golden radiance of the western sky, and the windows of the house were aflame, the path lay in deep shadow, crossed at intervals by bars of silver light.

They proceeded down this path. Grace had withdrawn her hand ; but she walked close beside him, her eyes searching the ground as if seeking there some explanation of the nervous, uneasy feeling which possessed her. She attributed it to the exposure her mother had made of the secret which she had guarded so well, as she thought, and most anxiously from him.

His face wore the blank expression of one who has heard some terrible news and has not yet had time to realise it. They walked on silently and slowly, she now and then glancing sideways at him, wondering what he wanted to say, half divining and wholly wishing that she could have escaped from him without adding to the pain which her mother had caused.

The Laird walked the horse through the gateway, and drew up. His head was bowed again, and he sat for several minutes, unconscious that there was somebody standing by the step of the gig, softly calling to him. A touch on the knee roused him.

"Bless my soul, Christina ! how did you come here ? You startled me from profound cogitations," he exclaimed, head and shoulders erect instantly. Why didn't you come with us ?"

"I did not mean to come," she answered in short awkward sentences. "I was going home ; but I was anxious—about the money. What does she say ?"

Without replying, he looked at her searchingly.

"What's the matter with you ?—you're like a ghost."

And in the grey gloaming, in her light dress, and with the bonnie face so white and anxious, the Laird was quite justified in the comparison he made.

"What does she say ?" repeated Teenie stubbornly.

"Oh, just an old woman's say—a little spiteful, and a little wrong-headed ; nothing more. Are you going up to the house ? or will you jump in, and Walter can either walk back or get up behind."

He was not disposed to answer her question just then ; indeed, he was anxious to cheat himself into the belief that Dame Wishart would change her mind. Teenie understood him.

"Where is Walter ?" was all she said.

"You'll meet him coming down the avenue."

She passed in at the gate. The Laird gazed after her, then drew breath, relieved. He was glad to be alone.

She strained her eyes through the shadows of the trees to catch the first glimpse of her husband. It never occurred to her to question why he had remained behind. There was a bend in the road ; she would see him as soon as she reached that. She went on, now hurriedly, and again with heavy steps and hesitating. She did not wish to go up to the house ; and yet she was half inclined to go, for she wished to see Grace. Dalmahoy was not inclined to tell her the result of the interview ; she knew what it would be, but she wanted confirmation, and to know why the boon was refused. Walter might refuse to tell all in his desire to spare her, and she could not insist if she saw that it vexed him. She could cross-examine Grace, who was he spirit of truth, and would confess everything. But Teenie had a shrinking dislike to go to the house, remembering how bitterly the dame had spoken on her last visit.

She reached the bend—still no sign of him. Presently she heard voices, low and earnest : Grace and Walter : they were on the other side of the hedge.

Teenie called, but was not heard. She looked for some gap, through which to reach them. There was none ; the hedge, close, thick, and high, presented an impregnable barrier, right and left, as far as the eye could reach in that dim, melancholy light.

The voices were farther down towards the gate. She followed, and called again—still unheard. Then words—fragments of sentences—struck her ears, and chilled her. She could not hear all—only scraps now and then, and she was left to fill up the blanks for herself.

She walked on side by side with the speakers, hands clutching at her cloak, lips tightly closed, and making no further effort to let them know she was there.

The cooing of the stock-dove, the loud song of many birds, the chatter of rooks, the distant sound of voices—"Gee-up," "Wo-ben;" a shepherd's whistle or shout to his dog, and a faint rumble of wheels; these were the sounds which filled the air.

Walter turned to his companion with that sad earnest face which he had shown often of late; but he was trying to smile at present.

"Now that we are here, Grace, and alone, I scarcely know how to speak to you; for it seems like impertinence on my part to accept literally all that your mother said; and yet there was something in it which made me fear—no; it made me feel that I had done a great wrong to one I love. Yes—love is the word, for I do love you, Grace; and in saying it, I am neither in word nor heart disloyal to Teenie. She knows it, and she loves you too. But I wish—aye, very fervently wish—that I could believe your mother might have been deceived as to your thoughts about me."

How the poor girl's heart shook, and her limbs threatened to fail her! But she understood her ground now, and she took his arm with the frank confidence of a sister.

"Thank you, Walter; I should be sorry if you doubted that my regard for you was less than yours for me. I am unchanged; but you must remember what an invalid my dear mother is. She had one fixed idea—the union of Craighburn and Dalmahoy. It has clung to her through all her wandering fancies, and she cannot understand how it should be possible that—that—"

She stammered; and he, with much bitter self-reproach, filled up the pause.

"That I should be so cruel to you, and so base—so miserably selfish as to accept from you the sacrifice of an arrangement which was dear to you on her account, if not on your own."

("I am unchanged," Teenie heard, and understood better than her husband; then from him, "So cruel to you . . . so base." These words bewildered and then angered her.)

Grace pressed his arm, and looked up at him with a forced gaiety.

"Come, sir, you must not be too vain; you must recollect that you are a minister, and married."

"It is because I recollect both that I feel so wretched."

(Teenie heard that, and misconstrued it.)

Grace trembled again with vague terrors; she thought of Teenie, and felt that there was something very guilty in this interchange of sentiment, although both were perfectly honest in thought and word. She determined it should be the last interview of the kind they should have. But the old intense passion for this man held her firmly, and she could not run away from him, as she felt ought to be her immediate action.

"You frighten me when you speak that way.—Let us part now. Good-bye."

She looked at his face; it was cold and hard, with the expression of a man who, conscious of guilt, is resolved to meet the inevitable consequences.

"Not yet," he said hurriedly; "you are not to go yet." I want to try to understand our position; I want you to forgive me."

"For what?"—as if she did not understand!

He turned his eyes full upon her, and she shrank under their gaze. The position was to him so serious, that even the most kindly attempt to gloss it over, or escape it, was disagreeable.

"I wish to see the worst, Grace," he said quietly, and as if she had not spoken; "will you help me?"

She turned away her head. How could she help him to see what she had striven so hard to conceal?

"If I can," she said with quivering lips.

"Tell me then"—he was trying to speak calmly—"if we had it all to do over again, with the knowledge we now possess, would you have me act in the same way as I have done?"

"Yes." She found the word difficult to utter, but she did utter it, steadfastly.

"You do not blame me, then?"

"No."

She could say that firmly, and without difficulty; she loved him too much to blame him.

"God bless you, Grace, for that assurance; although I know it is your brave, good heart that speaks, and not your reason. I blame myself so much, that it is a relief to feel that you wish to believe me innocent. I did try to do what was best; I felt bound to go to you when I understood my own feelings, and to tell you; I was ready and willing at the least word from you to try to forget Teenie. You would not speak that word. I was selfish, and forgot that you were too generous to speak it—forgot that, in a lower nature than yours, mere pride would have prevented it being spoken. I was blind; I see now, and know that I should have been silent to spare you pain."

"And then Teenie would have suffered. You did right to speak; your silence would have been the cruellest wrong to me. Trust me, Walter, I shall be quite happy when I see you so."

He pressed her hand gratefully as he answered—"Good, generous, brave as ever! But my happiness now, Grace, depends on yours."

(Teenie's hand sprung up to her breast, as if she felt a sudden pang there. She wished they were at the gate; hurried forward a few steps, then paused, and again kept pace with the others.)

She could look at him steadily now; she could even smile frankly at his morbid sensitiveness, so loving was she.

"You must not praise me too much, Walter, or I shall think you are making fun of me. Now let us look at the position practically. An arrangement was made for us—neither you nor I had a say in it, although we were willing to implement it, as the lawyers say. Well, you discovered that one desirable element of the bargain was wanting, and you sensibly told me—you were bound to tell me—and that made it better for both of us. We broke up the agreement. Suppose a man sold me a horse as sound in wind and limb; upon going to the stable he found the horse had been down meanwhile, and spoiled its knees. Would you call him an honest man if he did not tell me of the misfortune? and wouldn't you think I was quite justified in saying I didn't want a horse with broken knees? It's the same case exactly, I won't have a husband with broken knees any more than a horse."

"If you are satisfied, that is all I care to know," he answered, smiling.

"Very well, then; we'll make another bargain, this time for ourselves: we shall never return to this subject, and we shall say nothing about our gossip to Teenie—it would only annoy her to no purpose."

"I will do whatever you wish, Grace."

He unlatched the little gate which opened to the avenue; she passed through, he followed, and both were somewhat startled to find themselves face to face with Teenie.

LEAVES AND FLOWERS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HALF-HOURS IN THE GREEN LANES."

LEAVES.

THE true naturalist stands much in the position of the prince in the story, who knew the meaning of the notes of birds, and could sympathise and hold communion with them. His knowledge is rarely of a commercial kind, but it obtains for him an enjoyment which the possession of wealth cannot command. The "Great Book" always lies open before him, so that though he runs, he can read. The outward shapes of natural objects, and otherwise dry facts, from beneath their hard Latin names, speak to him in a language eloquent with the truth.

Let us see if some of the best-known and most easily procured natural objects cannot teach us lessons we did not know before. The flash of a new truth across the mind is always a pleasant incident to the student, and not unfrequently marks a mental epoch in his life. What more common things could we ask Nature to give us than flowers and leaves? At this season of the year, particularly, these objects come to us with rich associations. Æsthetically there can be little doubt as to their charms, although scientifically the student often finds himself hard put to it to strictly define what is a leaf and what a flower. How nearly the poetic mind, in its true "seership," approaches the scientific, is seen in the case of Goethe. That poet it was, and not a botanist, who first saw that flowers were only metamorphosed leaves. It matters not that he failed to couch his theory in botanical terms; the truth was there. Indeed, it remains yet to be seen whether we have not imported into the popular idea of what is a plant, and what an animal, a good many arbitrary and foregone conclusions. Nature knows no such hard and fast distinctions between the two kingdoms as the hastily generalising mind can perceive. The common ground which Haeckel, the German naturalist, proposes to set apart as an intermediate and neutral province between the animals and vegetables, is occupied by scores of thousands of species about whose true natures science is not yet in a position to speak.

From this "no man's ground" of the "infinitely little" the animal and vegetable kingdoms strike off, and become farther asunder as we trace the radiating lines towards their highest ascents. And not alone in the shapes, internal structures, and mutual relations, are the lowest organisms (whether animal or vegetable) connected, but also in their chemical compositions.

We have spoken of the animal and vegetable kingdoms as becoming farther unlike each other the more we trace them from their common ground of departure. But it ought to be noticed that from the lowest stages the animal kingdom has been grouped and separated into a greater number of types than was either necessary or possible in the vegetable. In plants there needs no special organs, such as hearts, to pump the nutritive fluids to every part, as is required in animals. The delicate fibrils of the roots, in lowly plants as in forest trees, absorb the dissolved mineral matter about them. Capillary attraction carries this fluid higher up the plant, in antagonism to the law of gravitation, and the constant evaporation of moisture from the leaves induces as constant a flow of sap upwards to replace it. Meantime the wind is adding its help to the other inorganic forces by means of which the circulation of fluids in vegetables is carried on without special organs. The swaying to and fro of leaves, twigs, and branches, assists to press the juices to the farthest leaf or flower-bud.

Still the conditions under which plants of all kinds live, exercise a greater influence upon them than similar circumstances do on animals. Hence we have every condition of physical geography corresponded to by a similar adaptation of vegetable forms. Whilst animals have the power of more or less moving about in search of food, the fixed condition of plants makes them thoroughly dependent on external surroundings for their nutrition. Not the least suggestive difference between animals and plants lies in the relative abundance and scarcity of a certain chemical element in the higher forms. Plants of the higher kinds have much less nitrogen in their tissues than animals possess. There is a sufficient reason for this distinction. Nitrogen is the force-giver in all living structures; and those forms expend most force, or are most active, which contain the largest quantity of this element. Owing to their dependency on mechanical and chemical laws, plants are not called on to exert anything like the force required by animals.

Small though the quantity be which enters into the composition of plants, it is the great reservoir whence animals obtain their never-failing supply. And, singularly in keeping with the fact that the proportion of nitrogen is always related to the expenditure of force, we must note that in the early stages of the young plant, when a certain degree of activity is shown, the tissues actually contain more of this force-giver than at any other period. The chief stimulant to plants, in the absence of the nervous system which operates in animals, is that part of light which resides in the yellow of the solar spectrum. Whenever this is operating on leaves, the latter accumulate the carbon of the small percentage which is always present in the atmosphere as carbonic acid, add it to the structure of the plant or tree as woody matter, and liberate the oxygen which is so essentially necessary to animal life. In the absence of light, no oxygen is given off by the leaves, but on the contrary, a very small percentage of carbonic acid, which represents the waste that has taken place during the day in the vegetable tissues. All the fungi behave as animals, in giving off carbonic acid, and requiring oxygen.

Let us turn from the physiological structure of plants to their shapes. It is a fact well known to every botanist, that plants can be more or less accurately separated into stems and leaves. Leaves are in reality only a continuation and expansion of the bark—the roots but a continuation of the stem. That plants change if the conditions surrounding them are altered, there can be no doubt. The “monstrosities” in our garden-flowers show this fact plainly. Indeed, these further help us to understand more of the actual nature of floral organs. Thus we find the commonest monstrosity (from a botanical point of view, although not from a horticultural) to be double flowers. Here we have stamens converted into petals, and in our roses, not unfrequently the petals assume both the shapes and the colours of leaves, thus showing how easy is the gradation under certain conditions. One great reason—perhaps the greatest—for this common modification of plants when cultivated in gardens, is that they are then surrounded with richer nourishment, and are, moreover, withdrawn from that keen “struggle for existence” they have to fight out in a natural state with other plants that seek to crowd them out altogether. In a garden, weeding protects them against this liability, so that they have nothing to do, so to speak, but flourish.

If we take ferns as an example of the changes which are produced by richer and poorer, drier and moister conditions, we are perhaps better able to verify the above principle than with flowering plants. There is not a species of British fern that has not several well-marked varieties. When they are furnished with additional stimulants to growth, they become “proliferous.” When they do not find enough nourishment, there is a tendency for the fronds to become pinnated, or cleft, as in the hart’s-tongue fern; or if the fronds are already pinnated, for them to become pinnatifid. How the shapes of leaves are determined by the greater or less abundance of nourishment supplied, is well shown in the bramble. Not only the largest and most luxuriant, but the most complex of the compound leaves of this plant are at the bottom, and the smallest and simplest towards the summit, where the supply is much lowered. Every gardener knows that many cultivated plants, when placed in rich soils, produce leaves instead of flowers. The strawberry is a case in point, few plants being worth anything after three years, on account of the leaves increasing in size and number, and thus absorbing the nutriment. The leaves of the lime, horse-chestnut, and of other trees where they are so arranged that they lie over each other, and thus partially shade them from the light, are seen to be unequal-sided, the larger side of the mid-rib being that most exposed to the stimulating action of the sunlight.

MY IRISH STORY.

BY NUGENT ROBINSON.

"HE IS BOUND TO FIGHT HER GRANDFATHER."

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

IT'S a car from the Royal," exclaimed Micky in great excitement. "Och, begorra, it's the wan that tuk the fightin' doctor from Westport, an, blur an' agers, they're bet be the snow!"

Fighting doctor! Who's the fighting doctor?" I asked.

"Ould Finnerty, no less, av the militia. Begorra, he'd have ye out for sneezin' crucked, so ye'd betther mind. I'll go bail he has the pistols wud him. He never thravels wudout thim. He down'd sivin min wud thim deadly tools."

By this time we had reached the scene of accident. One of the wheels of the car had noiselessly and unostentatiously scattered its spokes, which lay strewn along the road like so many valiant soldiery who had fallen in defence of some isolated fortress. The fighting doctor had proceeded in advance, in the hope of obtaining assistance at a wayside sheeling, and the driver was, bitterly lamenting the ill turn that his luck had played him.

"What betther cud I hope for, comin' wud that ould bloodthirsty villyan? He's goin' to fight a jewel beyant at Phoul a Dhonninel, the haythen. Goin' to kill a man on Christmas Day, the ould varmint, av he can. Och, wirra, such a Christmas Eve! It's in the chapel I ought to be, on me bades, let alone bein' out wud a murtherin' ould Turk on a lonely common, wud nothin' betune me an' heaven but the snow, and a blast that wud cut the back teeth out av an ostrich."

"Hould yer whist!" cried Micky Delany, leading him rather roughly aside, "hould yer whist, an' mebbe we cud set it all right atther all."

Here my charioteer dropped his voice into a confidential whisper, and after some very impressive pantomime, in which he would appear to be endeavouring to induce the other to come round to his views, he ended by exclaiming in a loud tone—

"Av ye don't take me offer ye'll be here till the new year, an' the divil mind ye for an ungrateful bosthune."

Micky Delany's proposition was simply to impress the services of the second horse, to drive tandem, and give a lift to the driver and passenger of the useless car, leaving the luckless vehicle to its fate.

I offered no objection, and in a few minutes the fighting doctor's carpet bag was transferred—a rough sort of tandem established, and the injured car placed safely inside a ditch.

Dr. Finnerty, whom we picked up at a distance of about a mile, seemed exceedingly well pleased with the change in his rate of travelling.

"Their conveyances here, sir, are of the most infayrior description. Their horses, sir, are only fit for the knacker. The owner ought to be hanged. The driver ought to be shot."

The doctor jerked out his sentences broadside at me, and threw forward his wify little frame at every final word.

Having offered him a "nip" from my flask, which he tossed off with a flourish as if it were a pint bumper, and having accepted in return a pinch of snuff strong enough to blow the lid off a plate-chest, we warmed up considerably.

"It's a strange night for a drive. I'm on a strange errand, sir," observed the doctor.

"A case of surgery?" I remarked inquiringly.

"Oho! oho!" and his laugh flew across the snow, and I thought of Gabriel Grubb and the goblins. "Oho! there may be surgical assistance required. A leg may have to be amputated. A body may have to be cut open. Do you see this box, sir?" producing as he spoke a dark oblong box, the brass rims of which shone up like the plates upon a coffin-lid. "There's a brace of surgical instruments in this box that have made holes in men's bodies before now. Oho!"

"I imagine from the shape of the box that it contains pistols, doctor."

"I don't say what they are. I say that they can bark and bite. They will bark before long. They will bite before long, if I get the chance."

A thought flashed across me like lightning. This bloodthirsty doctor—this drive in the snow—this case of pistols—led directly to the "mess" referred to in my cousin Geoffry's telegram. A duel was to be fought, and Geoffry was to be one of the targets.

I was turning rapidly in my mind how I should pump the doctor, when he asked—

"Are you going as far as Leenawn?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Then I can take the car on to Carrig na Golliogue?"

"I am going to Carrig na Gomogue."

He gave a short whistle, and taking a very close look at me—

"You're not going to Shulawn Castle, eh?"

"I really don't know where I am going to. I received a telegram from a cousin of mine, asking me to come to an inn and——"

"I know all about it. You're Mr. Greville. I introduce myself—Denis Phelim Finnerty, surgeon to the Phoul a Phouca Militia. We have the same business in hand. Let us settle the preliminaries," and Doctor Finnerty rubbed his hands briskly together, as if he was endeavouring to flatten a bullet between his palms.

"You must really enlighten me," I said.

"You are new to the business. Are you prepared to act, sir, without seeing your principal. I am."

"Before I reply to your question, I should wish to hear your version of the story."

This was to ascertain the exact state of things from his point of view.

"You are welcome to it, sir. Your man has been sent a message. No gentleman wearing the Queen's scarlet can refuse to meet another, when that other is his equal."

"Granted. And may I ask who has sent him this message?"

"The lady's father, sir, her natural and lawful protector."

"Father! Can it be possible that my cousin is going to fight an old man?"

"He is bound to fight her grandfather if necessary. He'll be horsewhipped in his barrack-square if he shows the white feather. Here's Leenawn, sir," and the doctor alighted from the car on to the steps of the hotel, with the agility that laughed in the teeth of gout, or rheumatism.

Here was a pretty situation of affairs. My cousin Geoffry involved in a duel with some elderly gentleman, in whose ashes glowed their wonted fires. But why or wherefore? Geoffry, with all his careless ways, was incapable of doing a dishonourable act. Of this I felt thoroughly assured; yet that there must have been grave, painfully grave offence given to provoke this ultimatum there could be no possibility of doubt. Doctor Finnerty had evidently assumed that I was proceeding to Carrig na Golliogue for the purpose of acting as second to my cousin; and it was now painfully apparent to me that my kinsman required my services in this very unenviable capacity, and hence his telegram. *

When the belligerent physician rejoined me, a strong aroma of whiskey punch emanating from his person, he instantly repeated his inquiry as to my power to act in the absence of my principal. I informed him that as yet I had not been informed by my cousin of the nature of the contretemps, and that I would be glad to be more fully posted up in the matter.

"Your cousin will post you up, sir, I'll go bail. Talk of the weather. There will be snow before morning," and rolling the collar of his cloak over his ears, he spoke no other word until we jerked up opposite a long straggling building, situated on the side of the road, which proved to be the hostelry to which I had been so mysteriously and unexpectedly summoned.

I was ushered into a dingy apartment, redolent of the perfume of damp turf. Upon inquiring for Mr. Greville, I was informed by a young lady in bare feet that he was "convaynient." This young lady commiserated my condition by such exclamations as "Och wirra! but ye must be kilt wud the cowl. What brought ye out, ye crayture, sich a cruel night? A sup o' sperrits 'ill save your life. Rowl off your coat, an' get foreninst the fire."

My gay and festive cousin greeted me with considerable warmth, and upon my gravely questioning him as to the dilemma into which he had plunged himself, to my irritation and astonishment he burst out laughing.

"This is no laughing matter, Geoffry," I exclaimed angrily.

"'Pon my life I know it isn't, and yet it is so exquisitely absurd that I can only see it from the apex of its absurdity," and he burst out again.

"Will you be good enough to inform me why you brought me here, and if I have come upon a fool's errand?" I burst out angrily.

"Don't fizz up that way, old man," cried my cousin. "Have a liquor, and you shall hear it all."

I adopted his suggestion.

"The fact is that at a ball at Athlone last month I met one of the most piquante, exquisite, fascinating, bewildering little Irish girls that ever planted a dainty foot upon a four-leaved shamrock. She was stopping for a few days with some friends who resided near the town, and in these few days I saw as much of her as I possibly could, and in these few days I discovered that she possessed but one fault—namely, a heap of romance laid on at the highest possible pressure. In fact she is a Lydia Languish, Anno Domini 187—. Eh bien, mon brave, I followed her to her mountain home, and put up at this sumptuous and palatial hostelry; I asked permission to make myself known to her father, a splendid Irish Sir Anthony Absolute, but she would not have me meet him for worlds. Our interviews were all mysteriously secret, and stolen, as if our respective lives were to pay the forfeit of discovery. One day we met under the shadow of a clump of turf—this is a very open country; another day behind the solitary tree in the barony—always accompanied though by an abigail—till one unlucky afternoon, last Thursday, by Jove! Sir Anthony, who was returning from shooting, dropped upon us just as I had asked her to be my wife, and was sealing the delicious "Yes" in the stereotyped and orthodox manner, and then, mon cher, there was a shame. He wanted to shoot me then and there, but kindly postponed it until you arrived. He sent me a hostile message through a wiry little doctor, who seems anxious to have blood at any price, true to the instincts of his profession. This little gallipot warrior has departed for Westport, for his 'barking irons,' and this is the state of the poll for you, and isn't it an exquisite piece of fooling?"

"Is this gentleman a lunatic?" I asked.

"Not quite."

"Is he a person of position?"

"As good as any in the County Galway, or any other county."

"Did you offer any explanation?"

"As long as the road from this to Westport. I could have sold it by the mile. Of course I couldn't say that it was his daughter's fault."

"And he won't listen to reason?"

"He'll listen to nobody but his medical adviser, and that gentleman, as I have already told you, will have nothing short of blood."

"And what is this hot-headed, foolish, unchristian-like old man's name?" I asked in thorough disgust.

"In the first place," responded my kinsman, "he is not old, mark that! and in the second place, he is not unchristian-like, as he is the most charitable man in this or any other district."

"But his name—what is his name?"

"His name is Myles Maurice Carew."

"What!" I exclaimed, bounding to my feet; "is it Myles Carew formerly of the Blue Dragoons?"

"The same man; but what is the meaning of this? Do you know him?"

"Do I know him! why, he was my father's most intimate friend, although much his junior."

"By Jove! I often heard my father speak of him, now that you mention it. Hip! hooray!"

* * * * *

Of course I interviewed Myles Carew in his stronghold at Carrig na Golliogue.

Of course I arranged the preliminaries, not of a duel, but of a meeting between his romantic daughter and my kinsman.

Of course we enjoyed ourselves to our hearts' content. I believe that I found the Irish whiskey too much for me, but this is irrelevant. Doctor Finnerty came out like a hero, and narrated his duelling experiences with all the gusto of a man who had stood his ground in the fifteen acres; but inside of this line of fire, his heart was big, and in the right place.

I did not leave Carrig na Golliogue for a fortnight—I wish that I was there now.

* * * * *

I have just received a note from Mr. Geoffry Greville, from Gibraltar. It refers to the sponsorship of a little lady in whose career I am supposed to take a special interest.

Heigh ho! I envy Geoffry, but I will take another summer out of myself for all that.

MY EARLY ADVENTURES

AN AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH, BY ARMINIUS VAMBÉRY.

CHAPTER THE EIGHTH.

As the reader of my books of travel may have learned, the Lieutenant-Governor of Khorassan transformed me from a mendicant dervish into a well-to-do Oriental traveller. I got good horses for myself and my follower, the Deuzbeg of Kungrat, who joined me at Bokhara. I had arms for my protection, though they never proved necessary; and when once in the saddle, humming my favourite melodies of operas, could hasten with an easy movement of my horse westward, ever due westward. Then indeed all sad remembrance of danger and toil vanished with wonderful swiftness from my mind. And is it not truly peculiar, that every step from the very land towards which but a few months ago an ardent longing winged my wishes, every step homeward should weaken also the gladness about the success of the undertaking, so hazardous and yet so fortunate?

Man is in this respect but a child, and remains so all his days long. He chases after the fulfilment of his wishes with never-tiring zeal, yet scarcely finds himself at the goal, and victorious, than he turns from it with cold indifference to seek a new hobby, a new object for his passion, a new game to hunt. In Bokhara my success gained me yet some comfort; but at Teheran, and at Tebris, society received me with admiration and praises, so as to strike me as very peculiar, seeing myself nothing so extraordinary in my adventurous travel.

I had to acknowledge it, that it must have been my friends living in Turkey and Persia who caused this ovation, and became the chief cause of my not staying on my return in Pesth, but commencing with still bright reminiscences and full vigour to put to paper the results of my studies in languages abroad at the same time of my going direct to England, to communicate my travels to the central geographical world established in London; and of my having launched from the banks of the Thames, and not from the Danube at Pesth, into the literary activity of the universe.

As, on my return, I was again received as guest at the Turkish Embassy, and friendly treated by all English gentlemen residing at Teheran, these circumstances, so naturally explained by my former connections in Constantinople, caused the Russian residents at the capital of Persia to suspect me as if I belonged to some secret mission on the part of Great Britain. Of course, such an explanation was most fatuous, I having stood in no connection whatever, before my departure to the East, with any European authorities, as political aims would have but endangered the plan of my scientific travel.

Notwithstanding the above self-explaining facts, people commenced already in Persia, subsequent to Russian insinuations, to speak of me and my journey disparagingly; so that, without having given the slightest cause for it, I was pointed out at Teheran, and later at Petersburg, as inimical to Russia. The root of these aspersions, seeking cause for suspicion everywhere, was but the obvious rivalry, though kept in secret, of England and Russia in Central Asia; and I had to thank Mr. Alison, the then Ambassador of the Queen, for all my official letters of introduction to be used on my journey to London.

Why I did not prefer to be sent to Petersburg by Mr. Giers, the representative of the Czar, can be accounted for only by the circumstance that I soon perceived that an introduction by my works, dated from the banks of the Neva, would cast a shadow of suspicion upon my otherwise popular views. This, and no political considerations, advised my hastening to London at once.

After having passed three months in the capital of Persia (Teheran) for the better arrangement of my notes, jotted down under difficulties and dangers during my wanderings, I started on my return journey to the English—I might as well say the capital of the entire civilised world, in March, 1864.

I continued on my way without interruption, notwithstanding the very condescending and amiable reception given me by the small European colonies in Teheran and Constantinople, where they would have liked to detain me for a few days longer than I thought expedient.

Only a cold reception was deemed necessary in Pesth on my venturesome return. It is true, the epoch was very unfavourable for it, after the times of severe depression from 1850—64. My country entered then that feverish spasmodic episode, which is the precursor of every political epochal change. In Hungary, politics formed always the main leverage of public and private enterprise. It was only after my laurels had been lavishly bestowed on me in England, France, and Germany, and after my book of travel, in different translations, had roused sympathy for me, that people in my native country also commenced to speak about me.

Nemo propheta in patria is a true Latin proverb, and to its truth came another circumstance very unfavourable to my hopes of rousing patriotic acknowledgment. While England feels itself over the whole surface of the earth at home, and the sun never sets on its territories, of course, every fresh fact about lands lying between British possessions is received with thanks, in a practical spirit. Germany's learning is cosmopolitan, but among my Magyar countrymen geography and ethnology in those days had a lesser hold on public attention and interest. As they knew nothing of Central Asia, they cared little about it. We love what we know. It is not to be wondered at, nor to be denied as to my own person, that I felt this, the utter ignoring of my services, keenly; but for all this, I received, before arriving in Pesth, ample reward beyond my most sanguine expectations in London.

Lord Strangford, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Mr. Layard, and Sir Roderick Murchison (then president of the Royal Geographical Society), introduced me in a short time, with the zeal of men of science, and the urbanity of gentlemen of standing, into almost every society of the British capital, and made the romantic description of my travels the subject of frequent conversations privately, and public letters in the daily press.

There is in every dangerous adventure some latent humour, which keeps danger itself in check; the British public, accustomed to such ventures, knew how to enjoy it in mine, and it doubtless enhanced their interest in my expedition and myself, the more so as the political view made the Steppes of the Turkoman tribes, Bokhara, and Samarkand nationally interesting also, which in those days were wrapped yet in the weird mist of distance.

Again, no little was added to the popularity of my travel by my having gained the honour of explaining it from the pulpit of the saloon of Burlington House, where I communicated my adventures to a patient and encouraging public during one hour and a half, in no wise perfect English, either as to construction or accent. My readiness in expressing myself was still thought very creditable to a Hungarian, just returned from his Asiatic researches in greatly differing tongues, and one who, before his travels, never had the benefit of learning European languages without the boundaries of his native land.

My readiness of speech amused me heartily in one instance. At the time of presenting myself to two of my protectors, who, having travelled themselves in Asia, considered me especially worthy of their aid, they were much struck, during my conversing with them in Persian, with the originality of my phrases, gained by long sojourn among all classes of Persia, as also by an imitation of the national pronunciation. This was so faithful that, not able to comprehend how during so brief a time any one could learn the pronunciation, sing-song, grammar, idiomatic expressions of a foreign language, and all this so perfectly, they for a short time discredited my truthfulness, and did me the passing injustice to take me for one of those adventurous Asiatics who, induced by curiosity to see the wonders of civilisation of the West, use as their travelling capital the part they are wont to play, representing themselves as strangers of their native home, to gain credit for linguistic genius; or they took me for a son of the East who, having lived some time in the East Indies and Europe, now came to rich England with a concocted description of a voyage he never made, to try his fortune. Considering that, at the time I presented myself, my face still showed excoriations and vestiges of sun-blisters, and looked, in spite of my desire to appear with wonted European expression of learning and cultivation, yet quite the wild, inured dervish physiognomy, as during months it had to assume for its own safety, this may somewhat excuse the suspiciousness of those gentlemen. However, the mistake had a rather serious look for the safety of my honour and my person; envy and frivolous malice, spreading this judgment against me freely and carelessly, might have changed altogether the spirit of my reception, and that of my book of travel, in the European market, had not my countryman, General Kmety, the hero of Kars, turned up in time in my favour; the general, living then in London, came forward and testified to my identity and character, having known me in Constantinople, and he soon dispelled every suspicion as to my origin.

A sensitive ear for the acquisition of foreign languages—and how could a strange tongue, with its peculiar intonation, be learned but by the ear—and an adaptable gullet, plastic tongue, and sensitive lips—in one word, the physical perfection of the elocutional organs, as it would appear from the above, though in the abstract a blessing, may also become under certain circumstances dangerous to those so gifted. How whimsical my fate! It happened that I was mistaken for a European and a Christian in the wilds of Asia, and yet this did not prevent my being mistaken for an Asiatic and Mohammedan in the over-civilised centre of Europe.

How gladly would I avow at once that they were wrong after all, both on this side and beyond the Ural boundary! But hush! I see but the first grey light of the blessed rising day on the horizon, in which a free acknowledgment of our inner faith will be practicable, without disgrace, and without a shadow of doubt as to our veracity. By the time of its noon, I shall have fallen into the powers of Nirwana. I shall endeavour, though, that my written word meanwhile may fight for the good cause, and so to secure above that justice which is not granted to-day to my tongue or pen.

Enough of this. My reception in England turned out as glorious as one could dream of. Glorious is the word, for, indeed, its material advantages were none. My book, which after its appearance in English got translated into several other European languages, became a favourite work in Europe and America, and may have enriched the publishers and vendors, but it had no such effect on myself.

As dervish did I commence my tours, and as dervish did I end them. The true advantage gained from a long, patient, and persevering struggle with life, proved indeed a treasure of my innermost soul, a treasure of immense value. It consists of a sober conception of life as it is, not as it appears to youth, and to the dreamer; it is a correct view of the world we move in, and the consequent satisfaction with every fate it appoints to us.

Of all that I dreamed of in my earliest youth, in the shape of usefulness to the world by literary work, however small and humble, this has come true.

My post at the University of Pesth, where I teach the Asiatic languages and literature, ever stands before me as my highest dignity, and the pen as the mightiest power destined for my use. The Oriental studies—hitherto exclusively theoretical only (our learned connoisseurs of the Orient having seldom, if ever, been in the East)—have taken lately, on account of the ease wherewith East and West approach by means of cheapened communication, a more practical aim.

Only the combined study of ancient literature with that of modern morals and customs of the Asiatic Mohammedan races, only our immediate experience in the fields of social and political relations respecting those once mighty and flourishing peoples, who hasten, as it would appear in the present, with giant strides towards total decay and extinction, can safely entrust Europe in contact with its original parental East, with the task of civilisation, taken in hand so as to insure success, and to deserve the plaudits of the humanist.

I have but to answer a question so frequently put to me, whether the reminiscences belonging to my adventurous travel do not draw me back sometimes to the scenes of my former activity, and whether I feel now quite content in Europe. The latter I have just answered. As to the first inquiry, it will appear to all natural if I assert how seldom we can become altogether cold and faithless to the objects of our first youthful attachment. Our first love, admiration, enthusiasm, drains the strongest energies of our youth; it draws us with a magnetic power never absolutely exhaustible. Even now is the interest felt for the countries and races of Asia, I know, unabated; but this interest is no more of the youthful incandescent character. Like love unreciprocated, it has settled into the milder, more lasting feeling of genuine friendship. No doubt, reaching maturer age, my feeling towards Asia will become paternal, protectional—find not fault with the expression; it is meant diminutively.

It pains my heart deeply to see the oldest world, then an entire world, and the total of mankind, now battling in agony with its death. And what my means, my energy, and talents, be they however small and insufficient, are able to effect, shall be ever ready for the rejuvenescence and happy reconstruction of Asia, if it possesses yet sufficient vitality for it. This be the task of my whole life hence.

MEN WHO FACE DEATH.

THE FISHERMAN.

SITTING here with the sound of the breaking waves ringing in my ears, while the spray is driven violently against the little window before the fury of a stiff north-easter, is it strange that I should feel the memory of a hundred scenes of death and danger urging me to tell what I know of one brave class of our countrymen, little known and little cared for, who seek bread for themselves and their young ones at the peril of their lives? Happy indeed, and rare, the fisherman who cannot tell of some near and dear one going down, in the pride of his manhood it may be, battling fiercely with the wave.

Good folks, comfortable in their inland home, while the storm-king rages without in ever-rising thunder-tone, cluster round the cheery fire, and mutter with bated breath, "God help all poor folks at sea." They can draw vivid mental pictures of gallant ships, with bending spars and tattered sails, rolling heavily in the deep trough of the sea, while the crew toil at the pumps with the energy of despair; but they fail to paint the crowd of fishing boats struggling bravely to round the frowning headland which hides the harbour of refuge. They can pity the sailor's wife, from whose eyes the storm has driven all thought of sleep, but they little dream of the anxious crowd seeking shelter under the high sea-wall of the harbour yonder.

The boats, which yester-morning left with a fair wind and a smiling sky, have been caught in the storm, and now many an eager eye seeks to pierce the dark void where nought is seen save the gleam of the white-crested wave, as it dashes itself into spray against the pier, or on the long sandy beach stretching away to the north. By-and-by a light is seen far away in the depth of the blackness, and as it rapidly nears, the experienced eye makes out the figure of a boat with its reefed lug-sail. How eagerly the eyes are strained to ascertain if it is "oor ain boat!" Scarce a word can be heard amid the strife of the elements, but the little lamp, which throws its dim uncertain light on the strange scene, shows that the pale lips of the fearing wives and mothers are moving in right earnest prayer to the Lord who rideth on the storm. Nearer and nearer comes the boat, till, when close on the pier, the last little bit of sail is hauled down. The skipper sits with the tiller locked in his firmest grasp, with eyes for nought save the bow of his boat and the narrow entrance ahead. How patiently the crew stand, each in his place, their share of the toil over for one night—perhaps for ever, should the boat be carried against the pier by yon fast-following wave. But ere it can reach them the boat has shot between the piers, the bowman has thrown the expected rope to the crowd, who with a hearty cheer pull the boat round into the snug little harbour. Worn out, wet, and hungry, the crew totter home, and get between the blankets as soon as they can; little need have they of rocking this night. The very wind, which but an hour ago seemed likely to wail their coronach, does now but hush them like the gentlest of lullabies.

Let us look into the now deserted boat, and learn for what great prize so much has been encountered. What do you see? A score or two of haddocks, which, when divided among a crew of eight men, can do little even towards supplying the loss of lines and fishing gear; for when the brave good-wife appears at our doors on the morrow, seeking, with piteous tale of last night's storm, what we consider an extortionate price for a paltry haddock, who of all her customers ever thinks of granting her first demand?

But what of the women who have waited with aching hearts till the breaking dawn, cheered by no sight of the husband's boat? Ere the postal telegraph clerk has rubbed the sleep out of the corners of his eyes, a little knot of women, careless of rain and storm, has gathered round the office door, knowing that as soon as the boats make a harbour far to north or south, the crew will immediately telegraph news of their safety; surely not the least valuable use of the wires.

Telegram after telegram arrives, telling of the safety of this and the other boat, and the little crowd gets smaller by degrees, and truly beautifully less, till all are gone save the wives of the single unreported crew. Every click of the instrument has brought joy to some home, but still no tidings of the one doomed boat. The day moves carelessly on, and as the sun rushes down red and angry, in the short winter day, the despairing wives know too well that now they are widows, and their children fatherless.

Let one old man whom I knew long years ago tell his tale. When I first saw him he was a stern weatherbeaten veteran of fifty winters, his bronzed brow furrowed with many a wrinkle, his hair white as the driven snow, and in his eyes the strange far-away look one sometimes sees in men who have suffered much, and whose hearts are buried away in some loved one's grave. He mingled with none, even spoke with few; and yet he was the bravest, or, more correctly, the most reckless on all the coast. Did a ship show signals of distress, who but David Wood first jumped into the life-boat and cried for men? His was the last boat to run the coming storm. Let a boat go as far into the ocean after the herring as it might, a boat-sail away on the verge of the horizon told that David Wood was still ahead. He was at once loved and feared by his crew, who trusted to him implicitly, imagining he had a luck-charm.

One day as we lay on the green seabraes, the old man told me his story. I give it in his own words, occasionally clothing his Scottish tongue in English garments, though I venture to think the dear auld Scottish dialect is eminently qualified to express the joys and sorrows of the Northern heart.

"Five years ago, my son Davy was a stripling o' twenty. He was the bauldest and bravest on a' the coast. A'boddy liked Davy weel, but he was a' the warl' tae me. Neither kith nor kin had I i' the warl' but Davy, for his mither had gane tae the better country lang syne. Mony a stiff storm did Davy and I weather thegither, an' mony a nicht ha'e we lain in the boat in the bonnie munclicht, when a' the crew war' asleep; Davy crooning o'er some auld Scotch song; the bit boatie, as if it was trying tae keep time to the music, moving as gently on the water as the saft pulse o' a deeing man; the vera mune lookin' doon wi' a kindly smile, an' gaun slowly through the heavens as tho' loath tae go.

"But there wad be nae en' to a' my maundering. Ae nicht we war oot at the herring fishing; a big shoal had been seen loupin' aboot, an' the goos [seabirds] were fleeing thick. We had gotten a gran' catch, and had just hoisted the mast an' the sail tae catch ony chance puff o' win'; for it was sae calm an' quiet in the bonnie summer mornin', ye wad ha'e thocht a' natur' had fa'en asleep. But wae's me, it was o'er quiet. Up comes the sun big an' lowering; awa' o'er the sea ye could hear a low soochin', and then ye could see the win' come rushing along like a big black wa'. The flapping sail bellied oot, an' awa' we ran like racers. Stiffer an' fiercer the win' cam' doon, till it blew the biggest gale I ever saw. I sat at the helm an' keepit the boat as weel afore the sea as I could.

"The rope haudin' the canvas slipped, an' awa' flew the sail wildly o'er the boat, but no' afore it had hurled my Davy oot owre among the raging waters. I duared no' leave the helm, for the sake o' the puir men wha lippeden their safety tae me, but I held it in ae han' wi' the grip o' a hunner' men, an' wi' the ither I got hold o' Davy's hand as the boat was rushin' past.

"That ae minute seemed then, an' seems noo, like an eternity tae me. I sometimes think it's no bye yet, an' I fin' the death-grip o' my laddie's han', an' see his white face lookin' up in mine. We had baith oor mittens [worsted gloves] on, an', God help me, they slipped, an' afore the crew could lift a helpin' han', Davy fell awa' an' the boat sweepit by like a living thing wi' nae hert. They got the sail richtet, I ken na hoo; they wad fain ha'e ta'en the helm frae me, but my white face frichtened them, for they a' lay down in the bottom o' the boat, an' spak' never a word.

"When we cam' into the bay, the folks signalled till's no' to try in, for the sea was washing o'er the pier in mountain waves. But fat was danger tae me? my warl' lay far doon whaur nae storm reaches, and had it no' been for the crew's puir wives and weans, I wad ha'e gladly ran the boat amang the rocks yonder. They tell me that when we cam' in on the top o' a big wave, and war thrown high an' dry on the san' inside the harbour, ye micht ha'e heard the crowd—for the hail toon had turned oot tae see us drooned—tak' a lang breath like a sob, an' syne burst oot wi' three cheers. I ken na, I min' o' naething for mony a week after that, till ae morning I waukened an' fun' mysel' as weak as water, wi' my lang black hair as white as ye see. They say it was the maddest, pluckiest run ever made on a' the coast. Aweel, it's mony a lang an' weary day sin' that ane, an' noo they call me 'lucky Davy,' an' 'plucky Davy,' an' I aye get the best crew, an' the best fish, an' the longest price; and a'boddy likes, an' maybe fears, the lone aul' man; but they little ken that a' the luck an' a' the pluck lie in the trowth that I carena hoo soon I'm alangside my laddie; for I ken weel that, come soon or come late, ae day the boat will come hame without David Wood."

The storm of September, 18—, is as well remembered on the Scottish coast as was the field of Flodden in the dark days. Many a gallant ship went down with many a gallant crew. Many a fisherman found a watery grave, some meeting death almost within hail of their homes, the very wave that swamped the boat hurling the corpses of its crew almost to the very feet of their wives.

Walking along the sands one evening when the wind had gone down, and nought but the long heavy swell remained to remind one of the death-breathing storm that had passed, I found a little crowd standing silent and sad around the newly cast-up wreck of a boat. One glance, and I needed nothing more to tell me that the source of so much woe had at least brought rest to one troubled heart. David Wood had gone to join his boy in the land where there shall be no more tears.

This is no isolated case, though happily there are few of whom grief takes such a hold. The business of life is far too serious to admit of such enduring morbid sorrow. We must needs bury our dead in the deepest shrine of our heart, and only open the floodgates of memory when at eventide there cometh a lull in the fierce world-strife we daily wage; and even then, mayhap with quivering lip and tearful eye, yet with hopeful looking forward to that day, we ought to softly whisper, "Thy will be done."

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIFTH.
CONQUERED.

THERE was a nervous timidity in Teenie's manner, as if she would have liked to escape them. But

With the impetuosity of the child seeking to defend herself she spoke.

"I could not wait till Walter came home—the Laird told me I would meet him in the avenue—I

that passed immediately, and although there was a slight degree of reserve in her expression, it was attributable to the confusion and pain which she was trying to hide.

The three figures stood in the deepening gloaming, the trees casting mysterious shadows on their faces. Walter, with one hand resting on the gate, his eyes fixed on Teenie; Grace, holding up her skirt with one hand, the fingers of the other twirling a sprig of hawthorn; Teenie, looking downward, fingers playing with the buttons of her cloak, like a child who had been detected stealing jam.

The pause was only for an instant, but the three were conscious of it, and felt that somehow it made a difference amongst them.

heard you speaking—I called, but you did not hear me— and so I just followed the sound till we came here."

"We were both deaf, Teenie, for we were trying to bury some old vexations, and to get the better of some new ones," said Grace, smiling frankly.

"And you have walked all the way—Teenie, Teenie, you will be laying yourself up again," exclaimed Walter, earnest, fond, unconscious of any doubt which might have been inspired by what she had heard—the best proof of his sincerity—and placing his arm round her as if to support her.

"Come away up to the house and rest a little," said Grace; "you must not go back without having tea, and we can have a nice chat. Then I'll drive you home."

"No, thank you, Grace; the Laird is there—I would rather go back with him. Will you come over to-morrow? I want to speak to you."

It was a very sweet pleading face that she raised, so unlike the bright brave visage of the girl that Grace was rendered uneasy by it.

"Certainly, Teenie, as soon as I can get away I shall be with you."

"Good-bye then; don't forget—I can't speak just now."

Teenie kissed her, which was such an unusual action on her part that Grace was more and more amazed, and began to experience vague feelings of alarm. There was such pleading tenderness in Teenie's manner, so much like that of an affectionate nature suddenly roused to a sense of guilt, and eager to make reparation for the offence, that Grace wondered and was silent.

Teenie hurried out to the gig, hiding her face. The Laird was roused from a reverie, straightened himself, descended and offered his assistance to his daughter-in-law. But she sprang into her place before he was well on the ground.

"Upon my honour, Teenie, I think you could dance on the tight-rope," exclaimed the Laird, following her with much less agility than he generally displayed.

Walter, after seeing that the apron was hooked, and that his wife was properly wrapped up, took his place behind. Grace was standing at the gate. Good-bye, and they were off, she watching them till they crossed the burn, and then, in much perplexity of mind, walking slowly back to the house.

Teenie, with head bowed, as if to shield her face from the wind—which was keen, in spite of the heat of the day—sat in a dull, weary mood. Her eyes felt hot and aching, as if she had been sitting up all night, or as if she had been crying for several hours. They were dry and parched. She could not concentrate her mind upon anything; her thoughts were quite disconnected, jumping from the free childish times to the day on which Ailie had brought home the book of fate, and Walter had told her his story—she wished he had not told her the story: she would have been happier—then away to the far northern seas, to the whales, and her father; back again to the Laird, and the now inevitable ruin of Dalmahoy. She could not see anything before or around her, and the uncertain shades of the gloaming were already black as night to her eyes. Walter spoke to her several times, but she did not hear.

The Laird made one or two courteous attempts to entertain her, but finding that she was quite indifferent, he, for once in his life, cheerfully subsided into silence.

They formed a dull party; the horse, a fine high-stepping chestnut, was the only one that displayed life and action, and at a good trot he carried his sad companions rapidly over the ground.

A junction of two roads, the one leading to Dalmahoy, the other towards Rowanden and Drumliemount.

"You'll come up and have dinner with us," said the Laird, and drove on without waiting for an answer.

Teenie was anxious to get home for Baby's sake, but she did not like to oppose the Laird in his least wish at present, and so she yielded without a word.

Drysdale's face was longer than ever as he received his master and guests at the door. Dinner had been kept waiting more than an hour, and that was enough to disturb the best-intentioned butler.

"Everything will be fusionless as a burnt haddock without sauce," he grumbled, as if it were an entirely personal affliction.

"In a quarter of an hour," said Dalmahoy, and passed up-stairs.

"It's just like him," muttered Drysdale, still more afflicted, "he has nae consideration for the soup or the fish either."

The Laird was thinking of a time, near at hand, when he would have neither soup nor fish.

"How is your new tenant of the fishing?" said Walter, hanging up his hat.

"Oh, he's well enough—but is he as rich as they say, Master Walter?"

"I believe so—hundreds of thousands a year from some business in London."

"Poor fellow, and wi' a' his wealth he canna land a salmon-trout! I saw him with a fine one yesterday, and he ruggit at it as though he wanted to get the hook out of its mouth, instead of landing the fish. And he did that, he got the hook out, and the fish gaed awa', flippin' its tail, and just laughing at him. Poor fellow, wi' a' his wealth!"

Feeling intense pity for the unfortunate merchant—and some contempt too—Drysdale went off to see about the dinner.

When he appeared in the drawing-room the Laird was quite spruce, and as gay as the most youthful gallant. He took Teenie down to dinner; Walter, his eldest sister; Alice going alone, but making believe that she was leaning on the arm of the most entertaining cavalier, conversing in confidential tones with herself, playfully covering her mouth with a pretty lace handkerchief, as if she were concealing her laughter at wonderful witticisms, and occasionally glancing back at her sister, as who should say, "Don't you envy me?"

Dalmahoy had never been so brilliant as on this evening. He told his old stories with new relish, until even Drysdale grinned behind a dish-cover, although he was well seasoned to all his master's jokes, and had the least natural inclination to laughter of any man. He discoursed upon life in general, and the greatest happiness of the greatest number in particular, as if he had nothing to think about but the furtherance of that principle. He was perfectly in earnest, for when a man plays much with a sentiment there always comes to be an element of truth in it to him—the result of habit, if not of conviction.

Miss Burnett and Alice were astounded by the sprightliness of their father, although they were still ignorant of the impending calamity; Walter, who knew how affairs stood, was puzzled; and Teenie wondered how he could be so merry with such sorrow sitting on his hearth.

The ladies retired; the Laird forestalled his son, and bowed them out with an old-fashioned courtesy, and a pretty compliment for each as she passed.

He returned to his place, thrust aside the stiff-backed chair upon which he had been sitting, and drew an easy one up to the table, like a man who makes up his mind for thorough self-indulgence.

"Push about the jorum, Wattie; that's the claret—fine stuff; we have a few dozen left; pity I can't make you a present of it; but mind you scrape every farthing together, and buy it at the sale. I'll never forgive you if you let it pass; and when you've got it, I'll help you to drink it."

The wine stuck in Walter's throat; he could drink no more.

"The more fool you," exclaimed Dalmahoy, sipping from his glass with exquisite relish; "you'll not have the same chance often. 'Pon my soul, the prospect of the sale adds fifty per cent. to my enjoyment of the wine. Here's luck to the buyers."

"Have you really made up your mind to part with everything?"

The Laird crossed his hands, twirled his thumbs, and with an air of resignation—

"I am spared that trouble; you and your aunt have arranged it between you. So there is no more to be said, and there is nothing left but to take the utmost enjoyment out of everything while I can still, in a manner, call it mine."

Walter moved uncomfortably on his chair.

"Be quiet; drink and enjoy yourself, or ring for coffee, and go up-stairs. I insist upon not being disturbed; and I shall take my nap here this evening."

Walter did ring for coffee, drank his with nervous haste, and went up-stairs.

The Laird left his cup standing beside him until it grew cold, and continued to sip his claret. But when his son had left him, the expression of indifference slowly passed from his face, and was replaced by one of dull despondency. He gazed at the comforts which surrounded him; he was to leave all these. He was to walk out of the home of his fathers, which was dearer to him than he had ever fancied until now. The sentiment of association or reverence for the past was strong upon him, and he felt that it would be a hard thing to part from all these old friends—even the chairs and tables were old friends in his present mood. He felt very old—very much broken down, and inclined to bitter thoughts about his sister and his son.

He forgot his wine, although his fingers encircled the glass; he forgot his nap, and the announcement he had made that he was to take it there (it was his custom to have his nap in the drawing-room whilst one of his daughters read the Times to him, then to waken up and read for himself when they had gone to bed); he forgot that Drysdale would be fretting about not being permitted to clear the table, and his head dropped forward, his eyes fixed stolidly on the claret jug.

A hand touched him on the shoulder, and he looked up heavily; but instantly he made an effort to resume his jaunty air, and to rise, when he saw it was Teenie who had roused him. But her hand was like that of a strong man—or he was very weak—and she would not allow him to rise.

"I stole away from them up-stairs, and came down to you," she said in a half-stifled voice; "I knew you would be thinking and—oh, Laird, my heart is breaking, for it's all my fault!"

She swung round, dropping on her knees before him, her bonnie face covered with her hands.

"My dear child, you talk—you talk nonsense," he stammered, patting her head, and smoothing the rich yellow hair, which made him think of the gold he could not obtain.

She looked up, her eyes bright with tears, and the pallor of her face reproaching him for his feeble attempt to deceive her.

"You will have to let the place be sold?"

"I am afraid so."

There was something disagreeable sticking in his throat, which rendered his voice husky.

"You will have to go away from this—your home—your father's home. Where will you go to? what will you do?"

His flimsy disguise, although pretty well maintained up to this point, fell from him, and he broke down.

"God knows," he sobbed, hiding his face, ashamed of his misery. "The girls have no wit, and their hands have never been trained to anything; I am an old man, even more helpless than they are."

She was maddened by the sight of his grief; her arms were round his neck, her head resting on his shoulder, and she too was sobbing.

"Will you ever be able to forgive me?"

He embraced her affectionately.

"I do now, my child, heartily," he said with a sincerity which could not be misunderstood; "I was inclined to blame you, Teenie, for if you had not been in the way—well, there, we'll say no more about that. But you have taught me to love you just when I might have disliked you most. God bless you, my child; it has done me good to get this out, and we'll manage to make all right somehow, so don't you fret. You are a comfort and a blessing to me."

She was very grateful for these tender words; she had never felt affection for the Laird until now—misfortune had drawn them so close together.

Her eyes sparkled through tears with a brilliant idea, and she almost gasped in her haste to utter it.

"My father has money in the bank; can I not go and get that? Then it would be easier for you to make up the difference, and I would be so proud to think that we had been able to help you—it would make me very happy."

He patted her head kindly, and was really sorry to disappoint her generous ambition.

"That cannot be, Teenie"—it was the first time he had addressed her by that pet name, and, except in company, he never afterwards used the formal Christina—"it cannot be unless you have a cheque signed by your father."

He did not say, as he thought, that it would be difficult for him to accept the rescue of Dalmahoy at the hands of Skipper Dan. A curious contradiction, for he would have accepted anything, and would have even expected a great deal, if Teenie had been Methven's heiress.

"But I can go to the bank and tell them that it is my father's money, and that he would do it if he was here. Mr. Shaw will believe me."

"No doubt he would; but he dare not give you the money without your father's signature."

"Is there nothing we can do?"

"Nothing that I can see at present."

"Will not General Forbes help you?"

"No."

"Aunt Jane?"

"She cannot, and wouldn't if she could. There is no help to be looked for from our relations—as usual. They have all got some absurd notion that I have interfered with their chance of sharing that confounded Methven estate amongst them."

Teenie smarted under the reference to the Methven property, for it recalled a disagreeable idea which the Laird himself had planted in her mind.

"Oh, if my father would only come back in time!"

"Perhaps he will," said Dalmahoy, to comfort her, rather than with any hope that the skipper would be able to relieve him if he did come back before the sale. "But there, now, don't let us speak any more about it. You are spoiling my digestion; let me attend to it whilst I have something to digest."

She wondered how he could speak so lightly under the circumstances.

Another bright idea occurred to her. Grace was coming to Drumliemount to-morrow; something might be arranged between them. She said nothing of that, however, and she felt that it was a very bitter extremity indeed which could compel her to make an appeal to Grace for help of this kind. It was a forlorn hope, and she clung to it desperately.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SIXTH.

ON THE SEA.

THEY walked together down the winding road—Grace and Teenie, going for a row. Firs, bracken, and the bonnie bright red rowans glancing by them on the road-side; behind, the soft headline of the hills, drawing near them over the cold, bleak moorland; before them, the sea and rugged coast, high cliffs, on the edge of which the road had been cut, jagged lumps of rock forming a wall along one side to protect travellers from tumbling into the abyss beneath—and these jagged, irregular boulders seemed to the eye of fancy like men and children holding hands to guard the wayfarer from harm.

On the sharp brown promontory of the Witch's Bay, a group of white sea-gulls, whose eerie cry suggested storm and disaster. One flapped his wings, and set off seaward on a voyage of discovery; and presently the others followed in a body, swooping above the rocks for a minute, and then dropping into the water, all keeping near shore in obedience to the mysterious instinct which warned them of an approaching tempest.

Teenie reached the boat, and looked back for Grace, who was making her way down the steep path, preceded by her collie, Pate. The latter gambolled merrily on the yellow sand, and brought an offering of seaweed to his mistress, which he laid at her feet with a grin of triumph on his good-natured, ugly face. But he showed a decided dislike to approach too near the water; and when he saw his mistress advance quietly to where Teenie stood, the water rushing up and laving her feet, he came to a dead halt, and stared with a comical, puzzled look, as if the proceedings were altogether beyond his comprehension.

"Will you get in?" said Teenie. "If you sit at the stern, I can easily push the boat off."

"Are you not to wait for Walter?"

"No, we can come in for him when we see him. Two of the elders have got hold of him, and there's no saying when they may let him go. I'll help you."

She held out her hand as if she had been a man offering assistance to a lady. Grace hesitated, and looked at Pate, who remained at some yards distance, his paws planted before him as if to save himself from tumbling over a precipice.

"Are you afraid? You forget that I can manage a boat, although I cannot direct a Sunday school," said Teenie, laughing, but with just a shade of bitterness in her tone.

Grace got in, and seated herself at the stern as she had been told. The dog did not follow.

"Come, Pate, come—for shame, sir, to desert me!—but you can go home if you like."

The dog shook himself, glanced backwards as if he were much more disposed to take his tail between his legs and make for home, than to go on. But he advanced shyly, and at the next sound of his mistress's voice, leapt into the boat and crouched at her feet, looking up into her face as if wondering what this strange vagary could mean. He had never been accustomed to the water, and he did not like it.

Teenie pushed the boat off, and sprang in, nimbly enough, but the effort this cost reminded her unpleasantly of how much strength she had lost.

She paddled slowly out of the bay, and the moment they passed beyond the sheltering arms of the rocks, the little craft began to pitch and toss in a manner most uncomfortable to Grace. Several splashes of spray threatened to spoil the ladies' hats, and warned them that they were likely to get well wet. Teenie was indifferent for her own part, but she saw Grace clutch the side of the boat and look anxiously around; then she looked also.

The waves came sweeping inward, white-crested and murmuring—they were like long arms reaching out to grasp a victim. Overhead, great stretches of blue-black clouds scored with pale amber; a red glow on the western horizon, from which radiated long smoky wreaths reaching the borders of a light golden lake, and that again was studded with black ragged islets. Eastward, a pale mist rising, like a veil, and spreading slowly over the sea, bringing night as it seemed with all its mysteries. The sea, dark green flecked with white heads; and the long-sweeping waves sang plaintive duets with the wind, now loud and furious, again soft and gentle as the voice of syrens tempting men to destruction.

"I'm doubting there is to be a storm," said Teenie after looking round; "we'll keep inshore."

"I am sure there is to be a storm," rejoined Grace, calmly, but making no attempt to conceal the uneasiness she felt. "Did you not see the birds?—they knew it. Do you not see, Pate, how he is shivering?—he knows it. I wish you would go in, Teenie, these waves are so strong and terrible."

"They are very beautiful." She shook back from her shoulders the long hair, dripping with spray, and gazed at the threatening sea with as much fondness as a mermaid who loved it even in its angriest mood.

"Do make for the shore, Teenie," said Grace, shuddering as she looked at the waves.

Teenie ceased rowing, but continued to steady the boat with the oars.

"I will in a minute—but I have been selfish again, Grace. I want to say something to you, and I thought I would feel stronger to say it if we were out on the sea. I want you to do something very great for me, and I never could have told you except here."

"What is it?"

Words came abruptly just then, for Grace disliked the position altogether. The boat lurched to one side; Grace gave a little scream, and that concealed the half-stifled sob with which Teenie began to speak.

"It is about that money—about your mother" (setting her teeth hard, then); "I want you to get it in time to save Dalmahoy, and you shall have it all back as soon as my father comes home. Your mother has refused, but if you speak to her she will do it for your sake. Oh, Grace! I feel that I shall never be able to lift up my head again if the Laird is turned out of his home, if his daughters are made beggars all through me—through me. Will you do this?—beg, pray, promise anything that may tempt her, only to save them, and she shall have it all back in a very wee while."

Teenie's eyes and voice were full of tears, and Grace in her sympathy almost forgot the perils of their position.

"I will try, Teenie; I intended to do my best even without your speaking; but my mother is very stubborn in this matter—she is a little queer and does not quite understand the position; but if she can be persuaded to help us, I will persuade her, for Walter's sake and yours."

"But there must be no 'ifs'—you must make her do it whether she will or no.—Lord help me! I'm feared that my head is going wrong, for I feel that I could rob—aye, murder to get that miserable siller. You may guess that, when I beg of you, when you see me ready to go down on my knees to you, craving that you would only save them. Oh, I think I will hate you if you fail!—and yet no, no, Grace, I cannot do that; I will aye like you—love you, whether you save them, or no."

She dropped at the feet of Grace, sobbing, and the dog whined as if in sympathy or terror. The positions were so entirely reversed—the one who had been so bold and fearless was now so weak and humbled, the other who had been so weak was now so calm and brave—that Grace herself was most astonished at herself and at Teenie. The latter's passionate appeal made Grace's heart beat fast with affectionate pity, although she could not realise the bitterness of humiliation which Teenie experienced in making this petition to her, who she felt ought to have been the most uncompromising of foes.

The boat gave another lurch, and one of the oars went overboard; Grace almost capsized the craft in the wild effort she made to clutch it as it swept by on the crest of a wave.

'For God's sake, Teenie, save us!' cried Grace in alarm.

Teenie rose in a dazed way, and almost fell with the heaving of the boat; but she steadied herself and caught the remaining oar just as it too was about to slip through the rowlocks.

The white mist was rapidly approaching them; in a little while it would be over them, and would shut out the land from their sight, so that they might be for hours tossed about upon the waves without any chance of landing—if they were not swamped long before the mist cleared away. Teenie was conscious of all their danger in an instant; she sought for the missing oar, and when she understood what had happened her face darkened, for the peril was even greater than she had anticipated at the first glance of their position. She looked at Grace, and for an instant a wicked thought possessed her—why should she not leave the boat to its fate, and die there with her? The kindly sea was offering her peace, oblivion, and an end to all sorrow; why should she struggle against it? Why struggle to live when living was a constant agony and shame?

White-faced and trembling, she turned away from the wicked thought; what a coward love had made her!—she almost feared the sea; she did fear the temptation which was presented to her.

There was a distant murmur as of muffled thunder, and she knew that one of the fierce and vicious squalls which beset the coast was approaching. How many had perished in its fatal swoop! how little hope there was for them in that frail craft at such a moment! But Grace was to be saved—Lord forgive her!—she thought that for herself she would have made no effort. Then over the dismal gloom of the waters there came the cry of a babe in the manse high up yonder on Drumlicmount, and she felt very guilty. There was something to do for Grace's sake, and for the babe's sake.

They had drifted towards Kingshaven Bar—a most dangerous part of the coast in a storm; the ugly shape of the ominous rock called the Wrecker loomed before them. If they could only pass it they would be safe; or if they could only reach the creek which they were nearing they would escape all serious danger.

Grace was silent and pale, watching Teenie anxiously, but without making a movement or uttering a word to disturb her. Pate whined occasionally, and nestled more closely to the feet of his mistress.

Teenie was guiding the boat by the help of the single oar; suddenly she wheeled it round, pointing the head towards the creek.

"Sit still," she said between her teeth; "hold the tiller straight; our only chance is to go in with the tide. Yonder is a wave coming that will either carry us in or to the bottom."

She changed her seat to a place beside Grace, holding the oar with one hand, whilst with the other she grasped the tiller.

"When I say 'Steady,' hold firm for your life."

There was a strange pause—a momentary silence of sea and wind.

"Do you think," said Teenie timorously, "if—if we should sink—do you think you could go up yonder with no ill thought in your heart towards me?"

The only reply of Grace was to clasp fervently the hand which rested on the tiller.

Teenie gave the boat one last jerk towards the sheltering creek, drew in the oar, and clasped both hands on those of Grace; they held the tiller between them, whilst affection and forgiveness of all sins were expressed in that loving clasp which meant to them life or death.

"Steady!" cried Teenie, "here is our safety or our death."

The mist was following fast, it was already near them, it would soon be overhead—then it would reach the rocky shore, and escape would be almost impossible. The great sea rolled shoreward, swinging the boat up and down. Then came the huge wave upon which Teenie counted to carry them into the creek; but if it should break before they touched the land, or if it should draw them back with it even when they were nearest to safety!—that was a terrible thought.

Everything depended on being able to keep the prow steadily towards the creek. The wave struck the boat with mighty force—hoisted it high in the air, so that the breath left Teenie and Grace; they felt as if suspended above the water, and that presently they must drop into an abyss. But their hands clenched the more tightly upon the tiller; they pressed their bodies close against it and, lips compressed, faces white, and hearts still, they watched the dark inlet upon which they were driving—it seemed almost flying. The time was brief, but an age of memories flashed through the minds of the two women as they sat, hands clasped, awaiting the fortune of life or death.

They were driven into the creek; the boat dropped, the keel grated upon sharp stones, then it reeled and staggered as one wave seemed to draw it backward, and another, overleaping the receding one, helped it forward.

Teenie caught up the rope which was fastened to a ring at the prow, and sprang into the water. She scrambled across sharp boulders on to a ledge of rock, and exerting all her strength, she drew the boat close up to the side, where only the spent waves and dashes of spray reached it.

Grace made her way forward, climbing over the seats awkwardly, and grasping Teenie's helping hand, stepped on to the ledge.

"Safe, thank God!" she said quietly; "thank you, Teenie."

"Little thanks to me, who brought you into the danger. And see, you're drenched to the skin—you'll get your death of cold."

Grace smiled—feebly, for she felt very weak.

"You are no better off yourself."

"It does not matter for me," was the indifferent answer, but so low that amidst the roar of waters Grace did not hear the words distinctly.

Pate scrambled up beside them, looking very much cowed; but he gave himself a shake of satisfaction when he found that he was safe on land.

Teenie unfastened the rope from the boat.

"Walter has told me about folk climbing the Alps, how they are all tied together with a rope, so that if one slips, the others save him from tumbling down. So we'll tie ourselves with this, and if you should miss your foot, I'll keep you from falling."

Grace would have objected, but when she looked up at the rugged face of the rocks they had to climb, she yielded to Teenie's plans.

"I've often gone up these rocks for fun, and I can do it the easier now that it's a necessity. It's not so hard as it looks, and Pate will follow us."

She knew every step of the way, and with her sure foot and steady eye there was not much danger in the ascent, but to Grace it was full of peril. At times she thought the sea was rolling up the crags, intent upon claiming the victims who had so narrowly escaped its wrath. Then the white mist enveloped them, so that she could barely see where to plant her feet, where to catch with her hands. She felt giddy, and would have certainly fallen, but for the wise precaution which Teenie had adopted. She made even a greater effort to keep steady than she might have been capable of had she been alone, knowing that any stumble endangered Teenie's life as well as her own.

They attained the summit at last, and stepped out upon the road. The dog capered about wildly for joy; the two women sat down to rest. Grace was warm with grateful thoughts; Teenie was pallid, cold, and shivering now that the danger was past—she who had been so firm and skilful whilst these qualities were most needed.

"Walter will be so vexed with me," she said slowly, as she unfastened the rope from her waist.

"He will be too glad and too thankful to see you safe, Teenie, to be vexed with you. Oh, what a strong, brave woman you are!"

She kissed her affectionately, and then uttered a little cry of amazement and alarm, for not the weak woman, but the strong one, gave way, and Grace found Teenie fainting in her arms. The strain had been too much for her, and she lay there by the roadside, quite helpless.

END OF CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SIXTH.

LEAVES AND FLOWERS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "HALF-HOURS IN THE GREEN LANES."

FLOWERS.

WE may recognise two leading shapes in all leaves—the circular and the linear. Mineralogists tell us that the numerous forms of crystals, in which all sorts of solid substances are found, can be reduced to six elementary types. This is the more astonishing when we remember that some varieties—as, for instance, carbonate of lime—are known to assume hundreds of distinct forms. Similarly all the manifold shapes of the leaves of flowers and trees, that produce such a magnificent variety and richness, can be assigned to a very few elementary patterns. The little pennywort of our marshes and bogs has leaves almost round. Those of the water-lily, nipplewort, winter aconite, lady's mantle, and nasturtium are also circular. Some of these have indentations along the margin; and in the lady's mantle, oxalis, clover, and lupin we see these carried down to the mid-rib, so that the leaves are cleft into three or four or more parts.

In the ribwort, plantain, hart's-tongue fern, and grasses generally, we have a linear-shaped leaf, scalloped in the dandelion, and pinnated in the common polypody.

In a state of nature the terminal parts of plants are those which usually yield flowers. We have seen that the latter are only modified leaves, and further, that the extremities of plants cannot enjoy the abundant nutriment which the lower parts enjoy. The structure of the floral parts of plants is much simpler than that of the leaves, which are sometimes very peculiarly modified, or "specialised," as botanists would say. Hence many of our best philosophers have arrived at the conclusion that flowers have been formed through lack and not excess of nourishment. Just as we have leaves of every degree of shape, simple and compound, so have we flowers, in a natural condition, of every degree of perfection, from a floral point of view. In some, as in the grasses, nettles, and euphorbias, we have only stamens and pistils—male and female organs—without either sepals or petals. In others, as in the muscatel, we have sepals, but no petals; and in the fuchsia, crocus, tulip, and others, we have other parts of the plant than the petals so highly coloured that they take their places, and are popularly believed to be the flowers. It is now an established fact that plants which are self-fertilised are neither so healthy nor so large as those which have been crossed. This crossing is partly effected by the wind, and partly by insects; and the flowers fertilised in the former manner, as those of the poplar, pine, hazel, willow, etc., never possess bright-coloured petals, if indeed they have any corolla at all; whilst the flowers which are cross-fertilised by insect agency are always gaily coloured, and not unfrequently highly perfumed as well. Wind-fertilised plants always produce infinitely more pollen than is required, as may be seen in the early summer in any fir plantation, so that some of it is sure to be blown about. Many of the plants, such as the yucca, brought from other countries and acclimatised, will not seed, not because the climate or artificial conditions are unfavourable, but owing to the absence of those species of insects in this country, to whose visits the plants are subjected in their native habitats. The marvellous adaptation of plants to insects, and of insects to plants, is now forming one of the most charming and wonderful investigations in natural history.

The act of flowering is so important to plants, in perpetuating their kind, that many of our earliest plants, such as the colt's-foot, butterbur, etc., flower before they leaf. This is the case also with fruit-trees, whose buds, however, were formed in the previous autumn, when nutrition was failing. In some plants we have an auxiliary mode of propagation, as in the "runners" of the strawberry, which will creep along the ground and produce new plants without the trouble of flowering and seeding. This method of propagation is most fatally possessed by the American weed (Anacharis), which was introduced into this country with Canadian timber some years ago, and has spread now into every canal and river so as to be a complete pest. And yet no instance is on record of this plant having flowered and seeded in England! If the autumn be unusually antagonistic to vegetation, the buds then forming will be converted into flower-buds instead of leaf-buds. Every horticulturist knows that the process of "crippling" plants will transform leaf-buds into flower-buds, and this practice is often resorted to that more or larger fruit may be obtained. The glorious tints of autumn leaves, seen with much effect in this country when the season is dry, but still more gorgeously in the "Indian summer" of North America, are due to failing nutrition, not to excess of it. The same cause may be assigned to the colours of flowers, or at least to a very considerable degree. As a rule flowers are terminal, or situated where least nutriment is to be obtained. But it must be understood that we are referring to the possible origin of flowers in the geological past, rather than to the present. The existing specialisations, of form, colour, perfume, etc., although, as we have seen, they are connected together by an almost imperceptible series of links, have been specialised by the agency of natural selection. In such plants as the early flowering purple nettle, the upper leaves are almost of as delicate a purple colour as the flowers themselves. In the zonal geraniums and the coleus, as well as in some of the begonias, we have the leaves coloured even more brightly than the petals of many other flowers.

Even the general forms of flowers, as well as those of the plant, are due to the prolongation or suppression of certain parts. Just as the bat is enabled to fly through the extra prolongation of the finger-bones, over which the wing membrane is stretched, and just as the stilt assumes its extra long wading legs through the unusual development of the ankle-bones, so do many plants differ from others in a similar manner. The spaces along the stems of a plant, separating the whorls of leaves from each other, are called "internodes." These spaces may be longer or shorter, or may be suppressed altogether; and if the reader will remember this when next he compares the general shapes of plants, he will be supplied with one reason, at least, why they differ from each other. Thus, take a daisy of China aster; you think each to be a flower, but after you have pulled away all the surrounding white petals of the former, you come to the yellow disk, and are then surprised to find it crowded with hundreds, if not thousands, of diminutive but quite perfect flowers, each provided with separate floral organs. The internodes, which ought to have separated these flowers, have been suppressed, and thus they grow squatly and compositely. There is reason to believe that plants like these, which have undergone the most specialisation and alteration, are among the most ancient, geologically speaking, of all the flower-bearing species.

Even the monstrosities of our gardens verify the simplicity of structure which underlies the entire floral world. Teratology, as it is now called, is the science which accounts for all "monstrosities," and shows how they are due chiefly to two causes—excess of nutrition, and defect of nutrition. Nearly all the monstrosities of our gardens and greenhouses belong to the former class, those in nature (which are of much rarer occurrence) being chiefly included in the latter. The commonest monstrosity, however, is that which converts stamens and pistils into petals, or petals into leaves. But enough has been said to show how, under the grandly diversified features of the floral world, there are a few leading principles which, properly understood, give us a key that will unlock the otherwise intricate and perplexed facts which are crowded into it.

J. E. TAYLOR.

OUR COXSWAIN.

"COUSIN LARRIE."

WE are intensely nautical, my boys and I, taking the deepest interest in everything that pertains to river and sea, whether it be regattas or rowing matches, or helping the girls to find new treasures for their aquarium, or with rod and line lounging on the bank of some pleasant stream, to reap as much enjoyment in watching the birds and insects flitting about us, or in wading into some pool for water-blossoms, as in carrying home a good basket of fish. It is, therefore, a great fault in our eyes that the pretty scenery surrounding our house is not diversified by a navigable stream. The adjacent town is built on a small though rapid river, but flour, flock, and oil mills stand too closely together to admit of boating, while the briny ocean is so far away as only to be attainable for a few weeks in autumn. The consequence is that when the ruling passion becomes overpowering we are obliged to content ourselves with a day on the Basingstoke Canal, a bend of which is not more than five miles from our own door; and though Tom exclaims, "After the Isle, or the Thames below Cliefden!" with a very disparaging shrug, and Will calls it horribly slow work, we have always contrived to thoroughly enjoy the day.

There were enough of us this year to fill two roomy boats, for Tom had brought with him from Oxford a college friend—a pleasant, quiet man, some few years his senior, whom he called "Old Roydon," and treated with an affectionate familiarity that we all learned in a degree to imitate. Old Roydon was always gentlemanly, never intrusive, and though very studious, rarely going anywhere without a tiny volume in his pocket, only let a demand for help be made—no matter by whom, or how trivial the occasion—and the student woke up, the book was laid aside, and the aid kindly and efficiently given.

Mamma liked him because he was so indulgent to the troublesome youngsters, who now swarmed into one of the boats, dragging paterfamilias in their wake, and loudly entreating that Mr. Roydon should join them. He glanced round, and Belle, who had already secured herself a seat in the other boat, smiled, and made room for him; but then Belle is an incorrigible coquette, and her accepted lover was jealously on the watch; so Mr. Roydon left the field clear for him, and made his way towards the juveniles, who hailed his coming with noisy delight.

"Much more comfortable here than squeezed in along with a lot of girls," said Clive, between mouthfuls of seed-cake—it is astonishing how hungry lads always are on such occasions—"Fanny is sure to skreek if we bump against anything; and once, when Tom was changing places with somebody else, and rocked the boat, she threatened to get out. What a game if she had!"

At last we are all in our places and ready to start—but who is to be coxswain for the youngsters? Tom, who had taken one of the oars, with Mr. Roydon at the other, positively declined to be steered by Clive, the only candidate for the office; for that young gentleman had a propensity to forget what he was about, and take a course that Will described as "from bank to bank they worry me."

Would neither of the girls volunteer? Apparently not, for they chose to turn a deaf ear to a proposal that would, as Belle plaintively murmured, quite spoil their own party.

"We'll have Cousin Carrie! she's always good-natured, she'll come;" and Cousin Carrie—a pale brunette, with a willowy figure, and a face so intelligent and loveable that one forgot to ask whether it were beautiful or not—raising no objection, she was handed to the vacant post.

I don't think she liked it, for Carrie—always quiet and unobtrusive—loved to lean over the side of the boat, and dream, and see strange pictures in the gliding waters; but somehow her dependent condition—she was the orphan child of relations who had died abroad—and her naturally yielding temper, made the boys tyrannise over her. Not unkindly, of course—mamma was too tender of the orphan to permit that—but claiming from her all those services which their sisters were less willing to render, and being all the more troublesome because Carrie bore the inflictions with such sweet patience.

And now we are off! past Aldershot, with its huge barracks, dirty unfinished town, and unendurable dust, yet looking gay and pretty in the morning sun, as a squadron of cavalry file up one of the rugged hills in the distance, and group after group of white tents come into view. Here a company of newly-arrived militia are being drilled, their scarlet tunics gleaming through the larch firs that partially intercept the view; and there a regiment of Highlanders, "under canvas," are cleaning and donning their accoutrements in the open air, looking comical enough as they stroll about in their kilts, sans jacket and plaid, dirk and sporran, or the curious feathered head-dress that is supposed to give them such a warlike aspect.

And now we have passed the busy camp, a bend in the canal hides it, and the hush of Nature in one of her wildest moods is around us. On either side, the ground—whether it rises into hills or sinks into a monotonous flat—is unbroken moorland, and yet in our sight it is very lovely. The golden furze and bonny broom star it everywhere; the heather is coming into blossom; the pale pink flowers of the whortle-bushes are giving place to the berries that have upon them the soft bloom of the plum; in all the moist places the sundew throws out its hairy leaves and brightly pink petals; and mosses, green, brown, and grey, flourish abundantly. Just as the sun is getting high in the unclouded heavens, we reach coppices of birch, the silver birch, the poets' "lady of the forest," intermingling with the feathery larch, fair coverts for the wild birds that watch us with their bright eyes, as if wondering at such unusual visitors; for we have the canal to ourselves.

A solitary officer paddling himself in a canoe has shot past us, and at some part of our journey we shall probably encounter a nondescript affair for dredging up the mud, or a floating ark, used apparently as much for the accommodation of a family of grimy children as for the conveyance of goods. Since the railways have spun their iron webs all over the country, this watery route has fallen into disuse, and we are told that the longest tunnel upon it has become impassable.

There is a pause, for we have reached a swing-bridge of very primitive construction, and two of the party must land, to pull and push at the levers until the sides part and we can pass through. The operation has been watched by a party of rustic, very rustic, urchins, who appear to take affront at our invasion of their domain; for, acting on the Black Country principle: "A stranger—leave 'art a brick at him," they send a volley of stones in our wake. No one is hurt, though every one is angry, and sundry disquisitions are entered upon respecting the lower classes, district visiting, board schools, etc., broken off by a low cry of admiration from Cousin Carrie. The sloping banks on either side are now beautiful with ferns, from the common bracken to the regal osmunda; and beneath their tender green fronds, coquetting with the water, are myriads of tiny forget-me-nots, varying in hue from the azure, the best known, to paly pink, and even white. It is here, too, that the pure flowers of the water-ranunculus float on the surface, though the lily-buds are only swelling, and will open their waxen cups too late for us to wonder at their beauty.

It was beneath these ferny banks that great pike, lying lazily among the weeds, scarcely bestirred themselves to get out of our way, and deceived the lads into the belief that they might be easily caught. It was here, too, that we rested on our oars to watch the perch darting to and fro, till all the party grew excited, and began regretting that they had come out unprovided with fishing tackle.

Our canal is not one unbroken course, never varying in width. In some places it has overflowed the original banks, and expanded into pools—or, as they are called in the locality, "flashes"—of considerable size, narrowing afterwards so much that there is merely width enough to row with comfort: nor does it take one straight wearisome line, but pleasantly winds and bends, and continually presents us with fresh views. Another bridge passed, and a water-side tavern, and a few cottages—quaint and ugly but for the roses that overhang their porches, and make their gardens glorious—and then the merry voices take softer tones, and Cousin Carrie gazes so rapturously that she forgets her duties and has to be called to order.

We are entering a sylvan vista; the towering oaks and elms of Dogmersfield Park are met high overhead by the branches of the trees surmounting the steep bank opposite, and we linger in the cool shadows till Mr. Roydon sighs, and Tom, fancying we are all growing melancholy, reminds us that it is noon, and we are not to lunch until we have reached Winchfield, a mile or two further on.

Pic-nic dinners had been voted a bore, entailing as they do an infinity of trouble, and too many risks of being rendered uneatable by some accident or omission. So mamma had prudently eschewed anything of the kind. There were sandwiches for the elders; cake and biscuits for the lads; these were discussed beneath some willows on the grassy bank, and then we were refreshed and ready for the homeward row, and the more substantial meal that awaited us at its close.

It was during this rest on shore, and a stroll across some inviting-looking fields, that Cousin Carrie unwittingly came into notice. Without intending to be unkind, we had let her sink into something very like a drudge to the whole family. "Carrie will do this or the other"—"Carrie doesn't mind"—or, "Carrie always gets on best with the boys," were speeches that we uttered too often. Accustomed to see her give place to others, and be silent while Belle fluted and Fanny chattered, we had forgotten that she was equally fair and young, and deserving attention. It was Mr. Roydon who contrived to awaken us to our selfishness; his politeness made us ashamed of our own neglect. It was he who came to the rescue when the exactions of the youngsters made her look pale and tired; it was he who good-humouredly, but decidedly, checked Tom when he evinced a disposition to tease his little cousin, and who snubbed Will when he rudely broke in upon something she was saying.

Stirred by so good an example, Fanny now made a faint offer to take Carrie's place, saying that it wasn't fair that she should be shut out of the pleasanter party; but the offer was declined, and we rowed home in much about the same order as we came.

The lads had taken turns at the oars, landing occasionally to make excursions after nests, and get up snake and squirrel hunts, till their wild spirits and their legs failed them; and Clive, lying in the bottom of the boat with his head on Carrie's knees, bade her sing him to sleep. When Tom seconded the request she acceded, and gay voices in the other boat caught up the strain, Mr. Roydon adding a mellow bass. Then we all grew very still, till a chance allusion to foreign scenery aroused Clive once more.

"Tell us something about New Zealand, Carrie.—She was born there, Mr. Roydon, did you know it?—Begin at once, there's a dear. I can always listen best when I'm sleepy. Tell us about the row with the Maories."

Carrie was not disposed to volunteer any information about herself, but a well-timed question or two drew from her a tale, which the rowers, Tom and Mr. Roydon, rested on their oars to hear.

Some few years before the death of her parents, she, a girl of ten or twelve, had gone on a visit to the farm of an old friend—a lovely, bonny spot in one of the wildest regions of the island. While luxuriating in its fruits and flowers, the uneasy looks of the farmer and his wife passed unnoticed, and they would not terrify their child-visitor by repeating in her presence the alarming reports that were hourly reaching them. A tribe of the Maories had revolted, and stolen on some of the settlers in the dead of night, killing and destroying with fiendish barbarity. No one knew but what his own home might be the next attacked, and at present the military force within call had proved inadequate.

A treacherous calm, and then, one never-to-be-forgotten night, the storm burst over the secluded farm. Carrie was roused from her first sleep, assisted to don her clothes by the white-faced matron, and led hastily through the lower room, where the farmer and one labourer—the others had fled—were making feeble and useless preparations for defence. Opening an outer door the farmer's wife bade her fly and save herself; and when, bewildered at the injunction, the poor child clung to her, the woman pointed to the forest and forcibly thrust her away. It was well that Carrie obeyed, for her feet had scarcely crossed the orchard when the house was surrounded, and her flying steps were quickened by the hideous yells of the savages.

All that night the lonely child wandered on, to find herself at dawn close to another homestead, as ruined and desolate as the one from which she had fled. A little spring bubbled out of a rock near a broken gate, and she hurried to it to cool her parched lips; but some one was there before her, a lad who had been struck down by a blow on the head, supplemented by a frightful gash in his arm.

This he was trying to bind up as well as his still wandering senses permitted; and Carrie, her first alarm overcome, bathed the gaping wound and tied her own scarf around it.

While thus employed a shadow fell between her and the rising sun. A Maori, frightful in his war-paint, had stolen back in search of more plunder, and his club was upraised to finish the work of death.

"Go on, Carrie," said Clive imperatively, when her voice faltered, and her eyes closed as if to shut out the scene she had been depicting.

"Please go on," echoed Mr. Roydon, with strange urgency.

"There is not much more to tell, for I was too frightened to know precisely what I did or said.

I remember only that I knelt between the savage and the poor dying Englishman and begged his life; it would have been so dreadful, you know, to see him killed; and while the Maori was hesitating, for he did not seem as if he wished to kill me too, we heard voices approaching. The Maori ran away, and I was taken care of by the gentlemen who rode up, and finally restored to my parents."

"And the young man," asked Tom, "what became of him?"

"I cannot say; he was a stranger in the neighbourhood, but I heard by chance that he recovered. I hope he did. I have often thought of him," she added simply, "and fancied I should like to see him again."

Mr. Roydon, his features working with agitation, leaned forward in the boat, and stripping back the sleeve of his jersey, held his arm towards Carrie—there was a long blue scar upon it.

She dropped the rudder-lines to clasp her hands in delighted surprise, and the next moment they were in his, and raised to his lips.

We did not do much talking after that. Even the irrepressible Clive comprehended that the dewy moisture in Carrie's eyes, the quivering of her rosy lips, and the eloquent look that sat on Mr. Roydon's face, meant more than speech could convey.

* * * * *

"News for you, mamma!" I said to her, a few days afterwards: "Tom's friend has asked me for our little coxswain."

Tom, as elder son, considered himself quite privileged to draw nearer and make one of the conclave.

Mamma sighed.

"If she likes him—and I am afraid she does—I suppose we must consent; but she is a dear girl, and ought to make a better match."

Tom roared out—

"A better match—ha, ha! Why, old Roydon owns one of the finest estates in Sussex, besides a whole lot of property in New Zealand, that he had gone over to inherit when he first met our little Carrie."

After that of course there was a gay wedding, at which Tom was best man, and Fanny and Belle the blushing, half-envious bridesmaids; and this is how our day on the Basingstoke Canal ended.

Who will be our coxswain next year? Carrie, mingling tears with her smiles, has left us for a new home, and steers on fairer waters. Belle has promised to eschew flirting and make her betrothed happy; and Clive and Tom are getting ready to go over the sea, and begin life on their own account at one of Mr. Roydon's farms.

But it is not wise to look forward, especially to more partings, and so I have done. L. C.

WOMEN WHO WORK.

THE DAILY GOVERNESS.

UT of place? Ah! dear me, yes, and for the last three months. If I don't get better I may never get into place again; and then God only knows what will become of me. Shopkeepers don't like giving work to ladies; and ladies don't like the work-house. There are homes for decayed gentlewomen? Oh! yes, but every one knows how difficult they are to get into; and I don't blame the people who have the direction of them. When the demand so far exceeds the supply, I don't see how it could be otherwise.

What is the matter with me? Asthma and chronic rheumatism, brought on by exposure to the weather; and you know one can't teach when one's voice is gone, and one's nerves all a-quiver with pain. It would be folly in any one to take me in my present state; only you see I couldn't help getting into it; I wasn't used to roughing it at the beginning, that's all.

Yes, I had been trained to be a governess. My father was a clergyman, with no private property: a man who had married a penniless girl, and who entertained somewhat peculiar views, which cut him off from those who might have been his friends; so I was early sent to a good school and given the best masters, that I might be able to help myself when the need came. We lived in Devonshire, and when he died, leaving my mother and me without a penny, she wrote to an uncle of hers, a rich merchant in Bristol, not exactly asking him for aid, but telling him of our great need. In a little more than ten days we got his answer. In a little more than ten words he told my mother that twenty pounds annually would be paid to her in half-yearly instalments, by a solicitor in the City. For the rest, I had been sent to a much more expensive school than his daughters, and therefore ought to be sufficiently accomplished to support both my mother and myself.

Well, he was right. I think I was, if I had been older, or could have taken a situation of eighty or one hundred pounds a year, and everything found, as finishing governess; but they don't give those sort of things to girls of three-and-twenty; and besides, my mother could not have spared me altogether. She was a great invalid, and my father's death had so broken her down, that I made up my mind from the first to try for a place as daily governess only.

Why did we come to London? Well, partly because lodgings and food were very dear in our old home, a fashionable watering-place; partly because I fancied I could get a readier and greater choice of situations in the metropolis than elsewhere; and with part of the little money left from the sale of our furniture, etc., we took a couple of decent rooms in Kilburn. Yes, an out-of-the-way place enough, but cheaper than more comfortable neighbourhoods; and economy was the first law.

I soon got an engagement. Our doctor had given me an introduction to a lady living in Kensington; and she engaged me at once to teach her three little children from nine a.m. to one p.m., for forty pounds a year.

"I shall expect you to be very punctual about coming, Miss A——," she said, "and as we dine at one, you are quite sure not to be delayed; so if you get an afternoon engagement on the same terms, I should think you would do very well, and have the whole of Sunday, as well as all your mornings and evenings, to yourself."

I thought so too, and I used to make as much of those mornings and evenings as I could; getting up before six so as to dress my mother, prepare her breakfast, and see her on the sofa for the day, before starting at eight precisely to catch the omnibus. I had five minutes' brisk walk to do that, and it took me down to the Marble Arch for threepence. There I got out, and walked across the park and gardens to the Kensington Road, and thence on to Mrs. B——'s, which I generally managed to reach within a minute or two of nine. It was a long walk; but though I could have made it lighter by taking an omnibus on the other side of the park, I did not dare to go beyond the sixpence a day for coach hire, when I had only forty pounds a year for everything. Besides, it was spring time then.

Oh! yes, I began to look out for another engagement at once. I dined at the children's dinner, and then went to see after situations. Sometimes, in fact, I spent the whole afternoon walking about from agency to agency, and from house to house; reaching home at last almost too worn out to care for the tea and bread-and-butter awaiting me.

No, not very nourishing food; but think of the price of meat, and drink, and rent, and dress, and washing, and all the thousand and one necessities of life!

A young charwoman might perhaps have done the same or even less physical labour for the same price, and fared well; but she would have slept and eaten in one room, for which she might have paid half-a-crown a week; her clothes might have been tied up in a pocket handkerchief, and her washing represented by o. A governess is obliged to dress like a lady. Ladies will positively offer you ten pounds a year more if you go in a new pair of well-fitting kid gloves; twenty pounds if you happen to possess a sealskin jacket; and there is no injustice in the fact. It is a maxim accepted and carried out by all classes and in all professions. If a poverty-stricken, miserable-looking drab comes to offer herself as a servant, don't we immediately offer her the half of what we would have given to a trim, well-attired domestic?

I had forgotten that, and one of the first luxuries I sold when we went into our Kilburn lodgings was my sealskin jacket. "A cloth one will do very well," I thought, "when the winter comes."

Other governesses have made a like mistake.

About the middle of the season I got an afternoon engagement to give twin sisters, of fifteen, lessons in French, German, and history, from half-past two to half-past four. They lived in Russell Square, so I was under the necessity of hurrying through my dinner as quickly as possible, in order to be with them at the proper time. Sometimes I could not catch an omnibus at the right place; and sometimes it would be full. I never did it under three-quarters of an hour at the soonest, for swift walking was not as easy in the afternoon as in the morning. Three children in robust health and wild spirits take a good deal out of a woman's energy; and when you only get one substantial meal in the day, and that eaten in a hurry between seeing that Harry doesn't put his knife in his mouth, or Kitty crumble her bread on the floor, it is folly to expect to do as much as a person who has three good meals in the day, and time to enjoy them. Even thus early I began to suffer from indigestion, headache, and a constant feeling of weariness, almost greater at getting up in the morning than at lying down at night.

No, I could not rest of an evening. There were clothes to be made and mended then, letters to be written, sometimes studies to be worked up till a late hour at night, in order to fit me for the following afternoon's teaching. Also there was my dear mother to be amused with a game of chess and a little cheerful conversation after her long, lonely day.

Don't think I complain of that! Many a weary governess would give anything in the world to have a kindred face to welcome her on her return home; and no one ever had a better parent, more patient, uncomplaining, and gentle; but sometimes I was so tired I could hardly find energy for talk at all. Business men coming home in the evening, fagged in mind and body, will know the feeling I mean.

And at that time friends were writing to congratulate me on my good fortune:—"Two nice, superior engagements, bringing in eighty pounds a year, and all your evenings to yourself for going out and amusement. How lucky you are!"

Well, I dare say I was lucky. I am not grumbling, mind you. It might have been much worse had I not got either situation; or been thrown among coarse, unkind people. There were many worse off than I.

At the beginning of July, Mrs. B—— came to me and said—

"Oh! I forgot to tell you yesterday that we are going out of town on the first of next month: first to my brother's in Kent for two or three weeks, and then to some seaside place. I expect we shall be about two months absent. The children want a change, and I'm sure you'll be glad to get rid of them. You have a dreadfully tired expression. Take my advice and go away somewhere into the country yourself. Lodgings are just as cheap there, and London is now getting too hot for endurance."

"I am afraid I can't do that," I said. I think I had grown very pale. "There are my afternoon pupils, you know."

"Oh! tell them you want a holiday. I should say, come to the same watering-place as we do, and then the chicks could go on with their lessons; but Mr. B—— only likes Brighton or Torquay, and really they are so expensive, we can't afford a governess, as well in the holiday time. Be sure you don't make any engagement, however, which will prevent your coming to me on your return—we are too fond of you to lose you—and do as I advise you. Take your mother into the country and have a thorough rest."

She went away as she said that, and I got through my morning's teachings as well as I could with my heart crying out, "Two months' salary gone out of the year!" all the time. I shall never forget my mother's face that evening when I told her.

Did Mrs. B—— never think, while she was enjoying her summer holiday with her children, that part at least of that enjoyment was purchased at her governess's expense? No, I don't think so. Indeed I am sure that the idea never occurred to her, kind woman as she was. A holiday is good for every one, she thought—good for me too—and that was all. That you can enjoy an enforced rest at the price of your daily living, or that a governess would be almost willing to go on teaching during the holidays for nothing but the bare food, without which she must go hungry, were questions that never entered her head. It is a case that occurs in fifty households every summer. Why should one be an exception?

No, my afternoon pupils did not go out of town at all. One was very clever, and delicate ; the other one-third an idiot, healthy and obstinate. It sometimes took more than half my time trying by coaxing, argument, and severity, to induce her to learn a few easy tasks which a child of eight could have mastered in half an hour, and then the other girl got irritated and complained of not receiving equal attention. It was hard for her, but I think it was equally hard for me.

Those two hours with two girls were harder work than the four with Mrs. B—'s three children. Besides, the latter came to it fresh ; these had music and other lessons in the morning, and were often languid and tired.

Yes, I did get some temporary employment during the holidays ; I gave French lessons to a milliner's show-woman. She lived in Westbourne Grove, and I used to walk there and back three evenings in the week, for two shillings a lesson. The mornings I had for myself, and for nursing my mother, who was ailing very much. The heat affected her, and unfortunately we found it hard enough work to pay for the doctor's visits. To carry out prescriptions which involved fresh air, nourishing food, wine, etc., was impossible.

About this time I got the offer of a very good morning engagement, but it was to be for at least two years ; and, considering myself bound to Mrs. B—, I was obliged to decline it. This gave offence to the friends who had procured it for me ; and from often coming to see us, and sending my mother fruit and jelly, they dropped our acquaintance altogether.

No, don't blame them, please. It is very annoying to have taken trouble for a person and find it thrown away. I dare say they thought me too independent, and did not understand my scruples. Fortunately Mrs. B— came back at the appointed time, and I resumed my old work until Christmas, when I was taken very ill, and obliged to give up teaching altogether for the time, and go into a hospital for nearly three weeks. When I came out I went to see after my twin pupils first, and was received by their mother, who told me very courteously that the dull one had been sent to school ; and that as "I had not got on well" with the other, they had agreed that she should have masters and study by herself.

This was in the depth of winter. I was deeply in debt, incurred during my illness. I had never been able to afford the "cloth jacket," and was trembling with cold and weakness. I wonder what any one thought who saw me that afternoon, crying bitterly as I trudged along through blinding snow, and a wind which nearly cut me in two !

I have never been strong since.

Well, I got another situation in time, nearer home, though with less salary, and began another year much the same as the last, except that both families went away in the summer. I was prepared for it this time, and had succeeded in getting a temporary engagement which would occupy at least half of each day. It was an odd one—teaching a married lady the rudiments of French, reading, writing, and arithmetic. They were poor, and could only pay me half-a-guinea a week (I think the husband was a clerk in the city), so the debts went on increasing ; and even when my regular pupils came back, I found it impossible to pay them off altogether.

For, remember, I could, and can, do no more now than I did at first. I then walked from five to six miles a day in addition to my educational work. I cannot walk four now. Brain-work is more fatiguing than manual ; and no brain-work is so fatiguing as teaching, because it is not only a strain on one's own intellect, patience, and temper, but depends for its success on the intellect, patience, and temper of those you have to teach. Now when the body is fatigued, the mind is seldom fresh, for the one acts on the other in equal degree ; and if by overwork and insufficient food you let the body get into a feeble, languid, or unhealthy condition, the mind is pretty sure to follow suit.

But all daily governesses are not as badly off as I am ? Certainly not. I have a friend, for instance, whose brother is a young barrister, and in order to be able to live with him she takes an engagement in town ; gets the same salary that I do but only pays him two-thirds for her board and lodging, and keeps the rest for her private needs. Of course, she has to work hard, to put up with many disagreeables, and go out in all weathers to keep her engagements ; but on the whole she preserves her health, and leads a happy and not too anxious life.

Yes, many people are fond of extolling the life of a daily governess, in contrast to that of a resident as being so much more independent ; and also that instead of being tied to the same set of children morning, noon, and night, there are certain hours of the morning and evening in which you are absolutely free from them and their parents altogether.

This is true—in a sense ; but then a resident governess has no rent to pay, no food to secure, no household cares to harass her in addition to those of her profession ; and none of the fatigue and exposure of hurrying from place to place, perhaps at wide distances, to keep her engagements. Also it is more certain ; people are fond of hiring a daily governess till the children are just old enough to go to school ; or because they are not settled in a place ; or while they are looking out for perfection in a resident instructress ; and though the latter receives a quarter's notice when she is required to leave, it is only thought necessary to give the former a month. Also, though morning en gagements are easy to get, afternoon ones are exceedingly difficult, few parents caring to let their children learn at that time; and it is not always that one can get a situation which occupies the entire day.

Lastly, there is not the same concentration or reciprocity of sympathy on either side. When you live under the same roof with the same people from month to month, you get to know and understand their little ways and feelings, even if they be disagreeable ones; and they in return get to know you, and look on you as in some sort one of, or belonging to, them; but a daily governess merely comes into the house to teach, and goes out of it when the lesson is done; and at the end of her engagement may know as little of, and be known as little by, her employers as at the beginning. The house she goes to in the morning may have one set of rules and customs, and that of the afternoon a diametrically different set. She has hardly trained herself to deal with the peculiarities of the Misses' dispositions, before she has to fashion her mind in another shape for the convenience of the Misses F——. In one house all is cordiality and freedom, and if I do not act as one of them, and join in the conversation at table, I am regarded as offended or out of sorts. In the next it would be considered an unpardonable liberty if I opened my lips out of the schoolroom, or even there, except on educational subjects.

Yes, a hard life, harder than people even think, and telling both on mind and body; yet one which is surely honourable and respectable, and which in some cases, such as where a lady has a home, and only requires to earn sufficient for her own personal expenses, may be as comfortable and independent a profession as in my case it is harassing and precarious.

No, don't go away pitying me overmuch. I may get stronger after a while, and mother has taken a turn for the better of late, and earns something at point-lace making. Besides, since I have had this illness, her cousin has increased her allowance. We shall get along somehow, God helping.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SEVENTH. THROUGH THE MIST.

GRACE in the first moment of alarm looked hurriedly up and down the road, in the hope of seeing some one who might assist her. But the mist enveloped them so closely that she could not see clearly beyond a few yards distance. There was no sound but the wild sough of the wind, and the angry voice of the sea breaking against the rocks below. She shuddered at the recollection of their narrow escape—an escape entirely due to Teenie's skill and courage.

She hastily unfastened her friend's dress at the neck, wiped the pale face with her wet cloak, and then vigorously chafed the cold hands. The dog, meanwhile, was moving round the two women as if with a human sense of their distress and eager to relieve it.

"Walter, Walter!" said Grace tremulously.

That was a name with which Pate was familiar, and next to his mistress, no one had been so kind to him as the young minister. He stood a minute as if trying to understand what was expected from him. Then with a yelp he sprang forward and disappeared in the mist.

The sky seemed to darken, and the mist changed from white to black; the sea roared louder and angrier at every moment; the wind swept over them with a keener blast and more dismal cry than before. Grace, shivering in her wet clothes, continued her efforts to restore animation to Teenie's cold limbs, and was at length gratified by signs of recovery.

Teenie drew a long breath, and began to open her eyes, staring bewilderedly about her. Just then a man's voice was heard in the darkness which surrounded them.

"Good heavens, Grace! what have you been doing?"

"We have been nearly drowned, and Teenie has fainted."

"How thoughtless she is!" he exclaimed, and stooping he took her very tenderly in his arms, murmuring, "My poor, brave lass."

She made a slight movement as if to repulse him, and then she clung to his protecting arms. Without observing the first movement, he raised her up, passed his hand over her brow, and addressed to her warm and loving words. Then, as if remembering Grace, suddenly he said—

"I have been seeking you everywhere—I could not believe that Teenie would have taken you out in the boat with the signs of a storm so clear before her, and she knows them so well. When I saw Pate I thought you had taken a walk instead of a sail."

"I don't think Teenie noticed how stormy the sea looked when we went out," said Grace.

"Oh, but I did," cried Teenie, starting up, with a curious laugh; "and, as Wattie might think, I wanted to drown you. But I was not thinking of that, Grace; it's just as he says, I am so thoughtless. There never was danger on the sea to me, and I forgot that you were different. Oh, I have been so thoughtless that I have spoiled all our lives!"

There was an undercurrent of passionate bitter-

"Take my arm," said the husband, "and let us get up to the house."

"No, give Grace your arm, and she will take mine on the other side. I'm all right again, but we must walk quickly to keep the cold out. Come along."

She shivered with cold as she spoke, her wet garments clinging closely about her. They stepped forward in the order she had arranged, and she really seemed to have all the strength she professed to have. She talked and laughed as if there had ness in her voice that startled both listeners; and the surprise was increased by the suddenness with which she rose to her feet; if she had been only shamming instead of having been in a faint, she could not have regained consciousness and strength more rapidly.

Her words were cruel to Walter, because they indicated so much doubt of his love for her; and they seemed cruel to Grace, because they harped upon a subject which she had been implored not to mention again. But Teenie had not the least idea of the unpleasant interpretations which were placed on her words; she felt a pang and she uttered it. She had no thought of giving pain to any one.

been no danger, and as if there were no discomfort in their present condition.

"We're a bonnie pair of ducks, Grace, with our draglet tails. The mist has just come on to save us from being laughed at by the folk.—You should have been with us, Wattie; it was grand to see the big waves come tumbling in upon us, and to see Grace sitting as quiet as though she had been on the water all her life, when if she had budged, or fainted like me, we'd have gone to the bottom as sure as death."

The latter expression added much solemnity to any declaration of the country folk.

"You have given me a fright, Teenie, although you don't seem to be much frightened yourself," answered Walter, trying to smile, yet feeling uneasy at her strange humour.

"It will do you good, and keep you from thinking of other matters which will be all right in a few days."

She was quite cheery as she pressed the arm of Grace, whilst making this allusion to the bargain they had made. But all the time there was running through her head a bitter recollection of those old letters, and of the unrequited love she had discovered in them. How she admired Grace, and how she envied her the brave generous calmness with which she had sacrificed to him her dearest hopes! And how she wished that she had never known how very dear those hopes had been!

Grace could talk well enough when alone with Teenie or Walter, but always felt as if she had nothing to say when with them both; she was even sensible of some awkwardness. She was annoyed with herself for this, because she had nothing to speak about to the one that she would not have told to the other. The awkward feeling was there, however, and despite herself she could not overcome it—just because a third person always has the influence of a non-conductor upon all sympathetic conversation. She felt this more keenly than usual on the present occasion, when she wished most to speak so as to bring these two closer together than they seemed to be.

She had an instinctive sense that she was standing on a volcano, which would presently break forth, carrying destruction to all things near it. But she knew so little—the inner doubts of Walter and Teenie had been so carefully hidden from her, that whatever she might suspect she dared not speak.

Walter was so quiet and reserved; Teenie was so boisterous and strange: presenting two opposing elements which would not unite: and Grace was frightened—more frightened than she had been when in peril of her life a little while ago—although she could not say why.

She tried to explain to him the adventure of the afternoon, and how bravely Teenie had acted; but Teenie always interrupted, laughed at the danger, and made light of her own exertions, attributing the whole success of their rescue to the calmness of Grace.

They reached Drumliemount at last, and notwithstanding their wet clothes, they were heated by the exercise of the walk.

"The very best thing for us," said Teenie, and she insisted upon seeing to the comfort of her guest before she would do anything for herself.

When everything had been provided for Grace, Teenie went to her own room and changed her clothes. She was fastening her gown when Walter entered and, placing his hands on her shoulders, looked inquiringly and fondly into her eyes.

"What is the matter, Teenie—have I done anything to annoy you?"

"Me!—no; why should you think that?"

"You have been so excited!"

"Because I am blither than I have been for a long while—Dalmahoy will not be sold, Wattie, and that is one misfortune the less of the many I have brought to you."

She gave him a short quick kiss, and resumed her toilet.

"You dear, stupid lassie!" he said, placing his arm around her, "you have brought me no misfortune; and you have taught me many things without the knowledge of which I never could have hoped to accomplish anything. Why will you persist in regretting our marriage? I shall begin to think that you liked somebody else better than me."

She wheeled round, one side of her hair in her mouth, the other held out at its full length whilst the brush was applied to the roots—and stopped there.

"Are you quite sure," she said, speaking through the hair, "that you do not like somebody else better than me?"

"Quite sure," was the frank and immediate response, "if you would only be reasonable."

She proceeded with the arrangement of her hair.

"Just that—but I'm not reasonable, and so you can't be sure."

"What is the matter with you?" exclaimed Walter, utterly puzzled, a little vexed, but anxious to avoid anything like a misunderstanding.

"Nothing, except that Dalmahoy is to be saved and I am awfully proud and happy."

"How?"

"I'll tell you in a week or so. Now go and send down to the inn for a gig, so that you may drive Grace home. She will never be able to walk."

She had not been in such gay spirits since the birth of Baby. Walter was not satisfied; there was something unnatural in this sudden gaiety which puzzled as well as astonished him. However, he carried out her wishes regarding the gig. When they met at the tea-table, Teenie was almost if not quite as bright as in the old days, before she had learned any sense of fear. To Grace she was devoted with that eager and hearty hospitality, which receives its best reward in being cordially accepted. Grace, although quiet, gave that most desirable reward to Teenie's exertions, and could not help laughing at the absurd way in which the young wife represented their plight in the boat, although she still regarded the position as almost too serious to be joked about.

After tea, the gig was at the gate, and Walter was ready to drive his cousin home. Grace hesitated, and asked if there was not a man from the inn; but Teenie scouted the idea of any one but Walter taking her home. She was very particular in wrapping up her guest warmly, to protect her from the mist and night air; she fastened the shawls with her own hands, and tucked in the rug under Grace's feet. The last word whispered to her was "Remember."

"You may be sure of that," answered Grace, pressing her hand affectionately.

And so they drove off.

Teenie proceeded to attend to various household affairs, to see that Baby was comfortably settled for the night, and to tell Lizzie, the sleepy domestic, that she might go to bed. When all was done, she went into her husband's room, sat down, got up, and fidgeted about in a restless way. The lamp displeased her; now it was burning too high, again too low, and she suddenly turned it out altogether; then she had to hunt for matches to relight it. She sat down again, an elbow on the table, her head resting on the hand, whilst the fingers of the other hand traced imaginary hieroglyphics on the table-cover.

She was in a very contradictory mood—hope, passion, love, and spleen—or jealousy?—born of the love, and of the torturing conviction that her love had wrought pain where it ought to have brought happiness. But she had resolved to be merry—resolved to go back to the old blithe days when she had neither fear nor doubt of the future. Dalmahoy was to be saved, and then her father would come back like the grand prince in the ballad, would put everything right, and she would be so proud of him! Then what had she to trouble herself about?

In answer, there came a vision of the gig driving through the mist across the moorland, Grace sitting couthily by Walter's side, and not anxious to be home; he with his grave face eagerly watchful of the road, lest in the darkness they should meet with an accident. Both silent—or perhaps Grace was talking, and her sweet low voice would remind him of all that he had lost for one who had brought him neither wit nor wealth—one who had brought him nothing but ill-fortune since their troth had been first plighted.

Would he think of that? And if he did, would he not regret what he had done? He must do so; he must think of the Methven estate, the expectation of which had reconciled him to marrying her; and he must feel the chagrin of one who discovers that he has been induced to make a bargain under false pretences. She winced cruelly at that; and for an instant she had a vague idea that these thoughts were degrading to Walter, therefore degrading to herself; that she was forgetting all his tokens of love, and that she was overlooking the brave, self-forgetful loyalty of Grace.

Baby cried, and she flew to him; he was teething and he was fractious. She tried all motherly arts to soothe him to sleep; she talked to him in the sweet nonsensical prattle which is the recognised language of babyhood; she sang to him in a tender undertone, but it was that sad ballad of "The Lass of Lochryan" which rose to her lips, and almost unconsciously she repeated one of the saddest of its verses:—

"Fair Annie turned her round about—

'Weel, since that it be sae,

May never a woman that has borne a son

Ha'e a heart sae fou' o' wae."

Baby fell asleep to that eerie wail, and she stole softly down-stairs. She went to the door to listen for the sound of the returning wheels. The lamp in the window above the doorway cast a few rays of light into the darkness, only to render the blackness beyond the more dense. The light fell upon the gravel at her feet, and she herself stood like a black streak against the light from the room behind her. She heard nothing save the wild uproar of the wind, occasionally broken by the distant and melancholy roll of the sea.

"God help my father this night," she murmured, and thinking of him, the hardness which had been growing round her heart whilst she brooded about Walter and Grace, was softened; so she added, penitently and tenderly, "and God help Wattie, too, for he has much to bear."

She remained a long time at the door; and fancy raised strange phantasmagoria in the darkness. She saw mysterious forms slowly shaping out of the gloom, rising up and towering above her as if they would fall and crush her, then suddenly breaking against the few rays of light—but only to be followed by others; trees and bushes seemed to walk towards her through the shadow, assuming fearful shapes, and all threatening her.

"It's an awful night," she muttered, going in and closing the door after her, whilst she shivered with cold and terror at the phantoms she had seen.

Walter was driving cautiously across the moor, feeling the penetrating mist and wind despite his wraps, and he was muttering to himself—

"Why is it we cannot understand each other? Is it that she cannot or will not try?"

He took the gig down to the inn, and walked home. He did not see the light until close to the gate. When he opened the door, she sprang out to meet him.

"You are safe!" she cried with passionate delight; and all the hardness which had been growing upon him, too, disappeared.

"Quite safe," he said, embracing her fondly.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

NIGHT.

WITH the morning Teenie's hopes increased, and her gaiety of spirits ran up to the height of the thermometer. She would explain nothing to Walter but she was merry—very gentle and attentive to him. She thought of many things to add to his comfort which she had hitherto neglected. She seemed to be happy, and trying to make him so.

Gloomy as was the position in which he found himself, and discontented as he felt inclined to be at times with her apparently unreasonable gaiety, it was an unspeakable joy to him to see her glad, and the shadows of all her threatening ailments cast a long way behind her. What an inscrutable creature was! now bright as the morning, and again dark and sad as the night.

He had often puzzled himself about her; often, when annoyed by her thoughtless ways, even when he had been speaking to her sternly—cruelly, she would have said—he was questioning himself about her, asking if he did not misunderstand her altogether, and if some other conduct on his part might not draw her down to the level of ordinary mortals, or up to it.

But the fitful humours which he could not control remained and baffled him. She irritated him, drove him to the brink of fierce passion, and then a few winning childish words, and he took her to his breast, ready to brave any calamity, for her sake, and so that she might not suffer.

He took himself severely to task. He had introduced this child into a new life, a new world. Had he guided her steps with sufficient care? He had tried to do so—God knew how earnestly he had tried—but had he succeeded? He had miscalculated his own fortunes; the unexpected distress of Dalmahoy added to his embarrassment—since the blame of it could be charged to him—and amidst all this confusion of troubles, could he say that he had fulfilled his duty to her? No. The sense of failure in himself was so keen that he was ready to accept any blame. But that did not make their life any the more satisfactory.

There had been growing up between them a mysterious something, palpable to both, inexplicable to both—a something which they strove with all their might to repress. Yet it grew, and they were conscious that this monster was separating them, slowly but surely, in spite of all their efforts to extinguish it. They were like two people cast from a wreck upon the sea; they strove to keep together, they prayed that they might be permitted to keep side by side; but the waves rolled up and they were drifted apart, each straining the eyes to keep the other in sight. They wished otherwise, but the waves were stronger than their wishes.

As the days passed, and no message came from Grace, Teenie's humour underwent many changes—gay, sad, defiant, hysterical. To Walter it was torture. He coaxed, he scolded, he implored without effect. It was an April mood, and neither his rage nor his love could change its course.

At length Grace came herself, and Teenie read at once in the sad eyes that she had failed;

Dame Wishart was inexorable in her resolution to give no help.

"Did you try?" said Teenie fiercely.

"If it had been for myself I could not have done more," was the answer.

"You promised that you would arrange it."

"I can do nothing without my mother's sanction."

"Why does she refuse when she knows that we have no other help at hand—when she knows that her money will be repaid in a few months, with whatever interest she wants?"

Grace turned her head away. She could not answer that question, and she could not meet the angry gaze of the young wife.

"My mother is not well, and she has strange fancies. She is unusually stubborn on this subject."

"Because of me," exclaimed Teenie bitterly; then passionately, "and—oh, Lord!—it is possible to see folk drowning, and keep back the hand that could save them! But it's me—it's me that is to blame for it all."

"There is time yet, Teenie."

"Time! Will she change her mind?"

"I hope so," faltered Grace. She could not say more, for indeed she had no hope.

Teenie understood, and she was ungraciously exasperated by the attempt to console her. She had built so much upon the success of Grace in persuading her mother to advance the money, that the disappointment was to her generous, passionate nature, unbearable. The one clear idea that she had was, that her marriage to Walter was the only cause of Dame Wishart's obstinacy in this matter—which was the fact—and that, therefore, the whole misfortune of the Dalmahoy family rested on her shoulders.

The thought stung her almost to frenzy. She found difficulty in speaking to Grace with anything like calmness; she could not find the least comfort in reassuring hopes which were whispered to her; and she was much relieved when left alone. All the bright visions of the last few days were dissipated; ruin was at hand, and she was the cause. That was all she understood.

"Oh, if my father would only come back!" she moaned, leaning her head against the wall for support.

Was there nothing she could do? A piteous wail seemed to rise up from her heart, echoing the terrible word, "nothing." If she had been out of the way, if she had refused him when he asked her to be his wife, there would have been none of this trouble. That thought made her fierce, then spiteful against herself, Walter, Grace, and everybody; and presently she was furious with herself for feeling so vicious.

He came home late in the evening, very tired. The coming Sabbath was fixed for the administration of the Sacrament, and during the day he had been obliged to visit many of his parishioners, whose houses lay far apart. It had been an anxious day mentally; physically his limbs had been severely taxed, and indeed, but for an occasional lift in a farmer's gig, he could not have accomplished all that he had done.

He was served with a steak burnt to a cinder. The knife chipped off splinters, but could not cut it. He made a feeble joke about meat being transformed into sawdust, and to his amazement he encountered a sharp retort to the effect that he was always complaining, and that if he wanted fine cookery he ought to engage a cook. He was innocent of the least thought of complaining.

Is it not wonderful that a tiny spark will blow up a huge powder magazine, which till that moment remained so quiet and harmless-looking? Is it not wonderful that a little touch of electricity, travelling miles in mystery, will discharge a torpedo, which blows a big ship into the air with all its freight of life, hopes, and fears?

They never knew how it came about. The pitiful trifles which involve great crises always pass unnoticed. But presently the magazine exploded; she was passionately upbraiding him; he was coldly answering. She was suddenly fired by the accumulation of jealous thoughts which she had hitherto held in check; he for the first time remembered that he had sacrificed some position and much comfort in marrying her. At the same moment he checked the thought, and felt that there was something mean in his nature which allowed it to rise at all.

At length she said, desperately, unthinkingly—

"You would be glad if you had never married me. It would have been a good thing for me if you hadn't."

She was in consternation at her own words the moment they were uttered. She felt that they had been spoken by her evil genius—not by herself. She was bitterly sorry; yet the evil genius held her under its sway, and she could not instantly recall the words; she could not, as she wished to do, throw herself upon his neck and implore his pardon.

But she glanced timorously at him from under her eyebrows.

He stood quite dazed, glaring at her; then his brow darkened—he was reviewing himself, even then, and taking blame to himself.

He spoke in cold deliberate tones, every word falling on her heart like a blow.

"Yes, it would have been—better for you—had we never been married."

He did not say that it would have been better for him if they had never been married, but she did not observe the difference. Even then he remembered the sweet thoughts and brave aspirations which she had inspired, and he was grateful to her, all his nature throbbing with affection for her, and yet he remained apparently cold and stern.

But she only felt that something had snapped; the last cord which held them together seemed to be rent; and with a low cry of pain she sank on a chair.

He walked quickly from the room—quickly, or he would have seen her with head bowed almost to her knees, hands spread over her face, sobbing; and the sight would have brought him to her side again, full of remorse, and taking all the blame to himself. He did not see that; the torture in which they had been living was to end; better it should end now, he thought; and so he hurried away, and shut himself up in his study.

She heard the door close, and it seemed to her as if he had shut her out from his heart for ever. She felt like one who, still living, hears the knell for her own funeral.

What had she done? She had driven him away from her. She had forced upon him the conviction of her unsuitability to be his wife. She had compelled him to regret that he had married her!

She did not even yet see the difference his words had expressed, between regretting the marriage on her account, and on his own. Perhaps he was glad—he would think of Grace, and would wish that he had never seen Teenie.

A hard, wicked feeling crept over her, and she was tempted to a desperate step. She would go away, and leave him free to think of Grace; that would at any rate be a kindness to him. And maybe, when she was away, he would divine something of the pain which she had endured because she loved him.

END OF CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

BY THE WAVES

THE twilight skies are flushed with violet;
The silver waves plash on the yellow strand
With measured music; the grey stones gleam wet,
Like fair soft pearls set in the golden sand.

Yon line of rocks, beyond low-water mark,
Show, half submerged, their sea-weed-tufted crests;

And all secure, at the approach of dark,
The sea-gull motionless on ocean rests.

A tender balm falls on our wearied sense
As list we to the waves, that never cease
Their low, clear ripple—the sweet influence
Of twilight silence, and of calm, deep peace!
ASTLEY H. BALDWIN.

"SOMEBODY'S LUGGAGE."

CONSIDERING the enormous quantity of goods and personal luggage conveyed by any one of our great lines of railway in the course of a year, it would be strange indeed if some of it were not occasionally to go astray, and equally strange if the collection of all such waifs and strays under one roof were not to present a somewhat amusing aggregation of odds and ends.

A sale of portmanteaus and trunks, handboxes and bundles, and all that is in them—the personal baggage of bewildered old ladies and absent-minded gentlemen—is indeed rather suggestive of a treat for people of the Paul Pry type of humanity.

It need hardly be said, however, that curiosity of this kind is invariably disappointed. Anything in the nature of letters would either afford a clue to the ownership of property, or would be destroyed by the company. Moreover, "personal luggage" forms only a comparatively small number of items in the catalogues, by far the greater part usually consisting of "goods," which from various causes have remained on the companies' hands during the year.

By most of the lines these sales are held annually, and they are usually conducted under circumstances which add materially to the oddity and interest of the scene. Under some railway arch, or right in the midst of a maze of lines, choked up by trucks and wagons and wheezing steam-engines, that look as though they have wedged themselves in beyond all possibility of extrication, one finds, perhaps, a smart, dapper-looking auctioneer perched aloft at a rickety little table, mounted on the top of some tubs, and hemmed in by an assemblage of people every whit as miscellaneous as the goods heaped up around them.

Tailors and tinkers, Whitechapel "costers," Dudley Street "translators," marine-store dealers, Houndsditch Jews, ecclesiastical furniture warehouse-men, speculative daffies with an eye to little lots of crockery, and dandies come to bid for opera-glasses—all are mixed up in a higgledy-piggledy mob, well worthy the attention of some modern Hogarth.

The singularly heterogeneous character that may often be observed in these groups, is accounted for by the piles of goods displayed around them. Very odd indeed must be the vocation of the individual who does not find something in the catalogue more or less worthy his attention, and for those who have no particular vocation in life there are tempting little lots of knick-knacks, dished up with that delightful spice of incongruity which only an auctioneer's clerk knows how to infuse. One lot comprises thirteen pairs of stays, sixteen boxes of night-lights, eighteen bottles of port, and a black velvet pall. In another we find half a dozen dolls, forty-three pounds of tea, a knife-grinder's machine, and a guitar; and in another a box of bricks, a speaking trumpet, a gallon of Irish whiskey, and a jar of pickles. Wooden hoops and butterfly-catchers, camp-stools and tin saucepans, puff-boxes and zinc pails, knives and nutmeg-graters, pipes and purses, mottled soap and velocipedes, fans and feather beds, muffin-dishes and mattresses, bird-cages and black-lead, Nornandy pippins and nine-pins, are often thrown together in a manner which betrays a keen eye for the picturesque, or the indulgence of a grim humour. Who, for instance, but a wag who had personally tested the eighteen bottles of port, and found it poisonous stuff, would have thought of requiring the purchaser to take a black velvet pall along with it?

Of course they are not all jumbled together in this fashion. For the most part, the goods are divided into lots apparently with a view to the convenience of dealers in various lines of business, who usually constitute the majority of these gatherings, and between whom there are sometimes spirited little contests of a rather entertaining character.

Half a dozen uncleanly natives of the Seven Dials over a hamper of odd boots and shoes, for instance, are likely to be very interesting. To the uninitiated one hundred and sixty-three boots and shoes, odd or in pairs, as the fates may determine, are a particularly uninviting lot to look at. A Dudley Street "translator," however, can afford to give £3 5s. for such a lot—such, at least, was the case at a sale held some time ago, and even then he had to submit to a good deal of fist-shaking, and some rather "haggrawating" remarks by rival cobblers, who appeared to envy him his prize. A very severe contest was also fought over a similar lot of four hundred and three socks and stockings, which ultimately fetched £1 3s.

Hats and caps are usually to be found in the catalogues of these sales in great numbers, some of them new goods, but a great many of them may probably be regarded as representing so many spasms of dismay experienced by incautious wights who have, some time during the preceding twelve-month, thrust their heads out of railway carriage windows, only to see their headgear frolicking along the line in the remote distance behind. At the sale recently held on the premises of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway there were great numbers of hats, as well as other articles of dress of almost every imaginable description, from collars and "dickeys" to an "equestrienne's velvet jacket and bodice, trimmed with gold lace." There were Paisley shawls and opera cloaks, soldiers' uniforms and bathing costumes, blouses and bonnets, cricketing pads and sealskin muffs, feathers and artificial flowers—altogether an accumulation of wearing apparel which appeared fairly to exhaust even an auctioneer's nomenclature, and reduced him to the necessity of describing some lots as "various."

In all sales of this kind the most numerous articles are invariably umbrellas, walking-sticks, and sunshades. In the catalogue of the sale just referred to, there were close upon fifteen hundred articles of this kind.

The property thus disposed of every year, though enormous in the aggregate, is really insignificant when compared with the amount of goods dispatched by rail; and the instances in which valuables are really lost by the owners would appear surprisingly small, if from all that is sold as lost property we were to set apart goods which have been more or less damaged in transit, and for which the companies have paid compensation, as well as those thrown upon their hands by consignees who decline to pay their legitimate charge for warehousing. Deduct these two classes of luggage, and losses resulting from the sheer carelessness of passengers and consignors, and we shall be bound to admit that on the whole our great carrying systems are exceedingly well managed.

JOHN BULL'S MONEY MATTERS.—THE BUDGET, AND ALL ABOUT IT.

BY ALFRED S. HARVEY, E.A.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

N former papers we have endeavoured to explain two very important matters in connection with John Bull's pecuniary affairs—viz., how it comes to pass that he has so much to pay for interest of his debts, and how the Sovereign's income is arranged. In the present paper we wish to elucidate some other points connected with our national finance, which, though not perhaps of such peculiar interest as the National Debt and the Civil List, are yet worth investigation.

Every year, just before Parliament meets, and when the newspapers are actively discussing proposed political or legislative changes, there are certain questions which are sure to be asked, and certain expressions sure to be very much in men's mouths. Will there be a Surplus of Revenue over and above the Expenditure, so that taxes may be remitted; or will the Revenue be deficient, so that additional taxes must be imposed? Will the Budget, when opened, indicate a frugal and stinted expenditure; or will the purse-strings of the nation be relaxed? If the latter, in what direction will the increased outlay be observed, and will it consist of a general extension of existing charges, or will the Consolidated Fund have to bear some new and special weight? These and other questions John Bull asks in a rather plaintive and deprecatory tone, for all these arrangements touch his pocket.

Not without excellent reason has John been called the modern Issachar—a strong ass couching down between two burdens, one Direct, the other Indirect Taxation. And it is a matter of no small moment for him to know whether his loads are to be lightened or rendered more weighty still.

We want then, in this paper, to explain very briefly the course which the public money takes, from the time when it leaves the tax-payer's pocket till it reaches the public creditor of whatever kind. Our explanation will, we hope, elucidate most of the questions just referred to. At the outset, we encounter one term which must be clearly comprehended. We mean the expression Consolidated Fund.

In our paper on the National Debt, we pointed out that originally the moneys arising from each particular tax were kept separate in the Exchequer, to be applied to a specific branch of expenditure, and to be diverted to no other. In process of time many of the separate funds thus formed proved inadequate to meet the demands on them. Then the produce of several taxes was consolidated into one general fund, so that a surplus on one might compensate for the deficiency on another. This plan, once adopted, was soon developed. But, though this process of consolidation was commenced as early as the Revolution, and was extended by successive finance ministers, it was not until 1785 that the idea of one fund was reached. In that year, the Commissioners of Public Accounts suggested the formation of one fund into which should flow every stream of the public revenue, and from whence should issue the supply of every service.

This recommendation has been gradually carried out, and now the entire Income of the country is carried to, and forms, what is called the Consolidated Fund.

The Consolidated Fund then is, in reality, the great account into which flows the public income of the nation, whether arising from imperial taxation, from the sale of old stores, or the repayment of moneys lent by Government. The wine merchant who pays duty on the wine or spirit he has withdrawn from the bonding warehouse; the wealthy dame who pays Income Tax on her quarterly dividends; the tattered charwoman who gleans scanty comfort from her few ounces of taxed tea; the landed peer who succeeds to the broad acres of his ancestors, through the succession duty; the wealthy parvenu, delighting in hair-powder for his footmen, and heraldic crests on his plate; the legacy-hunter, whose legacy duty reminds him of his success; the old maid renewing the licence for her favourite poodle; the humblest purchaser of a postage stamp—all these are contributors to the Consolidated Fund. Up to 1834, the money paid in as taxes was kept in strong-boxes at the Exchequer Office at Westminster. Since that time the custody of the public money has been transferred to the Bank of England, so that now the Consolidated Fund represents the account of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the Bank.

Again, as all public revenue of whatever kind passes into, and forms, the Consolidated Fund, so the entire public expenditure is defrayed thereout. But all the claims on the fund have not the same rank and precedence. Some services are regarded as having a more urgent claim upon the State than others, and so form prior charges upon its income. And while all charges on the fund have Parliamentary sanction, some have been authorised once and for all by special Acts of Parliament, while others cannot be paid without an annual vote of the House of Commons.

The services which are made prior charges on the Consolidated Fund are—the interest of the National Debt, which ranks first of all; then the expenses of the Civil List—i.e., the amount set apart by the country for the maintenance of the Crown; next come the various pensions and annuities which have from time to time been granted to members of the Royal Family, or to illustrious soldiers, statesmen, and jurists; the salaries of the judges and other high officials, together with a formidable array of compensations; and, lastly, the interest of certain loans for which the country is responsible. These services, when once the sanction of the Legislature has been formally obtained to their regular payment, are, so to speak, withdrawn from the subsequent notice of Parliament.

Full particulars concerning these matters are published in the yearly Finance Accounts, but they are no longer exposed to annual debate in the House of Commons. So far as the dividends of the National Debt, the Civil List, and some other charges are concerned, it is obviously a wise arrangement that they should not be the subject of annual votes of Parliament. But of late years the House of Commons has considerably tightened its hold on the financial operations of the Executive Government, and many salaries formerly prior charges upon the Consolidated Fund are now included in the yearly votes of the House.

When full provision has been made for these prior charges, the surplus of the Consolidated Fund is available to meet the Supply Services, or the services that are annually voted in the House of Commons.

These Supply Services include all the great branches of public expenditure, the cost of the army and navy, and civil administration, and expenses incident to the collection of the revenue. The mode in which the surplus of the Consolidated Fund is made available for these purposes we now proceed to explain.

On the opening of Parliament, the Crown, in the Speech from the Throne, demands that annual provision may be made for the public services, and announces that estimates of the sums required will be presented to the House. These estimates exhibit the cost of the army and navy and of each Government department, the expenditure being detailed under a large number of separate votes, so as to admit of ready and minute criticism and comparison.

When they have been circulated, the House of Commons resolves itself into what is called Committee of Supply to consider them. Each vote is brought forward separately, and is explained and, if need be, defended, by the minister responsible for its administration. After full discussion, if the vote remains unaltered, a resolution is passed by the Committee appropriating the sum required for the particular vote in question for the period of one year.

These grants in Committee are subsequently reported formally to the House of Commons. Thus, when all the grants in Supply have passed the House, the entire expenditure of the Government, with the exception of that which forms the prior charges on the Consolidated Fund, has been carefully revised and approved by the British Parliament.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

"TWO SISTER FORMS."

H, the grassy meads of Twickenham !
I sit and close my eyes,
And see their summer greenness
Beneath dear England's skies !

All bathed in English sunshine,
Basking in June they lie,
Green-shadowing with their rushes
Thames' waters dreaming by.

Oh, for far England's freshness,
 For England's full cool streams,
 For Thames's tide full flowing
 In coolness through my dreams !
 White glares our river channel
 With scarce a glistening pool,
 And hot and dry's the parching air
 No dews or rains may cool.

The bush is scorched to stillness,
 And in the hush, in thought,
 My old dear days in England
 Back to my eyes are brought.
 The dripping oar suspending,
 I let the boat drift on,
 Dazed in the more than sunshine
 Of eyes that on me shone.

Oh, eyes away in England !
 Are your dear dreams like mine ?
 Do those old noons I'm seeing
 To-day on you, too, shine ?
 I see along warm grasses
 Two sister forms soft thrown,
 As when one waited for me
 Here exiled and alone.

Oh, come, thou golden future !
 Come quick, thou happy day,
 That northward steams me homeward,
 With gold won far away—
 With gold that lets me whisper,
 Where Twickenham's meadows shine—
 "I've worked and won you, darling,
 And now you will be mine !"

W. C. BENNETT.

'DENIS DHUV.'

AN IRISH LEGEND.

ON the side of an Irish mountain—the Reek of Croagh Patrick, away in the wilds of West Connaught—a man lay, apparently lifeless, his fair curls bedraggled and drenched by the pitiless pelting of the sudden summer shower. Presently the rain ceased, and the June sun shone out blindingly, cruelly scorching the man's upturned face, and drying the blood which seemed to flow from a wound at the back of his head. The raindrops which quivered upon the scanty mountain vegetation were quickly dried up, and the glaring, searching sun showed the shadow of every slender bent blade and tuft of heather. The pretty Erica Mediterranea, which grows in abundance at the base of Croagh Patrick, becomes rarer as the summit of the mountain is gained ; consequently, there being but slight obstruction, the faint breeze which arose was sufficient to send the man's hat rolling down the slope. On and on it went, as heedless as any other unthinking thing—animate or inanimate—in its downward course ; and never stopped until it rested amongst the nettles which grow in luxuriant profusion around the mouldering ruins of Murrisk Abbey, that lies at the foot of the mountain.

"Glory !"

The ejaculation proceeded from a tall gipsy-looking girl, who was gathering nettles in the old churchyard. She had the true Irish eye—

—"the greenest of things blue,
 The bluest of things grey," and masses of dark curling hair loosely gathered into one knot at the back of her bare head. She wore coarse country-made brogues, a short scarlet petticoat, and a small shawl crossed over her bosom. Stepping briskly through the nettles, she took up the hat, and her changeful eyes dilated as she exclaimed in an awe-stricken voice—

"Saints above us ! it's full av wet blud !" Then, with the quick-wittedness of her race, she continued, "It's some poor craythur up an the Reek."

Putting her bag of nettles in a place of safety, Honor Costigan ascended the slope of Croagh Patrick, with a foot as sure and as fleet as one of her own mountain goats.

Long and diligently she searched, yet the red sun was sinking to its rest in "the underworld" beyond the western main, ere she had had time to summon her father and brother, and help them in carrying the insensible man to their cabin.

"We're in luck's way !" said Honor, whose sharp ears had caught the sound of the click of a horse's hoofs coming along the road. "I'll go bail that's Denis Dhuv. I'll find him aff for Docthor Sharpe."

She ran to the cabin door, just as a young man dismounted from a shaggy mountain pony. Denis Kinselagh, or Denis Dhuv (i.e., Black Denis)—as he was commonly called, from his dark complexion and lowering brow—looked what he really was, a well-to-do small farmer. He was about the middle height, muscular, and with handsome features : a thin, clearly-cut mouth and nostrils, which quivered with every emotion ; but there was a lurking, demon in his black eyes, which made little children run from before him, and mothers instinctively clasp their babes closer and cross themselves, whenever Denis Dhuv drew near. No neighbour ever asked him for the loan of a plough or a cart; he never was seen at wedding, christening, or wake; the priest never dropped in to see him in a friendly way; the few tenants upon his land would beg or borrow their rent rather than ask him for a respite upon gale-day; he was feared, and he knew it, and laughed at it.

Yet this was the man whom bright, beautiful, impulsive Honor Costigan loved with all the fervour of her loving nature. A pretty picture she looked, as she stood in the doorway, her cheeks flushed and her eyes sparkling with excitement. With a man's vanity, he ascribed it solely to her joy at seeing him, and said, as he tied his pony's bridle to a post—

"I didn't think I'd be so late at Slieve fair. I suppose ye wor lookin' out for me?"

"Well, t' tell the truth, I wasn't," she replied; "for me father, an' Pat, an' me was carryin' a gentleman down that we found lyin' an the mountain. Denis, jewil, will yeh go for Doethor Sharpe? We're afeared the poor gentleman's dead!"

"Dead dhrunk most likely," said he cynically; "let me see him."

He entered the cabin, and proceeded unceremoniously to the inner room, where lay the body on "the bed."

Pat Costigan was trying to force some whiskey between the white lips. His efforts were crowned with success, for as Denis and Honor entered, the man feebly moaned, and turned his head.

"Thank God he's not dead!" fervently ejaculated the girl. "Denis, darlint," she whispered, "will yeh ride aff for Doethor Sharpe at wanst?" And she followed him as he abruptly left the room.

"Yer in a wondherful state about this gentleman wid his white hands and his goold chain!" said he with an ugly sneer on his face. "D'ye know he's only a man from London that dhraws pictures, and that's lodgin' beyant on the coast? Phew! he isn't worth savin'!"

Honor's grey eyes flashed.

"I'll go meself," said she indignantly, taking down her blue cloak from the nail on which it hung. "Me father is too ould t' go quick enough, an' Pat can't lave the gentleman! Throth, I'm ashamed av yeh, Dinis!"

"It's you that does look purty when yer vexed," he remarked quietly; "put up yer cloak, alannah; I'll go for Doethor Sharpe."

Notwithstanding the care of Doctor Sharpe, and the unremitting attention of the brave, warm-hearted girl who had found him on the mountain, many weeks elapsed before the stranger was able to be up and about again.

Harold Singleton was, as Denis Dhuv had said, a painter; moreover, he was a kind-hearted, genial, chivalrous gentleman. He soon saw how matters stood between Honor and Denis, and often good-humouredly bantered the girl about her black-looking lover.

After some time, he sent to his lodgings for his drawing materials, and said to Honor one day—

"Honor, how would you like to have a picture of yourself to give to Denis?"

"I'd like it well, sur," she replied; "but could yeh put the likes av me into a picture?"

"I'll do my best," said he, laughing at her simplicity; "but first you must let me settle your hair in my own way; take it all down."

Honor removed the horn comb, and her hair fell in heavy masses over her shoulders. Harold Singleton was looping it up artistically, when a shadow darkened the doorway, and Denis Dhuv said—

"Honor, I want you."

"Don't tell him about the picture," whispered Harold, bending over her; "it would spoil all."

She gave him a quick glance of intelligence, and hastily twisting up her hair, followed Denis Dhuv out of the house. To her amazement, he said nothing; but taking her roughly by the arm, led her down by the side of the breen, until they were out of sight of the cottage. There was an ominous look on his dark face, as he asked in a voice of suppressed rage—

"How dare yeh let that fellow touch yer han! D'ye mane to marry me, or t' go aff wid him?"

"Arrah, Dinis agra!" said she coaxingly, "don't be so crass! Av coorse I'm goin' t' marry yeh as soon as we can get the money together, t' get Father Mahony to say the few words for us. Don't mind the gentleman; he didn't mane no harm. It was my fault, Dinis; he axed me t' let him settle me hair his own way."

"Mhonia-mon-dioul!" he exclaimed; "he axed t' settle yer hair, an' yeh let him, an' yeh as good as marrid t' me! I'll tell yeh what it is, Honor; afther that, yeh'll niver call me husband. G'off wid yer grand gentleman lover, and let him settle yer hair for yeh!"

The girl became deadly pale. Wildly flinging her arms around her lover, she cried—

"Dinis! Dinis! for the love av Heaven, don't talk that-a-way! Misthur Singleton didn't mane no harm; come back t' him an' ax him, av yeh don't b'lieve me!"

But the demons of suspicion and jealousy had been working in his breast for some time past, and at last had burst their bonds. He loved Honor as much as it was in his nature to love any human creature, but being by nature distrustful, he could not give her credit for feelings in which he was himself wanting.

"I seen enough," he replied, "I don't want t' go back. An' ivry time I come up in the evenin' I see him laughin' and talkin' t' yeh. Go aff to him now, yer grand gentleman lover, wid his white hands an' this smooth tongue, an' may my heavy curse light upon yeh both!"

He turned, and would have left her, but she only clasped him the more tightly, exclaiming—

"Dinis! me own darlint Dinis, that I love betther nor me own heart's blud! I tell yeh there was no harm in what the gentleman did; he was only settin' me hair t' put me in a picthur for you. That's God's thruth, Dinis, but he towld me not t' tell yeh!"

"That's the ind av it!" said he, roughly disengaging her clinging hands; "yer only tellin' more an yerself. Yer a bad, oudacent girl, t' have a saycret wid one man, an' going to be married t' another. I've done wid yeh!" and waving his hand, he went rapidly down the road, and was soon out of sight.

The miserable girl was too much stunned to follow him. There she stood gazing at the turn of the road where she last beheld him. With the strange perversity of her impulsive woman's nature, she seemed to love him all the more, the more he acted differently from other men. Honor had had lovers in plenty, and any one of them she could have done pretty much as she had liked with; but Denis Dhuv had always cowed her, mastered her, and seemed to exert a strange fascination over her. She saw his faults and, woman-like, she loved them because they were his. Harold Singleton she thoroughly liked—no one could but do so—yet no thought towards him which would have been disloyal to her lover had ever crossed her pure mind.

The painter knew that; he had lived long enough amongst men and women, and had studied them too keenly, not to be able to see through Honor's transparent and innocent nature; and he respected the ignorant untutored girl as he had respected no woman since that awful day two years before, when he had laid his fair young wife, with her baby at her breast, in her last home in Highgate Cemetery.

Honor sat down on a bank behind a ditch, her head resting upon her knees. She was accustomed to Denis' evil tempers, and tried to persuade herself that this ebullition would pass off, and that she would meet him at chapel as usual the next Sunday morning; she took no heed of the passing time, and did not note that the evening shadows grew longer and longer, and that the daylight paled and paled, and then faded away from the face of heaven. She was too much occupied by her conflicting thoughts, and started violently when a voice beside her said—

"Why, Honor! is this you?—all alone? Where is Denis?"

The speaker was Harold Singleton.

"Dinis wint away, sur," she replied with a sort of sob in her voice, which was not lost upon her hearer. He sat down beside her, and gradually drew from her the whole story. He was one of those sympathetic men that women instinctively feel are good, and in whom they unhesitatingly confide. Soon the poor girl's feelings found relief in tears. He strove to soothe her, and said, as he stood up—

"Come—come now, Honor! I shall be leaving this in a day or so, but trust to me to try and set matters straight for you before I go."

Denis Dhuv, behind the hedge, had come up just in time to hear that last speech, and nothing of what had preceded it.

The early morning of a bright August day. The sun has as yet hardly warmed the earth, so there is the freshness of the dew pervading the atmosphere. The bleat of the mountain goats, and the busy hum of golden-ringed bees amongst the heather, alone break the morning stillness. The flag of the truce of the peace of God seems to be unfurled over the land, so calm and still does everything appear. Presently the door of Pat Costigan's cottage is opened noiselessly, and Honor appears, and is proceeding to release a number of fowls from a shed at the side of the cottage, when, to her unfeigned astonishment, Denis Dhuv advances from behind the hedge, and says—

"Honor, will you forgive me for those hasty words last night?"

How her loving heart bounds with joy! He has come back to her!—her love!—the one she has singled from the world!

"Och, Dinis! shure an' I knewn yeh worn't in airnest! Mither Singleton himself was goin' to talk t' yeh to-day."

She is in his arms as he speaks, and he holds her more tightly as she concludes. Timidly she raises her glowing, beautiful face to his dark one, and kisses him. He does not respond to the caress, but says—

"To show yeh I bear no ill-will, I want to take him over to Achill Island to-day. He said he wanted t' see the cliffs there. An' you must come too, Honor."

At breakfast time the proposal was made to Harold Singleton. He did not care to go that day, but the good-natured fellow, thinking it might be a means of consummating the reconciliation between the lovers, consented to it with apparent alacrity.

A simple luncheon, supplemented by a bottle of poteen, was stowed away in the boat along with the sketching materials, and they soon landed upon bleak, sea-girt Achnill. They passed through the curious little village of Dugort, with its cabins built and roofed with round uncemented stones, and after a long and brisk walk, arrived at the famous cliffs of Minnean, which rise sheer from the Atlantic to a height of nearly one thousand feet. Here they paused and sat down, the painter enjoying the view of the Maam Thomas mountains on the northern coast of Clew Bay, and Clare Island, ten miles away, whilst his companions busied themselves in setting forth the luncheon.

"How high are these cliffs?" inquired Harold, standing up.

"Betchune nine hundhred and tin hundhred feet," said Denis, approaching the edge of the precipice; "listen t' the wather roarin' among the rocks below."

Harold approached the edge of the cliff and leaned over, giving his hand to Denis for safety in order to keep him steady. Honour was looking on at the whole scene: her heart stood still, for instinctively she seemed to know what was about to happen. She could not give a warning cry, for her tongue clove to the roof of her mouth; but when she saw Denis Dhuv hurl Harold Singleton over the brink to inevitable destruction, she knew that it was for that purpose he had brought him to the cliffs of Minnean.

"He'll never stan' in me way agam," said he hoarsely, as he approached where she stood, white and motionless as a statue.

"You black-hearted villian!" she exclaimed, recoiling from him, all her love turned to hate. "I'll go back to Connaught, an' from the Killeries down to Kilkee I'll tell what ye done; an' af yeh don't swing for it, me name isn't Honor Costigan!"

"Say that agin!" he yelled, "and ye'll go after him. I swore to meself last night that I'd have me revenge on him! Take back yer words, or I'll throw yeh over after him!"

He drew her near the edge of the cliff as he spoke. She shrieked and struggled to get free; but, save the answering echoes, there was no sound beyond the dull booming of the angry waves which lashed the cliffs, and washed into their rocky bed the dead body of Harold Singleton. Honor almost succeeded in freeing herself from the grasp of Denis Dhuv; in his efforts to keep her from escaping, he grasped her long blue cloak - the clasp with which such garments are usually fastened gave way with the rebound she fell upon her face on the grass, whilst Denis Dhuv sprang backwards over the cliff, over the brink of which a few minutes before he had hurled his victim. The hungry waters seethed and surged, and soon washed into the rocky creek the mangled corpse of the murderer!

In an obscure village in the west of Ireland there lives a poor, mad old woman, who goes by the name of "Foolish Honor." People say she lost her reason from having witnessed the accidental death of her lover and a gentleman who had accompanied them to Achill; for, since that awful day, Honor Costigan never spoke a rational word.

E. OWENS BLACKBURN.

A CROCODILE HUNT.

DURING our return journey from Berenice, we arrived at the little Nubian village of Abou Gooree, near the second cataracts of the Nile, and determined to make a stay of a few days in order to have some rest and arrange our little collection of curiosities, notes, and hunting spoils; but, not least, to somewhat repair or renew our wardrobe, which, after seven months' roughing in the desert, was not in our idea quite presentable at Assuan, where we should most probably meet many European travellers, as it was now the season when most of the "dhahabiehs," or travelling Nile boats, would have arrived at, or be near, that town, in the neighbourhood of which are many places of great interest.

About Gooree is rather a good specimen of a Nubian village; and to us, who for months had seen nothing but the wretched tents and caves of the Ababde Arabs, this village seemed near the perfection of civilisation, with its rough stone and mud-built huts, its whitewashed minaret over the little mosque, and its clusters of date and doom palms, and a few fine sycamore trees. Beyond the village, and stretching about half a mile down to the Nile, were narrow strips of cultivated land, on which grew the "dhoura" (Indian corn), now some inches in height, and the bright fresh green of which was strange but most refreshing to our eyes.

The village is almost surrounded by high and rugged cliffs of granite; on the south running down to and ending abruptly at the edge of the glorious old river, which, although now not at full height, was of great breadth, rushing down in a strong current, sparkling and foaming, among the numerous rocky islands and mud-banks, many of which, as well as the shores of the river, were covered with immense reeds twenty feet high, and so strong that they require a good sword-cut to sever them.

Among these reeds grow quantities of the papyrus, formerly so valuable for writing purposes, but now neglected or only used by the natives for fuel, or for strengthening the sides of the water-courses leading from the river.

On the opposite or western side of the , the desert and granite rocks commence directly at the water's edge, and stretch without the smallest patch of green far away to a purple range of mountains.

We congratulated ourselves on having fallen upon such a pleasant haven of rest as this village, the inhabitants of which made us most welcome, all turning out to meet us; the young women and girls bringing milk, dates, radishes of enormous size, and bread, although tolerably coarse and dark, far superior to any we had tasted for some months. Most of these females wore the usual costume of their sex in these regions when single—viz., an apron of leather fringe ornamented with a few beads, and about twelve inches in depth; their frizzly locks nicely plaited or curled, and their graceful forms shining with grease. The men were not much more encumbered with clothing than the women, although a few of the elder wore a long, wide, loose-sleeved, white gown, and here and there was seen a turban. Most of them carried from one to six long slender lances, while all wore a small dagger fastened on the left arm above the elbow.

A small round-built house was given us, and after we had had it well swept, and half a dozen scorpions routed out, we found it far preferable to our old and dilapidated tents, which had become so tender by constant exposure to the desert sun, that our men could scarcely erect them without putting their heads, hands, or feet through them.

On the evening of our arrival we invited the heads of the village to sup with us, and of course they were attended by nearly all the rest of the men. We were soon informed that the whole community were in great trouble, for they had lately lost several young girls, who, while filling their water-jars, had been dragged into the stream by the crocodiles, which literally swarmed on the river and banks near the village.

They also showed us the bodies of three of these reptiles, which the men had succeeded in killing with their spears within a few yards of the village. They finally begged we would assist them with our rifles, and kill as many as we could; but especially to look after one monster, which was well known to frequent a swampy island covered with reeds a little above the village, and which had in the course of years carried off many females, and a short time before our arrival had dragged down a man who was cutting reeds on the river-bank. Of course we made no objection, and promised after a day's rest we would do our best to relieve the village of these dangerous neighbours.

Next day we got our arms in good order, cleaning them carefully ourselves, and casting a good supply of conical bullets for our two heaviest double rifles, as we knew they would be most effective against the armour-plated brutes. Then we examined the only boat owned by the village, a dilapidated and rotten "canjia" from Lower Egypt, and so old that it required no great stretch of imagination to fancy it might have accompanied Anthony and Cleopatra in some of their Nile trips. With the help of some pieces of wood, palm-leaves, old rope, and the canvas of one of the most useless of our tents, we managed to patch up the old craft; and then, by giving her a good lining of mud, which soon hardened in the sun, we felt quite proud on launching her in the evening to find she was perfectly water-tight, and carried eight men with comfort.

On the day appointed for the hunt, we found every man and boy belonging to the village prepared in some way to take part in the sport. Spears, swords, and shields glittered and rattled in every direction; and the happy possessors of two old flint-lock muskets—the only fire-arms owned in the village—swaggered about, and, as the time approached for the attack, loaded them so often without discharging them, and each time with a handful of powder, that we decided to give them and their guns a very wide berth.

We would rather have had a few of the best men, instead of such a crowd of nearly two hundred—many of them mere boys—as there would not only be the likelihood of frightening the game, but if it came to a mêlée, there was great probability of loss of life. However, it was no use our objecting; they all thought it their duty to assist, and perhaps they were right, for they had been the only sufferers by the crocodiles.

Soon after noon, in a blazing sun, we started for the river, as at this time the brutes like basking or sleeping on the banks and islands. We arranged that we would carry as many men as we could in the boat to the swamp which the particular enemy made his lair; and that the others must do their best, under our four Arabs, who were armed with rifles, and the two redoubtable musketeers—whom we had carefully excluded from our company—to cut off any stragglers on shore or among the shallows.

To our great surprise, the whole mob divided into small parties, and moved off in almost perfect silence, so different to what we had ever observed in the East before, where nothing can be done by the smallest party without immense noise.

As we entered our boat, we observed the mud-banks in the river literally swarmed with the filthy reptiles, which lay asleep, or with their huge gaping jaws wide open, while numbers of small birds were pecking on their backs or near them.

Notwithstanding her heavy complement of men—for, besides ourselves, twelve natives had crowded into the boat—she was slowly but successfully propelled up the stream by means of two clumsy oars and four long poles; and as we passed close under the banks, an occasional splash showed us some of the more wakeful of the crocodiles had become alarmed, and slid quietly into the stream.

We did not wish to fire till we could reach the swamp, on which, and the banks near, we could see scores lying still undisturbed; but just as we turned the head of the boat towards it, and pushed rapidly across the fifty yards of water separating us, a tremendous uproar arose among the reeds along the shore behind us; shouts, yells, screaming of women—who had followed their friends—and the reports of fire-arms told us they were among the enemy, and through the crashing and bending reeds we saw numbers of the slimy reptiles struggling into the river.

The men in our boat now became so excited that she was nearly overturned in their endeavours to throw their spears. Just as we reached the swampy bank, and all leaped into the mud, there was a general commotion among the crocodiles, which were now fully awakened. Many rushed past us straight for the water; two were killed instantly by our heavy bullets, and several were cleverly speared by the villagers, who boldly rushed towards them, and thrust their lances at their throats and sides; but one of the men, not being able to avoid a rush made by three or four of the monsters, received a blow from one of their powerful tails, which threw him down with both legs broken; and he was immediately afterwards trampled into the mud and smothered as they passed over him, before his companions could help.

Many of the other reptiles turned and retreated to the higher part of the swamp, making for the reeds, and evidently intending to reach the water on the other side; but a large party of Nubians had pluckily swum across from the shore to the upper part of the swamp, and were now making their way towards us, as we could hear by their yelling and shouting.

We all now advanced up with some difficulty, as the tenacious mud reached our knees and almost prevented locomotion. Our rifles told upon two more of the brutes before they could make their escape, as they were now struggling among the strong reeds, scrambling over each other's backs, and occasionally making attempts to rush past us. Our men speared and stabbed several which had been pressed into the mud by their stronger brethren passing over them; but just as we were reloading, a crashing and bending of the reeds immediately before us showed a terrific monster, that halted in his rush only five yards away.

"Timsah Sheitan!" (Devil Crocodile) shouted the natives, and all made off towards the boat as fast as the mud would allow them; one of the braves knocking my rifle from my hands, as I endeavoured to force down the bullet, and sending the weapon deep into the mud. Another, while hurrying on with his face turned backwards to the dreaded brute, sent his lance clean through the coat of my companion, who was not only nearly knocked down, but narrowly escaped being speared through the body.

We shall never forget the appearance of the huge Saurian, which, luckily for us, had not advanced further, but regarded us with his wicked little eyes, snapping his horrid jaws, which opened at least two feet each time. My rifle was gone, and I had nothing but my revolver and hunting knife, and fully expected him to rush at me, when my companion, who had reloaded one barrel, fired past me, and hit him near the left eye, causing him to spring back, and lash right and left with his immense tail.

Discretion was certainly the better part of valour in this instance, for with his formidable jaws, or a sweep of his tail, he could easily have sent us out of his way, and prevented us taking part in any more hunting exploits; so discharging three shots of the revolver directly at his mouth, although they had no more effect than to cause an increased rapidity of snapping, we made for the boat, and got over the intervening space in half the time it had taken us to advance—only to find the whole of the men had crowded into it, and that it was immovably fixed in the mud.

With difficulty we stopped their shouting and flourishing of weapons, and as some got out, and were trying, though unsuccessfully, to get her off, we saw the monster and about twenty others making straight towards us, pursued by the Nubians, who had landed on the other side and made their way through the reeds. In jumped the greater part of the men, leaving only myself and four others struggling to move the craft, while my companion rapidly capped both barrels of his piece.

Next moment the crocodiles were close upon us—the big one leading, and as he turned slightly, dealing the old boat a blow with his powerful serrated tail, that made her fly to pieces as easily as a child would destroy a house of toy blocks, sending the men head over heels, some into the water, others among us, laying me flat on my back in the mud—a position, though ignoble, which saved me from another sweep of the tail, for I felt it pass over me, covering me with filth and slime, and killing one poor fellow immediately beside me; but the next instant my friend's two barrels were discharged into the monster, laying him dead beside us. The other brutes succeeded in plunging into the river, and all escaped.

The hunt was now over ; not a crocodile but the dead was to be seen ; and as we freed ourselves from the mud and rubbish with which we were covered, we were joined by the other villagers, who were in high glee, for they had killed twelve of their enemies, and we had killed eight ; but their great delight was to find that "Timsah Sheitan" was at length effectually disposed of. This brute measured twenty-three feet in length, and from his worn teeth and generally antique appearance, must have been of great age. The natives insisted that he had haunted the White Nile above Kartoum five hundred years before ; but, having ourselves had pretty good experience of Eastern habits of ages, we prefer to leave the decision to better judges of the Saurian than ourselves.

We recovered my rifle ; and the boat being perfectedly useless, and the stream apparently clear of crocodiles, we had no hesitation in following the example of our black companions, and swam across to the village, where we were all received by the women and elders with great applause, and shouting, and drumming ; they had also brought abundance of refreshments, of which we were now greatly in need. The whole night was passed in festivity and rejoicing, only damped by the shrill cries of mourning among the relations of the three men who had been killed, and whose bodies were brought over and buried next day.

We stayed a week longer at the village, and on our departure for Egypt had more presents of bread, vegetables, fruit, well-dressed monkey and leopard skins, and ostrich eggs than we could conveniently carry ; but during our stay not a single crocodile was seen near the village, or that part of the river, so complete had been their scare. We left these simple people with the knowledge that for the present, at least, we had given them some relief by our crocodile hunt.

ABOU DAHKNE.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIRST.

GONE AWAY.

ALL the vague fears which had disturbed him during the night were suddenly reflected upon his mind. He heard the sob of the wind, he looked with dazed eyes on the confused movements of the fisher-folk ; he turned to the heaving sea, and a thought which terrified him—which he tried to beat out of his brain, took possession of him. Was he to take his place amongst these mourners, not as their guide and comforter, but as their fellow-sufferer ? Had the cruel sea robbed him also of his treasure ?

Impossible—she could not be so mad, so wicked as to venture upon the sea last night. Then he remembered her craving to know what lay beyond the horizon-line of her life, her passionate nature, and her indifference to the perils of the sea. If she could only have witnessed such a spectacle as he had seen that morning !

He did not know how her nature had changed since the birth of Baby ; he still thought her capable of any wild act which might present itself to her fancy. He remembered, however, that there was no boat in the Witch's Bay now since the adventure of Teenie and Grace, and so he had one fear the less. She might have obtained a boat elsewhere, but that was not at all likely.

Then he was confronted by the enigma: What had she done ? Whither had she gone ? To Dalmahoy ? To Craighburn ?

No, she would not go to either of these places in the humour she was in last night ; and there was no other place to which there was the least probability of her going.

He thought, with bitter remorse, of the many trifling acts of neglect of which he had been guilty towards her ; he magnified them into cruelties of the first importance. He thought of how often he might have given her pleasure when he had turned from her, complaining that she took no interest in his labours, and how important it was that all his thought and time should be concentrated upon the duties he had undertaken. He wished the old time back, that he might be more loving and less exacting. Ah, how kind he would be ! how merciful to all her sins ! how proud of all her pretty ways, and how blind to all her faults !

He thought of these things when it was too late ; he condemned himself utterly and without pity.

"God help us, Ailie ; I fear we too have had a wreck last night."

"What's wrang—and what gar'd you ask about Teenie, when you maun have been wi' her a' night ?"

"No—we quarrelled—I stayed in my room. She did not go to bed. I thought she was with you."

"God be here!" exclaimed Ailie, in terror; "no wi' you, and no wi' me!—then she's drowned!"

He felt sick as he listened to this echo of his own first thought. Both had remembered her mermaid-like ways, and leapt to the conclusion that the worst had happened. The idea never occurred to them that she could have adopted the common-jocund morning were ready to make amends for the dismal shadows of the night.

Ailie was an active, bustling old wife, indeed she was apt to bustle too much, and to make everybody uncomfortable by her restless endeavours to keep everybody right. So she quickly recovered from her astonishment.

"It canna be, minister, that she's no in the house. She's just been making fun of you, as she used to do with me. Often she would go away for a whole place method of travelling—on her feet. As usual in matters of mystery, the wildest possible explanations obtained the first attention, whilst the real explanation was quite simple.

His head bowed, brows knit, cheeks white, and his hands clutching the staff which he held across his body—as if holding himself in, trying by physical means to restrain himself from any violent outburst of passion or grief—he stood gazing at the sand; deaf now to all the din of wind and waves, of voices in sorrow or joy, and blind to the grandeur of the scene around him. The sun had at last overcome the mist and burst in a broad golden glare upon sea and rocks, which sparkled and gleamed with many brilliant colours, as if the day without saying a word, and for no other end than to have a laugh at me. She'll be hode somewhere about the house. I'll go see."

"Very well; I'll follow you presently."

There was something unpleasantly quiet in the way he said this; at the same time he raised his head, and the face was cold and stonelike.

Ailie was hurrying off, and he made a quick movement as if to stay her; but he let her go. His thought had been to bid her keep silent about the fears they entertained regarding Teenie; but then if she had really disappeared, the wider the fact was known the sooner she would be discovered. But his heart writhed under the sense of shame, and the prospect of the scandal, which all this involved.

There was a bitter feeling growing up within him, which made his blood cold, and gave an unnatural clearness to his thoughts.

He turned to the fisher-folk—they did not suspect how entirely he shared in their sorrows; they were grateful for his kindness, but they did not feel his sympathy so warm at this moment as they had felt it a little while ago.

"Go up to the station, Davie," he said to Tak'-it-easy, "and telegraph to Aberdeen, Peterhead, Bervie, and to any of the stations they can communicate with, for early news of the missing boats. I hope we may have good news in a few hours."

Davie pledged himself to perform the task with dispatch, and to wait for the answers. He set off with what was for him a singularly swift step; but on emergency he could exert himself like other folk.

Walter next gave directions about Red Sandy and the funeral; ordered various comforts for the wife and bairns; told those who were waiting in suspense to be patient—if they could; that amendment came with bitterness out of his own suffering. But he was perfectly clear and considerate in all his instructions. He did not forget anything or anybody. The people who were not absorbed in their own afflictions or alarms, observed that he was "gey weary-like," but they supposed it was due to the exertions and anxieties of the morning. None suspected the anguish he was enduring on his own account.

When he had made all necessary arrangements for what had happened and for what might happen, he started homeward; his hat was pulled low over his brow, his staff struck the ground heavily as if he needed support.

Passing through the village, he heard the shouts and laughter of children—a strange contrast to the lamentations on the beach below.

Habbie Gowk was marching down the street, strumming as loudly as he could "The Campbells are Coming," on a Jew's harp, or "trump," as it is called; Beattie followed him, and on the back of the donkey were two touzy-headed bairns (girls), of four or five years, whilst a boy of about nine held them securely in their places. A troop of children gambolled about this droll procession, shouting, and making fun of the poet and his companions. The twang of the trump was only heard at intervals above the din of the urchins. As soon as he saw Walter, Habbie took the instrument from his mouth, and saluted him.

"Bad work down yonder, minister," he said, nodding towards the beach; "I did not go after you, for I thought it would be ower muckle for my nerves, and I could do nothing. But it made me feel angry, the thought of it; and what do you think I did?"

"Went home to your breakfast, perhaps, and tried to forget that there was sorrow in the world."

"No, sir; I could not do that, seeing what I've been tholing mysel' for guid kens how long. I just gaced up to that lawyer body, Currie, and roused him out of his bed—that would be good for him—I dinna believe he has seen this side of eight o'clock for years. He was for refusing to see me, but he was mistaken on that score. I banged intil his bed-chamber, and got him in his night-gown.

"What do you want at this untimely hour of the night?" says he.

"Night!" says I; 'it's broad day, and I'm ashamed of a man come to your years to speak that way of the Lord's blessed light. I want to ken when I'm to get that fortune, and I'll have no more putting off's about it.'

"How can I tell you?" says he; 'it depends upon the court: it may be next week, and it may not be for years. I've told you that often enough, and you're a fool, Habbie, to annoy me in this way.'

"A fool," says I, looking at him as though it was at the far end of a fiddle, 'a fool in troth for listening to you. You've just worried the sowl out of me with your fortune; but you can take it to the deevil if you like now, for I'll have no more ado with it.'

"And with that I tramped out. It was a sore temptation to give him a wallop, for he had naething but his night-sark on; but I thought of the bairns, and I resisted temptation. Outside, the bairns were cuddling Beattie, and wanting a ride; so I put them on, and felt happier nor I've done since the day I first heard of the fortune. I would not take it now if they were to pay me for it. The thought of it has been naething but a misery to me, and now I'm beginning to feel like my old self. So we're going for a daunder."

Walter listened to all this as patiently as if he had no care of his own; never attempting to interrupt, never displaying the least irritation. When he had done—

"I have no doubt you will be a happier man, Habbie, forgetting the fortune than you could be waiting for it. If it is yours, it will perhaps come to you in time; but, at any rate, you can do without it; that is a great consolation. There are many to whom it would bring happiness: as it is, there are many to whom it has brought nothing but vexation."

"It's a' vanity, minister, and there's nae telling what a vexation of spirit it has been to me. But I'm for no more of it; I'll sell my ballants, sing my sangs, and let the deevil flee awa' with the fortune."

"Where are you going now?"

"Wherever the Lord wills and ballants may be sold ; to the fairs and markets, and to see our auld friends throughout the country. The Lord be thanked we have no fortune to taigle or fash us now."

"Will you go by Dalmahoy, and say that I would like to see the Laird at once?"

"I'll go to John o' Groat's if you like—hereabout or far awa', it's a' ane to Dandy."

"Dalmahoy will be far enough to oblige me at present. And yet—yes ; I would like you to go on to Craighburn, and tell Miss Wishart——"

He stopped : Habbie filled up the pause.

"I was going there at any rate. I want to tell Miss Grace what I've done. She's been a good friend to me."

"She has been a good friend to every one. I'll give you a note for her."

He took out his pocket-book, and wrote—

"In trouble. Come to Drumliemount if you

He tore the leaf out, folded, addressed it, and handed it to Habbie.

"All right, sir ; Beattie and me will be there in nae time. Am I to wait for an answer?"

"Don't trouble about that. Good-bye, Habbie, and success be with you wherever you go."

"Thank you, sir ; it's rare kind of you to say the word—there are few folk ken what a lift a kind word is at whiles to a pair sowl. There's many a bonnie flower that would die for want of rain, but that the drap of dew comes and saves it."

"You are a philosopher, Habbie, as well as a poet."

"God kens what I am, for I dinna. Whiles I feel myself such a good-for-nothing creature, that I think it would be best to make a hole in the water, and have done ; but then what would come of Beattie? that holds me back ; and syne I hear a lad or a lass liting one of my ballants, or see them loupin' wi' joy to the tune of my fiddle, or maybe to the twang of this bit trump, and I say to myself, 'Cheer up, man ; if you can make folk blithe for an hour or twa at a time, you're no such a worthless wratch as you thought yourself.' So I go on as before, taking my drum, and seeking sunshine on the hills and in the valleys, roosting in couthie farm-houses, or singing my ballants in a bothy. I never was downright miserable till I heard tell of that confounded fortune ; and I'm blithe again now that I have been and cast it overboard."

"You are fortunate in being able to cast your care overboard ; some people cannot."

"So muckle the waur for them. Good-bye, sir.—Now, bairns, you must get down, and you shall have another ride and another tune when I come back."

He helped the children to the ground with much gentleness ; gave one a pinch and the other a

"kittle" under the arms, till they screamed with laughter ; then he mounted Beattie, and rode off to Dalmahoy.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SECOND.

A PROBLEM.

WALTER encountered Ailie at the gate. She had been looking for him.

"I'm in great tribulation, sir," she said ; "she's no in the house anywhere, and the lass kens naething about her. Oh, what have you been doing or saying, that the poor bairn should have been driven out of her ain house in such a night as it was?"

He was not surprised by the information that Teenie could not be found ; but he winced at what he knew would be the general exclamation—what had he been doing or saying to drive her away?

The blame and the indignation of the folk would fall upon him ; nobody would take the trouble to investigate the real state of the case ; and everybody would at once condemn him. Although he was ready enough to condemn himself, he disliked the idea of other people doing it, and regarding him as a monster. The disgrace of his position would soon tell upon him ; right and left he would hear murmurs of reproach at his conduct ; and he must be silent. He could not defend himself without accusing Teenie, and that he could not and would not do. He must be silent, and wait with what patience he could command for the conclusion of the adventure.

She was gone : that was clear ; and he must set himself to discover in what direction she had turned.

She did not go by the sea, because there was no boat ; and if she had gone by land, it would be an easy thing to overtake her ; but how was it possible to discover the route she had taken? There were no relations to whom she would go ; and she had left not the least trace of her course.

It was a bewildering position, but once satisfied that she had not wilfully given her life to the sea—he argued himself into that belief with a dogged persistency, which indicated the trembling fears lurking behind it—he was disposed to regard her disappearance as a mere outburst of petulance, and he felt sure that she would return by-and-by.

Before Ailie he displayed no emotion except what might be seen in the white face and quivering lips. But in his heart the struggle was terrible between his passion as a mere man and his sense of duty, reverence, and submission as a minister. He was trying hard to find the true path in this darkness which had fallen upon him. His wife had done wrong, and he was angry with her ; but at the same time he felt that he, too, had failed.

He was eager to discover in what, so that he might make all the atonement in his power. Still his heart felt cold and hard.

He had to write to a neighbouring clergyman, to ask him to officiate in his stead on the following day, for he thought himself quite unfitted to administer the Sacrament in his present mood. Opening his desk to take out paper, he saw the rough sketch he had made of Grace and Teenie in the garden at Craighburn, on the occasion of the first visit there with his betrothed. Then the old feeling of tender love came back to him and helped him.

Teenie's face seemed to be full of yearning and doubt; Grace's calm, and pathetically beautiful. He remembered the happiness he had experienced when he saw that those two were friends; and his thoughts travelled on to the day on which they had come up to inspect Drumliemount. He recalled the sweet promises they had exchanged, the bright hopes and dauntless faith which had inspired him. And now!—those bubbles were very beautiful, and their existence very brief.

"Ah, my poor lass!" he said, his eyes fixed dreamily on the sketch; "you cannot know how much I loved you, or you would not have left me. You cannot guess how much my life was bound up in yours, or you would have forgiven me my sins against you, and tried to help me to accomplish some little part of my ambitious dream. So you would have made me a better man, and made me love you more. But the dreams were only dreams, and the reality is this!"

He glanced round the room, in which furniture and books lying in confusion assumed to his fancy an air of desolation. He put the sketch away tenderly, and yet as if he could not bear the sight of it. He felt that it would do him good if his eyes would run with tears. But they were quite dry.

He looked back and saw what a little height he had gained in the great work which he had set before himself to accomplish. He looked forward and saw the hills rise, height over height, until the goal was lost in the silver clouds of summer; so utterly beyond his reach, that it seemed as if there were nothing for him to do but look upward yearning, and die.

But this was the wicked prompting of despair—it was weak and contemptible. There was something better to do than yield to this weakness; he was bound to accept humbly and bravely the fate which was given to him, and strive earnestly to do what was right and best under the circumstances, no matter what pain it cost him. He would try to do that.

He examined the bed-room: she had not taken any extra clothes with her. He looked into a drawer where they kept small sums of money: she had not apparently taken any with her. Then she had not gone far, and she must travel on foot, or borrow a vehicle from some one who knew them.

In that case they would soon trace her.

He tried to fancy in what position she had been standing in the room; then how she had descended to the ground floor. He followed the steps, and suddenly he remembered that low sob at his door. His pulse quickened to pain in the bitterness of chagrin that he had not sprung up and saved her. What fiend of evil humour had kept him in his seat at that moment? The sob echoed in his brain; he saw her with hands stretched towards him, pleading for pity and forgiveness; he had been silent, and she faded away into the mist.

"That is the true irony of fate—when it is busiest we are blindest," he muttered; "God knows what mad act she may have been tempted to perpetrate, thinking my heart was changed towards her."

The cold sense of undefined fear again extinguished all angry thoughts regarding her.

At the door he encountered the Laird, who had been for the last five minutes listening to Allie's description of the calamity which had befallen them.

The Laird was neat and spruce as usual, but the crows'-feet were more distinctly marked than they had been a few months ago, and any one seeing him now would have been able to make a near guess at his actual age.

"So," he said, his hands clasped behind him on the knob of his riding-whip, which he swung between his legs as he spoke, "So, the honey is all eaten, and there's only the bitter wax left in the hive. This is an admirable comment upon your grand contempt for my worldly and selfish counsels—as you called them."

"You counselled wisely, father, according to your view of things; I tried to act honestly, according to mine. I have not repented—Teenie was a good wife."

"Who the devil said she wasn't? I think she was a splendid lass, and she would have made any man's home bright and pleasant, if he only gave her a fair chance. You cannot have done that."

"I tried."

"But trying is not enough—we must do. I am vexed about this squabble; I like Teenie—why, her pretty ways almost persuaded me that it was worth while losing an old family home in order to learn what real affection was; and she showed it to me, whom she had no reason to value much. What have you been doing to drive her away?"

"I cannot tell—I do not even know how the quarrel began; but there were bitter words—the fault is mine."

The Laird looked at him curiously, and observed the restraint he placed upon himself, and the anguish he was suffering.

Then holding out his hand—

"Wattie, my lad, you're down: I won't strike. I'm glad you are so ready to take the blame to yourself. That's right; and now we'll find the runaway, and give her a sound rating for frightening us all."

Walter grasped the offered hand warmly. The two men had never thoroughly sympathised with each other until that moment. They were drawn closer together than ever before, and they seemed to understand each other better.

The circumstances of the disappearance were explained.

"It is a puzzle to know where to look for her," said Dalmahoy, "but you take the horse, and make a circuit northward; I'll take the gig, and go southward. We are sure to find somebody on the road who has seen her. What was the colour of her cloak?"

"Dark grey."

"That's not very distinguishing. Do you know what she had on her head?"

"A Leghorn hat, I believe, with a blue ribbon."

"That's better. Now off you go—we'll soon find her. She must take the road somewhere, and there are only about a dozen roads for her to choose from. I'll get a gig at the inn, instead of going back to Dalmahoy; and, I say, you'd better tell the women-folk here to hold their tongues, for the fewer who know of this business, the more comfortable it will be for Teenie when she comes back."

Walter saw the force of that suggestion; indeed, one of the many disturbing thoughts roused by this escapade of Teenie, was that of the scandal which would spread throughout the county. "The minister's wife run awa'!—aye, sirs, but it's a queer world."

He dreaded hearing that exclamation, although at first, in his anxiety to find her, he had been disposed to brave it. But now, for her sake, he saw that it was best to keep the adventure as quiet as possible.

He arranged with Ailie to take the letter to the clergyman whose friendly help he had asked for the following day; and he left a note for Grace, in the event of her calling during his absence.

Then he set out upon his sad journey. He took the old coach-road first, and the fleet foot of the horse was very slow to his eager spirit. He reached over the neck of the animal, as if that would bring him the sooner to his object.

He drew up beside a stonebreaker, who was busy at work in a hollow by the roadside.

"Were you out early this morning, my man?"

The man dropped his long-shafted hammer, and took off his goggles to have a good look at his questioner, whom he recognised, for it was only about ten miles from Rowanden.

"Aye, I was out at six."

"Many folk passed this way?"

"Oo, aye, plenty folk; there was Brunton's cattleman; and there was a drove o' sheep, with the shepherd and twa dogs; and now there's yoursell'."

"You did not see any—womenfolk?"

"Never a petticoat, and there's no ane like to pass without me seeing it. But there was twa strapping queans passed yesterday wi' their kists in a cart, flitting from Broomicknowe."

"Thank you."

"Oo, you're walcome."

He passed on, up to farmer Brunton's, where his inquiries met with the same result. Then he cut across country, pursued his search in a number of surrounding villages, visited strange farmhouses, and inquired at the cots of the labourers. Occasionally he found a woman at home in the cottages, who, after the first shyness and doubt as to the object of the inquirer, became loquacious enough about everything that had happened during the past fortnight—how the "clocking" hen had brought forth thirteen ducks, and was "rale proud o' the clecking;" how the sow's litter was likely to do weel; and how the cow had calved in the middle of the night, and nearly died. But generally he found in the cots only the bairns, whose parents were out at work, whilst the household was left under the charge of a chubby matron of eight or ten years.

The result was the same in every instance: he obtained not the least hint about Teenie.

The day passed into gloaming, gloaming into night, and still he was apparently as far as ever from the object of his quest.

There was a curious stillness in the atmosphere, as if portending another storm. The occasional chirp of birds, the call of a man to his horses as he led them home, or a brief snatch of a milkmaid's song, mellowed and endowed with peculiar charm by place and time, were the only sounds which broke upon the quietude of the evening. There was a melancholy feeling inspired in him by this awful stillness of nature. As the shadows darkened upon them, the mighty mountains impressed him with a sense of eerie solitude and grandeur. The white mist creeping slowly over all, enshrouding hills, trees, and houses, filled him with sad thoughts. But it was the strange stillness which affected him most; it formed such a bitter contrast to the storm raging within his breast.

He had worn out the horse, and he was obliged to turn homeward, sick at heart, fagged out, and trembling at the rapid growth of his fears for Teenie's safety.

AN OLD TALE OF TERROR.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

IN the year 1756, war broke out with France, and poor Admiral Byng, acting feebly and irresolutely against the Marquis de la Cassilanière, at Minorca, to appease the natives, and save an unsuccessful and tottering ministry, was shot the year after on his own quarter-deck. The same autumn our intrepid ally, Frederick of Prussia, seized Saxony by the throat, poured his trampling infantry into the Bohemian gorges, and pounded the Austrians and Croats soundly at Losnitz.

Brave, pig-headed Braddock's defeat the year before from the Indians at Fort du Quesne had been followed by other repulses in America. In India, too, our star seemed on the wane, in spite of Clive's genius and the recent victories in the Carnatic. Our rise in India had been the growth of the oak and the aloe, not of the gourd or of the fungus. Twenty years before the Restoration, our hardy adventurous merchants had obtained leave of the Mogul of Delhi to build an unfortified factory on the bank of the Hooghly, having before that had a settlement at Surat as early as the time of James the First. Thirty sickly soldiers were all that were allowed to fire salutes and escort the English agents to the Mogul capital. But we grew, and threw our branches, that took root like those of the spreading banyan-tree. The year William came from Holland, and brought us liberty in his ungenial Dutch way, the English settled another factory at Loota-mutty, and the great Awungzebe granted them various well-paid for privileges. At this time the Ganges was all but abandoned by our traders, and Madras seemed now the magnet for our ships. This diversion was fortunate for us, for it gave us a fresh point of radiating growth. The Indian's weakness was our opportunity. In 1696 (towards the close of William's reign), the Nabob, beset by rebel Rajahs, permitted the foreign merchants to fortify themselves—Dutch, French, and English. In 1693 the English purchased the land of Calcutta (a mere village walled by jungle) of the native Zemindar, and the town began to grow, and the magazines to fill with sugar, opium, indigo, cotton, and silk, in spite of the Soubahdar's suspicious jealousy. In 1717 the company (chartered in 1600) obtained from the Great Mogul exemption from customs, an exemption which no other nation, and not even the native merchants, could obtain.

So we went on growing as Samson grew, unobserved, till he arose in his strength and smote the Philistines. No matter to our thrifty traders, blue with indigo and dusty-white with cotton fluff, whether Nadir Shah and the Persians sacked Delhi, and carried off a thousand sullen camels and patient elephants, nine millions of coin, the glistening Peacock throne, and hundreds of bullock-wagons full of plate. The Bengal silks that morning were just as glossy under their nimble fingers; the red lines in their ledgers ruled with the usual accuracy. More sorrow to them if a bag of rupees had miscarried on its way from Kaneegunge, or even a wrong invoice come by the last vessel that passed Sangir Island. There must be a bound to human sympathies—the bounds to the sympathies of Clive's fellow-writers were the walls of their counting-houses. They did their duty there; let the Mogul or the Persian sit on the Peacock throne.

These details, dull as they are, are necessary as a prelude to the story of the cruelties of the Black Hole. In 1756 the Soubahdar or Satrap of Delhi, Aliverdi, who had ruled with ability over the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, died, as even satraps do, and his grandson Souraj-ad-Dowlah reigned in his stead. The venom "sweltering got;" the poison of jealousy, fear, and hatred long concentrating against the English intruders, whose energy and honesty were a standing reproach to Eastern voluptuaries and scoundrels, and whose honest pride would brook no affront, now broke forth, cast abroad as a simoom of a tyrant's rage. This Souraj-ad-Dowlah was a true Hindoo—cowardly and passionate, mean and cruel, suspicious, ambitious, and revengeful. No longer to be bound in by petty doubts and fears, he determined to sweep these English, these Feringhees, into the Ganges. The old tree was jealous of the vigorous young sapling that was to replace it: the wolf always finds it easy to pick a quarrel with the lamb. The taking of Ghcriah, near Bombay, the victory of Clive in the Carnatic, and the luxuriant growth of Calcutta were the real reasons for his rage. His diplomatic pretexts were—the abuse of the "Dustuck," or exemption of duty privilege, by smuggling Indian and other goods under English seals and brands; the refusal to deliver up a rich refugee and his treasure; and, lastly, a less unreasonable complaint against Governor Drake, who had unjustly imprisoned a wealthy Gentoo merchant named Onychund.

The English were stubborn (they sometimes are). They never think they can be beaten; worst of all, as a celebrated French general once observed, they actually don't know when they are. Our merchants obtained their privileges from Delhi, and paid for them there. Souraj-ad-Dowlah, swift as Orientals are when they once rouse themselves from their couches, rapidly assembled an army of fifty thousand of his dusky subjects, and leaped like a hungry tiger upon Calcutta. The tyrant, in his palanquin, led on a fierce crowd of spearmen, and matchlock-men, and half-wild horsemen, whose calabash drums and clashing cymbals were heard sounding one June morning across the rice-fields and among the palm-groves of Cossipoor.

The city of palaces was but a poor place at this time—a mere cluster of brick stores, white merchants' houses, and bamboo huts; one or two pagodas where Chowringhee now is; no esplanade—no stately Government House—no cathedral. On the river, no forests of masts, but a few Arab, Bengalee, and Chittagong vessels; from the walls of the fort, a view across the plain, of nothing but rice-fields and plantations of cocoa-palms. The houses, deserted as the English soldiers fell back by various avenues through the brick bazaars and verandah shops of the Durumtollah and Cosstollah, were just such houses as are to be seen in Calcutta now—the white-washed rooms, airy and lofty, fanned by winnowing punkahs; the walls white, the floors matted, the furniture scanty; the beds veiled with mosquito-curtains; oil lamps at the sides of the rooms.

The hurry and confusion in the factory can well be imagined; the mace-bearers, and palanquin-bearers, and water-coolies, and torch-carriers one by one deserting; soldiers snatching up hasty bargains of rice and pulse from the native shops; others driving cattle into the fort; artillerymen piling shot in heaps, or dragging cannon to command the different approaches. Staid, precise men, clerks and writers of the factory, punctilious and old-fashioned as Dominic Sampson himself, have muskets forced into their hands, and are placed as sentries on the ramparts. Imagine them, in their cocked hats and square-cut coats, wishing themselves safe back in Mincing Lane, on the Broomielaw, or in the quiet Birmingham counting-house. Chests of treasure are being removed to the ships in the Hooghly—that road to England is at least still open; for the English empire in India seems now melting like snow. The soldiers (stolid men, in the cumbrous, awkward dress of the Guards whom Hogarth sketched as they marched to Finchley—rough fellows, with conical brass-plated hats and enormous splatterdashes) began to lose heart when they saw that the governor first wavered and then despaired. Mr. Holwell, as every one knew, was the only hope left. He was grave, firm, and stable as ever, and the mere look of him was more comfort to the men than two Fort Williams.

The bulk of the men were losing heart, and a vague fear was making them ready for a mad, selfish, cruel stampede in any direction, so it were away from the enemy.

Meanwhile the ravening Souraj had pushed on with such speed, that many of his men had fallen dead from heat and fatigue; and now his swordsmen shook their banners and clashed their shields within the city, and closed in upon the fort, where all the English had now taken refuge. The governor had no heart to brave fifty thousand matchlocks with three or four hundred bayonets and half a dozen cannon. The spirit of Leonidas was not in him, and he kept his timid eye fixed on the river and the English ships. He did not pretend to be a hero, and Souraj-ad-Dowlah had been heard to threaten to draw his sabre across his throat when the fort gates once gave way. Those are just the sort of promises tyrants generally do keep.

At two in the morning Governor Drake called a hurried council of war, to which all the private soldiers and Sepoys were admitted. There was much confused discussion as to whether they should retreat that night to the ships in the river, or should struggle on for another day. No determination was come to, and the more resolute considered the retreat as deferred till after another day's fighting. There would be still a few more shots plunged among the turbans, and that consoled the stauncher men who wanted to have a blow for it yet.

Fresh fury in the enemy's fire, more barbaric clamour below the walls, indicated an approaching storm. But the bulk of the company's servants and the many members of the council had no thought but of flight before it was too late. They preferred fighting another day—a day of their own choosing. By twos and threes the men stole away to the ships. It was suddenly remembered with alarm that a company of militia sent to guard the women to the ships had never returned. The fact seemed to realise the danger as seen from the outside. The governor slunk away without a word to a boat that lay at the wharf. It was an example that it was a duty to follow. The military commandant and his friends joined him at the river's side.

The garrison was enraged at this cowardly desertion. All was clamour and tumult, till at last Mr. Pearkes, the oldest member of the council in the fort, resigned his right of seniority to Mr. Holwell, and that grave, steadfast man now took the chief command. His force consisted of about two hundred militia-men and soldiers. There was no room for more desertion, so Holwell instantly ordered the gate leading to the river to be locked, to prevent more men creeping away to the boats, which were returning one by one to the wharf.

A retreat was, after all, the course that should have been pursued, but it should have been a brave, orderly, systematic retreat, with covering parties, order, precision, and proper leaders. Souraj-ad-Dowlah, hearing of Mr. Holwell's determination to resist, made sure that the desire to preserve some vast hidden treasure had led him to this desperate resolution.

The Eastern tyrant little knew how strong is an Englishman's sense of duty.

The turbaned men pressed wall and bastion with untiring ferocity. The hopeless garrison now signalled to the boats. One vessel, however, having struck on a sand-bank, no other ships again ventured near the wharf. As a last resource, on June the 20th, Mr. Holwell, still firm and calm, threw a letter from the ramparts, offering to capitulate; many men having been killed by the balls of the Indian matchlocks, and the residue having lost all heart when their companions deserted them. Encouraged by this sign of a weak defence, the Sourajah's men made a fierce but ineffectual attack with all their force, and then hoisted a flag of truce.

This was answered readily from the fort. A parley ensued, but before the terms of surrender could be agreed upon, the enemy treacherously forced open a gate, and took possession of the place a little before six o'clock in the evening.

Leech, the smith and parish clerk of the company, fled as the enemy entered. The one hundred and forty-four men remaining were taken prisoners. The Sourajah and his chief officers entered the fort in triumph, and seated themselves in contemptuous state in the principal apartment of the factory, having first given orders to search for the supposed treasure. Before seven o'clock, Mr. Holwell was thrice sent for and examined by the Viceroy.

The tyrant expressed violent resentment at the great presumption of the English in resisting him, and evidenced chagrin at the emptiness of the treasury; and, somewhat softened at the third conference, the conqueror dismissed the English chief (as he called him), assuring him on the word of a soldier that he should suffer no harm, neither he nor his people. Mr. Holwell, on his return to his terrified companions, found them in custody of a strong guard of Moorish and Hindoo soldiers, under command of jemetdars (or sergeants).

They were thrust into the Black Hole, or common dungeon of the fort—a detached building at the southernmost end of the barrack. It was a dark room, about eighteen feet square, closely hemmed in by high buildings on the north, east, and south sides, and opening only on the west, and there on to a passage into which its two strongly-barred windows looked. The prisoners were at first ordered under the Piazza, and here Mr. Holwell, overwhelmed with heat, took off his coat and waistcoat, the latter of which was instantly stolen by one of the Moorish guard. Flames now broke out in the factory on both sides of them, and the frightened men, beginning to augur evil, concluded they were placed there purposely to be suffocated; but Mr. Holwell, going to the guard, discovered they were searching for a safe prison in which the accursed infidels could be shut for the night. At this crisis, Leech, the clerk, returned, and offered to help Holwell, who had done him service, to escape by away he had discovered. Mr. Holwell, a true man, urged Leech to fly, and refused to desert his friends.

Leech then sat down with them, and said that he should live and die with Mr. Holwell. Soon after this heroic resolution, the guard appeared with torches, and ordered the prisoners into the barracks, into which they went cheerfully, hoping for a quiet sleep. But once within, the Moors presented their guns, and forced them into the Black Hole. Only the soldiers knew the nature of the place, or they would at once have gone frantic with despair, and, rushing on the guards, have been cut to death by their scimitars. The hundred and forty-six men entered this abode of death, and with them one unhappy woman, the wife of a naval officer named Carey, who had refused to leave her husband and fly to the boats. In this herd of prisoners, driven forward by clubs and swords, there were English, Dutch, Moors, and Portuguese, all worn out by watching and fighting, and some mortally wounded. Mr. Holwell, one of the first to enter, thoughtful as usual, took possession of the window nearest the door, and placed beside him Mr. Coles and Mr. Scott, two wounded ensigns. Mr. Baillie, of the council, and several gentlemen of the factory, were behind him, eager for air. The rest rushed wildly into the further part of the room.

It was now about eight o'clock, and the evening unusually close and sultry. No breeze came through the windows, and the air within neither circulated nor was changed. As soon as the door was barred, the horror began. Death was moving among them, and Thurst his executioner. The weaker in mind and body and the wounded gave way to paroxysms of despair, rage, and terror.

They rushed at the door like madmen, and tried to tear it down; but it opened inwards, and after working till their hands bled, they lost all hope of loosening its hold. Mr. Holwell at the window, suffering less than the others, and upheld by a sense of duty, exhorted his fellow-sufferers to greater fortitude and composure, and to keep their minds and bodies as quiet as possible, if they hoped to survive till the morning, when they would be certainly released.

MIZPAH.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

"A BASKET OF FERNS ON HER KNEE."

EVENING in the island of Jersey, and the sun already set. A wash of pure carmine in the western sky; a film of whitish haze in the grassy bottom of a long valley scooped out between steep wooded hills. Rising out of the haze, a sort of natural embankment like a bridge, dividing the valley in two, and separating Maître le Gaye's half from Maître somebody else's. Barely indicated in sepian shadows, a rough, strong path, dug out of the hills, bowered in trees, and leading down to the embankment. This embankment in shadow too, beneath the fringe on either side of lofty elms, green, leafy, beautiful in summer glory, and tipped with cadmium gold on every topmost twig. Hanging somewhat perilously over one edge of the bank, a fallen trunk; and resting upon it, a woman, young, beamed-eyed and beautiful; her feet buried in a tuft of Guernsey daisies, gleaming like white stars in the foreground; the tall stem of a fox-glove, heavy with pendant bells of dusky shaded pink, pricking in her loose waving hair; a basket of ferns on her knee; her white, round hands clasped over the fragrant burden, and partly hidden in dainty emerald fronds; her eyes half hidden too beneath the cream-white lids, and long curved lashes, which rest on a cheek as rosy and purely soft as an infant's. In the background, a string of mild-eyed cows, patched with brown and white, and driven by a girl in white Brittany cap and short skirt, down among the ferns and blackberry-bushes of the hill-side path. A bird chirruping in the elm-tree. Now and then the bark of a dog from some distant farm. Over both, the voice of the cattle-girl singing in the summer twilight—“Que veut dire cet amour?

Dit Jeanot à Jeanneton.”

So scraps of the refrain float up on the soft summer air, while Mizpah le Feuille sits waiting on the old tree-trunk. Below, the brook babbles over the stones, and frogs gurgle among the long grass and water-rushes. A grey wood-beetle comes out on the log, and trots leisurely along, making a great piece of work over every little hillock of crusty yellow lichen, or red-tipped moss. Two dissipated linnets flutter twittering among the branches overhead, instead of going home to roost. Then a small brown lizard puts out his head from a hole in the bank, and begins to leisurely ascend the log. It has a slow, sanctified air, this lizard, as if it were thinking of nothing more sublunary than a prayer meeting; but happening to meet the gadding wood-beetle, it stops short, and devours him in a solemn self-abnegatory way, much like some human Pharisee.

Mizpah sits still and waits.

By-and-by there is a sound of footsteps tramping over the stones down the hill-path. Out of the shadows comes the figure of a man: a man before whom Mizpah rises, letting basket and ferns fall unheeded to her feet: a man who catches her hands in his, and holds her with a passionate force—a smothered, quivering cry, as of one who has waited long for this meeting, and hungered for it mightily.

It is some seconds before he hears what Mizpah is saying, some seconds before any words are intelligible between the girl's heavy, panting breathing, that sounds like sobs.

“Let me go, let me go,” she says twice; and at last he understands, though more from the hands striving almost desperately to free herself than from the parted, “perfect lips,” from which all colour has fled. Loosing her a little, he puts one hand under the little chin, turning it towards him, and says half-reproachfully—a very loving reproach—

“Let you go! Why, my darling, I have only just got you! Is that your greeting, Mizpah, after three years' waiting for this one moment?” He is going to kiss her as he speaks. His brave blue eyes, and handsome face, bearded and browned under suns more burning than these, are very near her own; and she is only as a little bird in his hold. In the desperation of the moment she thrusts his hand away with all the strength of both hers, and gasps out—

“Gerald! don't—for Heaven's sake don't!—I am married.”

Then he lets her go—drops her as though shot to the heart by some unseen bullet; and all the glad blood dies out of his face, leaving it ghastly in the twilight— even more ghastly than that white daisy face which a moment before was hidden against his heart.

There is no word spoken for a moment. Only the brook babbles among the rushes, and far away the cattle-girl's song rings above the shadows—

“Foi, mi mie, c'est toi que j'aime,
Dit Jeanot à Jeanneton.”

With a sound like a long gasping sob, with the voice hollow and broken of a dying man, he asks at last—

“Mizpah, what are you saying?”

“The truth,” she answers, forcing her voice to steadiness, forcing back the tears burning in her eyes, the agony striving for utterance in her heart. “I am married—married—do you hear, Gerald?—six months ago. I dared not write it to you; but it is true.”

Her voice sounds harsh, almost cruel. Looking at her, the pain brings a tinge of dull red to his face.

“Married!” he says slowly. “It—it cannot be true. And your promise to me?”

“Broken,” she answers almost fiercely, but her limbs are shaking like an aspen-leaf. “Gerald, I have told you. For Heaven's sake, go away now and forget me. I am not worth remembering—not worth grieving for, or sighing over.”

He does not believe it. Looking into that fair young face, and blue innocent eyes, it would be difficult. Almost piteously he tells her so, begging some excuse, some explanation. She has never bid him meet her here to tell him, after three years' waiting, that she is utterly false and worthless—nothing more!

“What is the good of more?” she asks, her voice dead now with a sort of weary despair. “To have been false is enough. Would excuses make it better? I would not have met you at all if I had been braver—more unselfish. I ought to have written; and I tried, but—I could not.”

“I do not wonder at it,” he breaks in harshly. “You were not cold-blooded enough for that, it seems.”

“It would have been better,” she answers, flinching under his tone; “it would have spared you pain; and since I could not receive you in my husband’s house, I doubt if I should have met you here.”

“And why?”

“He might be angry.”

“Angry! Who has the better right to be angry, he or I? Mizpah, do you love this man, or are you afraid of him? By Heaven I believe you are, and that you were forced into this treachery!”

He would have caught her hands, but she draws back, whiter than ever.

“No one forced me, and I am not afraid of him. He is most kind and loveable—Oh, Gerald!” (as he interrupts by an oath wrung from him in sheer desperation) “for Heaven’s sake—for pity’s sake go! What talking can undo the wrong that has been done you? I only ask you to forget me, nothing more; not even forgiveness unless—unless, when you are happy with some one more worthy of you, you may care—”

“Never!” he breaks in, crushing her faltering voice with the blaze of scorn in his honest eyes, “not if I were dying would I forgive you: you who have deceived me for so long, and brought me back across the wide Atlantic to find you married to another—false to me. Forgive you! No, but I forgive your husband.”

The crimson has faded out of the sky. The gold is dead upon the tree-tops. Long grey shadow float up from the valley. A faint, whitish mist is building an impalpable wall between those two, once so near, now so wide apart. Even the birds are gone to roost, and the gay refrain of “Jeanot and Jeanneton” has ceased to echo among the hills.

Then Gerald Dacres goes too. Without another word, without a last glance at the girl who has wronged him, he turns from her, and strides away among the trees. Only one little star peeping through the dusky blue above sees Mizpah’s agony of weeping as, with face hidden in her hands she returns to her husband’s house—alone.

END OF CHAPTER THE FIRST.

A CURIOUS COFFEE-HOUSE.

all the queer ways by which men have immortalised their names, there are not many queerer than that by which a certain Mr. Lloyd appears to have done it, and to have done it most effectually.

Little or nothing is known of this worthy, except that some time during the last century he kept a coffeehouse in or near Abchurch Lane; and as he had the good fortune to be largely patronised by ship-owners and captains, “Lloyd’s Coffee-house,” or the abbreviated “Lloyd’s,” came in course of time to be the recognised rendezvous for all who were in any way interested in shipping matters. Mr. Lloyd died nobody knows exactly when, and his coffee-house has long since disappeared; but his name still shines out in letters of brass at the eastern end of the Royal Exchange, and is familiarly known in the uttermost ends of the earth. The association which originated beneath his roof has developed into an organisation having its agents and representatives in every seaport of any pretensions throughout the world, and has acquired such importance that the advantages to be derived from an official connection with it are found to be a sufficient inducement to undertake its agency, without any other remuneration whatever. So curiously has the name of the lucky coffee-house keeper come to be identified with shipping interests, that it has in many instances been adopted by various Continental associations; while it is said that there are still people who believe that he is the great potentate in shipping matters, and who occasionally write to “M. Lloyd, Londres.”

There are at the present time two distinct associations known as Lloyd’s, both of them having their head-quarters in London, and within a few yards of each other.

The one with which the general public are, perhaps, most familiar, is that to which reference is made when a vessel is said to be At Lloyd’s. This association, named Lloyd’s Register of Shipping, and the offices of which are in White Lion Court, Cornhill, was founded in 1834, simply and solely “for the purpose of obtaining a faithful and accurate classification of the mercantile shipping of the United Kingdom, and of the foreign vessels trading thereto.” The original constitution of it has remained without material alteration till the present time. There is a committee for the general management of affairs; there is a sub-committee, appointed by them, for the actual work of classifying ships; and there is a large staff of surveyors, whose duty it is to inspect vessels, and to furnish the committee with such reports as will enable them to assign each a character.

The details of this classification would probably have but little interest for the general reader. It will be sufficient to state that the letters A, Æ, E, etc., which are appended to the names of ships, indicate the soundness and seaworthiness of the ships themselves, while the figures which follow the letters indicate the completeness and sufficiency of their equipment—their rigging, boats, anchors, etc. Thus a vessel which is classed A 1 on Lloyd's Register is not only a good sound craft, but is thoroughly well equipped. She stands in this class for a term of years depending on the materials of which she is built, and the quality of the workmanship bestowed on her; and from it she falls, in the usual course of things, into class "A red," for a period of half or two-thirds of the time she stood in the highest rank. From this she goes into Æ; thence into E, and finally into Class I. When she is too old and cranky to be retained in this grade, Lloyd's will have nothing further to do with her; she is an "unclassified" ship, and good for nothing but to be broken up. These registers are printed annually, and a copy sent to every person who shall have become a member of the society by paying in an annual subscription of three guineas.

The original idea, in the institution of this system of classification, was to supply those who insured vessels with reliable information respecting their seaworthiness. It soon appeared, however, that to be classed high at Lloyd's added materially to the value of a ship; and not only were owners found glad to avail themselves of these testimonials to character for vessels already built, but they soon began to seek the supervision of their surveyors during the progress of building. A ship whose soundness has been thus guaranteed has a cross attached to its name on the register, and will fetch more money, and can likewise be insured at a lower rate, than a similar vessel without this distinction.

The society was set on foot not with the view of making profit; indeed, there is no proprietary body to appropriate it. But it was established merely for the sake of the information which it would be the means of affording; and fees for surveying, and members' subscriptions, were fixed at rates which it was expected would but safely cover all expenses.

The importance of the work undertaken, however, proved to be far greater than had been anticipated. Some idea of the magnitude of the business accomplished by the association may be gained from the fact that in 1872 they had upon the books upwards of ten thousand vessels. The fee for a survey originally was ten guineas, but this was found to be far higher than necessary, and after a liberal increase in the salaries of their officers, this charge was reduced to five guineas. Subsequently, rates were still further modified.

The other "Lloyd's" may be found on the first floor of the Royal Exchange. Going in by the eastern entrance of this building, the visitor will at once see the illustrious name shining down upon him over a doorway on the right. All day long busy throngs are hurrying in and out; and a stranger is quite at liberty to pass in with the multitude, and mount the broad stone staircase that leads up into the central hall of the institution, which is shut in from the outer world only by a low wooden barrier with swinging doors.

Near the head of the stairs are a couple of fine statues; and a tablet in the wall records the bold and disinterested action of the Times newspaper in exposing a gigantic conspiracy of rogues in the year 1841. The most conspicuous object, however, is a very imposing-looking individual in a gorgeous scarlet robe, who guards the entrance, and with the lungs of a Stentor shouts out, above the din and confusion within, the name of any one of the throng who may happen to be wanted.

Only the initiated may pass this barrier; but one may stand without, and see pretty nearly all that is to be seen of this, the oldest of the two institutions known the wide world over as "Lloyd's"—an institution which has been described as "a spider stationed in the middle of a web covering the seas, and of which the shipwrecked vessels are the dead flies."

Standing without the barrier, one may see into a handsome saloon, with a richly decorated ceiling, supported on a double row of pillars, and with walls adorned by the arms of the association—a golden anchor on a blue ground. The room contains two enormous ledgers, a self-registering barometer, and an anemometer, which marks with a pencil, upon a sheet of paper, the force and direction of the wind at all hours of the day and night. There are still unmistakeable traces of the coffee-house period in the history of this institution. The floor, for instance, is occupied by four rows of tables, shut in from each other by little mahogany partitions, in the usual coffee-house fashion; while, until a few years ago, the attendants in the room still answered to the name of "waiter."

It is a scene of great bustle and confusion, the room being usually filled with a throng of people who buzz about apparently with the smallest possible reference to anything like business. It has been said, indeed, that those who come here appear to catch something of the turmoil and restlessness of the element with which their speculations have to do. Whatever this fancy may be worth, it certainly is not the place in which one might expect to find men engaged in transactions that more than almost any others would seem to demand careful and deliberate consideration. Yet it is in this room that by far the greater part of British shipping insurances are effected, and the men sitting at these little enclosed tables are amongst the comparatively small number of those who, so far as property is concerned, have any reason to lie awake at nights and quake when winds are rough and seas stormy. On the whole, however, they do not look like men much given to quaking, and although many of them are individually responsible for valuables at sea which, in amount, would probably far eclipse the treasures, the loss of which placed Antonio at the mercy of Shylock, the roughest of equinoctial gales does not seriously disturb the outward composure of the hard-headed "under-writers" of Lloyd's.

The insurance of a ship, unlike that of a house or a life, is usually undertaken by a considerable number of men or firms individually. There are companies engaged in this line of business, but by far the greater part of it is effected with individual assurers or "under-writers," as they are termed. There appears to be no reason for this beyond the force of custom, which originated at a time when companies for this purpose were by law limited to two, the Royal Assurance and the London Assurance. The monopoly was abolished in 1824, but the practice which had sprung up in consequence of it survived; and at the present time, the greater part of marine insurances in London are effected with the men who are to be found seated at the tables in this large room at Lloyd's.

A transaction in shipping assurance is usually carried on through a broker, by whom the premium to be offered is arranged with the owner or freighter of the vessel. This being determined on, he sets forth on a slip of paper the particulars of the risk—the name, class, and tonnage of the ship; the port she sails from, and that to which she is going; the probable length of the voyage, the sum to be assured, the premium offered, etc. The slip is then sent into this large room at Lloyd's, and submitted to various "under-writers." Probably no one of them will assume the whole risk. To do so with any approach to safety, it would be necessary to engage in business on a most gigantic scale. It is sometimes done. The late Richard Thornton, it is said, would often have large numbers of vessels at sea at his sole risk; but then he was not only a very wealthy man, but a notoriously daring speculator. It is said he has been known by a single scrawl of his name to insure a vessel for two hundred thousand pounds. That, however, was a venture which very few men would care to make, even if they had his wealth. Usually the responsibility of every ship insured is divided among a considerable number of men. If the premium the broker offers is considered sufficient, one will append his initials to the sum of one hundred pounds on his slip of paper, another fifty pounds, and another perhaps five hundred pounds, and so on, until the sum required is made up. The broker now draws up a formal policy of insurance, under which those who have engaged to do so write their names. Hence the assurers are called "under-writers."

Thus, although, as a single day's business, these rather stolid-looking Britons will often take upon their broad shoulders the responsibility for many thousand pounds' worth of property tossing about on the sea in all parts of the world, the risks they incur are spread over so large a number of ships, that even after the stormiest of weather they are able to go and turn over the leaves of the great ledger in which casualties are recorded, at least with outward composure, whatever shocks the bald abrupt announcements of the fatal book may secretly afford.

The second great ledger in the room records the safe arrival of ships; and the contents of the two, together with all other intelligence respecting shipping matters, are published daily in a little sheet entitled Lloyd's List.

Under-writing, and the collection and dissemination of shipping news, may be considered to constitute the whole business of the establishment, though there are subsidiary matters to which the managing committee devote some attention. Under certain circumstances, for instance, they afford charitable relief to those whom disasters at sea have placed in need of it.

In rooms attached to the large saloon are maps and charts, and publications of every kind containing anything of interest to the members of the society; and there is also a large reading-room devoted to the use of captains and merchants, in which engagements are usually entered into, and ships sold by auction.

Taking the two societies, "Lloyd's" and "Lloyd's Register," as they are popularly supposed to be, as one great concern interested in all that pertains to maritime affairs, they constitute an agency such as the world has never before seen, and without which British commerce never could have attained its present proportions. At home there is no vessel of importance that escapes their vigilance, and abroad there is no spot to which the telegraph extends with which they are not in frequent communication. There is no port which ships are accustomed to visit where they have not a pair of experienced eyes on the watch, and a representative ready to transmit intelligence, and to act on their instructions; and there are comparatively few British ships wrecked in any part of the world, where the members of this association do not step in between the owners and ruinous loss.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

AN OLD TALE OF TERROR.

IN TWO CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

THE last words produced a short silence broken only by the groans of the dying. In the meantime, Mr. Holwell seeing an old jemetdar outside, who seemed to pity them, he called and offered him a thousand rupees (two hundred and fifty pounds) if he would get the prisoners divided and put into separate rooms. The man went and tried to procure an order, but returned with a sorrowful face, and said it was impossible. Mr.

Holwell, thinking he wanted a higher bribe, offered him a larger sum. He returned again sadder than before. "There's a soul of goodness in things evil," he said, like a true slave and fatalist, as he saw the people at the window screaming for water. "Unhappy, people! Submit to necessity. The Soubahdar is asleep, and what slave of us dare disturb his repose?"

What a terrible picture of despotism, and the wickedness and folly of yielding to the rule of one man!

At the end of ten minutes, all the one hundred and forty-six men had broken out into the most copious perspiration, and this perspiration was followed by an intolerable and maddening thirst, so extreme, that the man next Mr. Holwell was supporting life by squeezing out and drinking the moisture from his coat-sleeves.

The floor of the place in which they were confined, being eighteen feet by eighteen, contained three hundred and twenty-four square feet, and this, divided by one hundred and forty-six, the number of persons, gives a little more than a space of twenty-six inches and a half by twelve for each person, which, reduced to a square, will be about eighteen inches by eighteen. This space, though just sufficient to prevent them from pressing on each other, yet obliged them to stand so closely together as greatly to increase their heat. To give them more room, some one proposed that they should all take off their clothes. This was directly done by them all, except Mr. Holwell, and three others who were with him at the window. This gave them temporary relief, and, in hopes of circulating the air, and introducing fresh air from without, every one commenced to fan with his hat. This soon tired them, and their uneasiness increasing, Mr. Baillie proposed that every man should sit down on the floor; and to prevent confusion, they were to seat themselves and rise again at a given signal. After they had sat till they could no longer do so, the word was given to rise.

But from the manner in which they were wedged together, they could not without great efforts rise to their feet; and as they could not all do so at the same moment, the strong rose first, and the weak, from the great pressure, were now unable to rise at all, and were unavoidably crushed to death. This expedient was tried several times, and each time their number was diminished by those who were trampled to death. This was the state of affairs before they had been confined an hour. By nine o'clock their thirst had become intense. Many of them in the back part of the room suffered agonies from the difficulty of respiration; and numbers, becoming delirious, raved and groaned, and the place was filled with incoherent ravings, and cries for "Water! water!" The jemetdar who has previously been mentioned, pitying them, immediately ordered skins of water to be brought. Mr. Holwell tried in vain to prevent this, foreseeing the dreadful scene that would ensue, and fearing also that from his position in the window he himself and those with him would be crushed to death. The water came, and the sight of it made their thirst ten times worse and their ravings more violent than before. Mr. Holwell, who until then had not suffered much from thirst, now felt it excessively. The only way of getting the water was in their hats, which Mr. Holwell and his two companions, Scott and Coles, continually passed and repassed between the bars of the window; but the struggling was so violent, that before the hat touched the lips of any one, there would scarcely be a small tea-cupful left. The little water those near the window could get only increased their sufferings, and those at the back who could get none became furious, pressing upon the window, so that many were crushed to death. The two wounded gentlemen, Scott and Coles, who, notwithstanding their condition, had worked so hard in passing the water, were pressed to death; and Mr. Holwell's friends—Messrs. Baillie, Jenks, Reveley, Law, Buchanan, Simson, etc.—lay dead at his feet.

The dreadful sufferings and insane efforts of the poor prisoners served only to amuse the inhuman guards, who kept them supplied from time to time with water, that they might see the sufferings the sight of it caused the prisoners. They had for a long time preserved their respect and regard for Mr. Holwell, as their chief and friend; but now they pressed on him so as to nearly kill him, and some even climbed upon him to seize the bars of the window. As the last sign of their regard, he therefore entreated them to remove the pressure, that he might retire out of the window into the room, and die in quiet. He and another and stronger man were able with difficulty to force their way into the back part of the room, now comparatively empty from the people crushing to the window, and the many dead ; but the air was so putrid, and the volatile effluvia so great, that his respiration became immediately difficult and painful. Under the east wall, opposite the windows, there was a platform, a continuation of that in the barracks, from which it was divided by the north wall of the dungeon. It extended the whole length of the east side, was raised three feet and a half from the ground, and was three feet wide. To this platform, over the dead with which the floor was now nearly covered, Mr. Holwell walked, and resolving to give up all efforts and die, he laid himself down against the dead bodies. But in about ten minutes extreme palpitation urged him again, by superhuman efforts, to force his way to the third rank from the window for air, when he cried, "Water, for God's sake!" Some, who had thought him dead, cried out, "Give him water! give him water!" and they heroically would not touch any themselves till he had drunk. Finding water only increase his thirst, Holwell refused any more, and in preference sucked the perspiration from his sleeves. He shared this means of support reluctantly with a young man named Lushington, whose life it saved.

Before twelve o'clock the survivors were delirious. They refused water, but screamed incessantly for "Air! air!" They tried by insults and mockery to induce the Hindoo and Moorish guard to fire in upon them, or to open the door and chop them to pieces. Many, now utterly exhausted, lay down and expired quietly on the dead; but some who were strongest tried to supplant Mr. Holwell and others at the window. One man, a Dutch sergeant, having hold of a bar, supported himself almost entirely on Mr. Holwell's head, who also had a man on each shoulder. Of course he made many efforts to dislodge them, and sometimes succeeded. Having borne this till two in the morning, his spirits gave way, and he took a clasp-knife from his pocket, intending to open his arteries and end life. But reason gained the mastery, and he gave up this intention. He and Carey made their way to the back, and lay down together to die, which Carey did in a few minutes; but Mr. Holwell, thinking that if he died there he would be trampled on, as he had trampled on others, managed to reach the platform, and after unfastening a sash which he fancied caused a pain about the waist, he became immediately insensible.

As day began to dawn, the twenty-three survivors wanting Holwell to intercede with the guard, they found him under a heap of dead bodies, and brought him to the window, for the smell of the dead was so intolerable that no one at first would surrender a place near the grating. A brave man was found, however, at last, a Mr. Mills, afterwards captain of the company's yacht, who surrendered his place at the risk of his own life.

At this time, about six, the Viceroy sent to release Mr. Holwell and the rest. It was twenty minutes before the survivors could muster strength to remove the dead bodies and draw open the door. Mrs. Carey was still alive, but that generous man Leech was dead. The soldiers, dragging out the dead bodies, threw them into the ditch of an unfinished ravelin. Mrs. Carey, being young and beautiful, was made a slave. All the rest were set free; but the brave Holwell and three others, though suffering from putrid fever, were sent to Macadarad, where the Viceroy's grandmother begged for their release. Some of the courtiers urged that Holwell could still afford to pay a ransom; but the Viceroy, with at least some little of the leonine nature, replied generously—

"It may be so: if he has anything left, let him keep it. His sufferings have been great; he shall have his liberty."

They were then released, and at the Dutch settlement of Corcomabad took ship for England.

*The next year (1757) the retribution for these cruelties fell on the Sourajah. That great military genius, Clive, with only three thousand men (two thousand of them Sepoys), smote the tyrant at Plassy, where the Sourajah's sixty-eight thousand men fled like sheep before our avenging bayonets.

In an old paper of August, 1817, we found the other day the following interesting obituary:—

"At Camden Town, aged thirty-eight, John M. Esquire, who is said to have been the only survivor of the persons who were immured in the Black Hole at Calcutta, and who humbly relinquished his station next the window, in that fatal dungeon, to Mr. Holwell, though with the probable danger of a premature death."

Brave man! his memory shall never perish. The monumentum aere perennius is his, and shall be his for ever.

A LEAF FROM A LIFE.

I AM growing old—age has crept on so rapidly during the last few years—and I am poor, miserably poor. I am cold and hungry. Yet people say there is plenty for every one in this great city. True, there is, and the English, more than any nation, are a charitable people—charity in some form meets you at every turn in this great hive—but there seems to be no charity for the poor, worn-out, penniless governess. Fine I have gone without for days, and now I am trying to see how long this tired body can endure without food. Strange that during the last few days I have lived over again my girlhood's life ! I am again in the old Somerset rectory, once more I hear through the open church windows the flow of the Avon, I hear the hum of the bee, and smell the sweet-scented hay ; and amidst all this dreamy delicious Sabbath silence, my father's voice is preaching the law of charity to his simple listeners. " Faith, hope, and charity ; but the greatest of all these is charity ; " so far I have listened, and I am off again, eyes and thoughts following the gaily-winged butterfly which has just come in at the open window—it is an emperor butterfly ; it flutters about a short time, and I lose sight of it ; and then comes the gentle plashing of water ; I know that a boat is going down the stream by the soft dripping of the oars. " And now to God the Father," wakes me up from the dreamy following of the light bark.

It is Sunday no longer, but an autumn day—an autumn day in the midst of the Indian summer—a day steeped in the golden glory of a ripening year—a day apparelled in Nature's richest clothing. We are slowly dropping down the stream, where the gold and brown of the leaves mirror themselves in the clear water. From amidst the tall reeds we startle the moor-hen, and the water-rat's bead-eyes peer at us from his hole in the bank. A kingfisher flashes his lovely plumage for a moment before our eyes. I dip my hand in the silvery Avon and sprinkle a few drops into my brother's face. My father enjoys our childish glee, and my brother's merry laugh wakes the echo in the bend by the copse where we land.

Alas ! where are they ? The slanting rays of the evening sun shine on the chancel wall, where a few words record the " old rector's " birth and death ; and the Black Sea rolls its billows above my brother's sunny curls, where he lies with hundreds of England's dead who, full of hope and life, buckled on their swords when the Scandinavian war-cry rang through Western Europe.

We penetrate into the very heart of the dense copse, and somehow or other silence keeps our tongues. The ripened nuts fall softly upon the dried leaves, and the nimble little squirrel overhead is eyeing us askance. Suddenly my brother leaps to his feet to gather some flowers growing near. I am by his side ; he has extended his hand, but it is rapidly withdrawn—a viper's head had darted up from among the moss.

We pause, and then the momentary fear is gone, and we laugh and fill our bags with the nuts until the shadows deepen, and we go once more home—home from one of life's little, yet one of its sweetest pleasures. Oh, they are the sweetest memories we cherish—the memories of little things that have come across our pathway, and brought with them a fadeless pleasure ; in the heat and burden of the day, in the dull routine of duties hard to perform, and often unappreciated, they live.

The remembrance of the days when we lingered by the river's brink, or filled our hands with Nature's gifts fresh gathered from the copse that threw its carpet of primroses to the water's edge, is a picture, and a pleasure—the picture never grows dim, the pleasure never cloys.

Hunger tortures me, and the water I drink is icy cold ; but I am in sunny France—sunny Southern France, and our convent grounds slope to the swift Rhone. We, a knot of happy girls, are talking of our future. I do not look so far as they ; my eye is following the laden grape-carts as they wind slowly down the opposite hill, and some grape-gatherers are singing in their soft patois, so musical and sweet when draped in poetry. I hum to myself Lamartine's " L'Automne "—

" Salut, bois couronnés d'un reste de verdure !
Feuillages jaunissants sur les gazon épars ;
Salut, derniers beaux jours ! le deuil de la nature Convient à la douleur et plaît à mes regards."

" Aufstehen würde Englands ganze Jugend Sahe der Bitte seine Königin."

Schiller's " Maria Stuart " rings in my ears, mixed with the murmur of the Rhine, and I stay my pen to listen to its waters as they leap over Schaffhausen's Falls ; the murmur grows louder, the waters are dashing along like a mighty flood ; they deafen me—they are coming nearer and nearer !—But " Wie die Arbeit, so der Lohn " repeats itself again and again : " As the labour, so the reward." I have laboured, and my reward is hunger, cold, a pauper's grave. I will try a little longer. " Appeal to your relatives," I am told each time I ask for help. I did appeal. One sent me five shillings, another sent me two, and told me to make use of my education—that would find me bread. I dropped the seven shillings into the poor-box last Sunday when I dragged myself to church. I could not buy bread with anything so grudgingly given.

The four walls of my desolate room close around me, the roar of the cataract of the Rhine comes nearer, but a voice from its din of waters says, " The greatest of these is charity." Have I lived in vain ? Shall I die in vain ?

Do not laugh again, my brother. Listen, listen, just a moment ; can you not hear the nuts dropping ? Is not that the rustling of leaves where a rabbit has trodden ? That is the Avon's ripple, and the plash of oars."

* * * * *

On Thursday her landlord opened the bare room, whence all the furniture had been taken bit by bit for food. There was no fuel, no food in the room ; only a skeleton that a few days before had laid down her pen, nevermore to take it up again—laid it down in that moment when her childhood's home had risen before her, just as the waters of Life rolled into Eternity's deep sea !

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-THIRD.

SEEKING.

IT was midnight when he reached Drumliemount. The Laird was waiting for him. Each read in the hiding in some cottage in the neighbourhood, and laughing at us all this time" (the Laird did not believe that—he, too, began to have fears—but he thought there was no harm in saying it).

"HE BEGAN IN A TREMBLING VOICE."

other's face the answer to the question which remained unspoken on their lips—no success.

"I doubt we'll have to let it be known," said the Laird, with some irritation, in spite of his habitually philosophic (or selfish?) temperament; it was hard just at that moment to have an addition to the family troubles; and he could have delivered an excellent oration just then upon the value of submission to the experience of parents, but he refrained. "One advantage of making it known is that we shall be able to get information from all quarters, and also to make a thorough search of the district."

"It does not matter now who knows it."

"From what Ailie says, it is possible that she is

"Or she may be drowned," added Walter, in a low dreary voice.

"Hoot toot! no fear of that; we'll find her in the morning. You are tired; take a rest, and you will have more spirit for the work. By the way, have you arranged about the church to-morrow?"

Walter took up a letter which was on the table. After reading it—

"No; Hutcheson cannot come until the afternoon, and there is no time to seek any one else. I must officiate myself."

"That's awkward; but the more need for you to rest. Come, Wattie" (pressing his arm with a half-shy tenderness), "let me guide you in this Take your rest, and whilst you are doing work to-morrow, I shall be busy looking for her."

"You are very kind, father, and you punish me most in that way for the vexations I have caused you."

"Good night," said the Laird hastily; "do as I have advised you."

He went away, feeling anxious to help his son, and feeling very much pleased with himself. He did not remember the fib he had perpetrated to Teenie; and even if he had, he could not have understood what an important part it had played in suggesting the mad course she had adopted.

Walter was utterly distracted by the combination of anxieties which surrounded him. The most solemn duties he had to perform in the morning were so utterly at variance with the disturbed and irritated state of his mind. He felt as if it would be an unpardonable crime for him to dispense the Sacrament, whilst his heart was torn by such worldly distresses as those which now afflicted him.

He had a very high ideal of the life he ought to lead, of the work he ought to do, and at present everything seemed to oppose the aims which this ideal directed. He was conscious of two personalities—the common one, which submitted to the buffets of the world, and winced under them; the ideal, which indicated how he should endure and rise above all the ills of life. But everything came back to the thought of Teenie.

She had done wrong. Well, his duty was to pity, to forgive, and to win her back by love. But she could not love him, or she would not have acted as she had done. She had shown herself indifferent to his severe trials—perhaps they were even the cause of her flight; but he shrank from the meanness of that thought.

She had shown herself indifferent to the scandal which her conduct would create, and to the shame of it which must fall upon him. She had shown an almost unnatural carelessness about her child. Could he pardon this woman?

The struggle was a fierce one, the hot passion of the man waging a great war with the high ideal of life and duty, by the light of which he had been striving to guide his steps. The passion was strong; the ideal light was pale. Passion led up its mighty battalions of wounded vanity; the sense of the ridicule to which he would be exposed; pride; rage at her trifling with the sacred ties of home—all combining in a grand charge of indignation at the doubt and slight of his love implied by her act.

No, he could not pardon her!

But the ideal and better self appeared, like a shadow in the mist, and reminded him of the sweet thoughts she had inspired, of the happiness of which she had been the source, of the tenderness she had shown him; of the soft touch of her hand, the dear yearning light of her eyes; and his own eyes became dim, his heart swelled and throbbed.

The battle was over. He rose up strong and brave, answering the problem he had to solve.

"Yes, thank God, I can pity—I can forgive her. I will believe that she has reasons for this conduct unknown to me. I will trust her, no matter how bad she may seem to be. . . . My poor wife, I will seek you and try to help you, not because it is my duty, but because I love you."

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FOURTH.

THE DAY OF REST.

A PALE blue cloudless sky, the sea bright green, restless as usual, but not noisy or fierce; a little cold, although flashing under brilliant sunlight; yet wearing a mild and winning look to those who were perspiring in the heat of the day.

A soft warm wind, which only at long intervals rustled the leaves of the trees; the warm drowsy hum of bees; the atmosphere quite clear, and presenting sharp outlines of distant objects. The roads like yellow ribbons fluttering in the wind, wavering downward and upward from far-away points, and concentrating at the foot of the hill on which stood the kirk. The hills, purple, brown, and black in the distance, striped with streams that glistened and moved like quicksilver in the sunlight.

A slumberous sense of peace and rest pervading all, as if Nature shared man's reverence for the Sabbath.

The people, in twos, and threes, and fours, traversed the roads leading to the kirk with leisurely and contented steps, chatting quietly over the affairs of the household and the State, including the recent storm, and the damage it had done to the fishing gear and the crops. The farmers who lived at a distance drove in gigs at an easy trot; but some who were late came across the moor at a helter-skelter gallop.

At a quarter to eleven the kirk-bell began to ring, and the bells of Kingshaven joined heartily, if somewhat discordantly, in the chime. The Rowanden bell gave out a slow sharp twang, which would have been hideous but for the mellowing influence of the atmosphere—Bing bang, bing bang, bing bang!

That was the signal for the fisher-folk to ascend the hill. Being close at hand, they could afford to wait until the bell began to ring; but at the first stroke they stepped out of their cottages in grave haste, and marched up the hill in a straggling line—those who had suffered and lost by the late storm, dark and sad; those who had not been directly losers by "the visitation of Providence," blithe enough: it is so easy to bear a neighbour's sorrow. Those whose husbands, fathers, or brothers had returned safely and unexpectedly from the distant ports in which they had found shelter, were smiling with sweet content, although conscious that there were widows and orphans near them.

There was neither disrespect nor callousness in this—only the natural law which permits personal joy to predominate over sympathy for another's loss, and so prevents life from falling under an eternal shadow.

Most of the people entered the church at once, and took their places in the pews which had belonged to the same families for generations. But a few of the older folk lingered in the churchyard, inspecting the graves of departed loved ones, or gathered in groups to exchange family and agricultural gossip, until within a couple of minutes of the time when the bell should cease tolling.

The latter saw the minister step out from the gate of his cottage and cross the road, his black gown gently ruffled by the breeze, his hat pulled low over his brow, and his head bowed, as if he were in deep thought.

The kindly recognitions given to him were observed only at intervals, with a nervous start, and a hasty "Good day." For the most part, he passed on, seeing nothing, and entered the church.

The bell stopped, the doors were closed; there was a rustling of dresses, a preliminary coughing, and the people settled down into their places.

The dark-yellow-stained wood of the pews, relieved here and there by a green or crimson cushion, contrasted admirably with the sombre grey stone walls. Mottled beams of sunlight streaming in through the windows shot over the heads of the congregation, and imparted a deal of drowsy light and warmth to what would have been otherwise a cold and gloomy building.

A profound sense of the solemnity of the occasion was felt by the congregation; but that did not prevent several members from observing these facts: first, that the minister was pale and haggard-looking, and that his voice quavered strangely as he read the psalm; second, that the minister's wife was not in her pew at the foot of the pulpit-staircase; and that Dahnahoy's big pew in the loft was occupied only by his two daughters, Miss Burnett and Alice.

"Is the minister's wife no well?" was the question which men and women were asking themselves, as the leaves of their Bibles rustled in turning to the place indicated for the reading. A perfume of peppermint lozenges and "apple-ringy" (Southron wood) pervaded the mottled sunbeams. Outside there was a hum of bees. Occasionally a bee or a butterfly fastened upon one of the windows, and afforded much interest to the boys; in the distance there was a cock crowing with the most reprehensible forgetfulness that it was the Sabbath day.

It was in the prayer that the singularity of Walter's manner struck the people most. He began in a trembling voice that was scarcely audible. He seemed to wander, as if uncertain of what he intended to say; but gradually the voice became louder, the enunciation clear, and the tone so full of tender sympathy that it thrilled the hearts of the listeners. Fervid passion combined with simple earnestness to give power and eloquence to his words. He cried for help to bear the ills of life with resignation; he cried for faith to strengthen those who faltered, to teach them that God was always near, however dark the night—however fierce the storm. He implored mercy for those whose affliction might render them temporarily rebellious, that they might be taught to see in their affliction their own errors, and to trust that whatever suffering He sends, He is ready to relieve. Faith, faith, faith! was his cry—the first condition of happiness, the first principle of true religion. He prayed that they might learn never to doubt His love, however bitter and apparently unmerited might be the misfortunes of this world.

There was a pathetic sincerity in the white face turned upward in the sunlight. It was the man's own sorrow that he was uttering—his own faltering heart that he was helping. But each listener associated the words with his or her affliction in the late storm, and found comfort in them, and strength.

He made a deep and lasting impression upon his congregation; he had never risen to the full height of the duties of his office till sorrow gave him power.

But throughout the day he found himself again and again faltering, thinking about Tecnie; in spite of the exaltation created by the sacred work he had in hand, the mere man's nature continually asserted itself at the most unexpected moments. He was frightened by this weakness, and shuddered at the thought of his own unworthiness to discharge the solemn duties of the day. He was glad when it was over; still more relieved when Mr. Bluteson came up to undertake the afternoon service.

He crossed the road hastily, and entered the house without speaking to any one. Weariedly he threw aside his gown, feeling that he ought never to wear it again. He sat down, trying to think out quietly and methodically what he was to do next, and in which direction he was to seek her. The remembrance of the day filled him with pain; he had gone through the most important service of the Church in a bad and unholy spirit, his mind occupied all the time with worldly anxieties. He could only pray to be pardoned whatever sin he had committed in striving to fulfil his task. He found it very difficult to walk straight.

Meanwhile there were friendly inquiries at the door, all loud in praise of the minister's eloquence (at the moment when he esteemed himself most incapable!) and anxious to learn what was the matter with Mrs. Burnett.

Poor Ailie, bewildered between her distress about Tecnie and her desire to keep her disappearance quiet, betrayed everything ; but in such a confused manner that the inquirers went away, puzzled and in consternation, to spread the most exaggerated rumours of the calamity which had occurred in the minister's household.

The news soon went round : "the minister's wife had run away, nobody knew where to," and that was why he was looking so poorly in the church. Assuredly, had she been within a circle of five miles of Rowanden, Teenie would have been speedily discovered. It was the one subject of conversation uppermost that day, and even prevailed over the events of the storm.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIFTH.

"IT WAS MY FAULT."

GRACE came at last. He knew who it was the moment she touched the door. He sprang up to meet her, but she was beside him before he could make a couple of steps ; the delicate hand was resting on his arm, the sweet sad face turned up to his, the clear earnest eyes eloquent with sympathy and inspiring hope.

"Thank you, Grace," he said, taking her hand quietly ; "it does me good to see you, just as much now as in the old days when you were my protector in every danger. You are very brave and generous—but brave people are always generous. I thought of you first as soon as I discovered what had happened here. I wished much to see you yesterday."

"I was here twice, but you had not returned," she answered in her low, quiet voice ; "you did not learn anything about her?"

"Nothing. I am haunted by the fear that she may have ventured upon the sea. I say to myself it is nonsense—that she had no boat, and that even if there had been one, she would not have used it on such a night. But the fear comes back to me, and tortures me."

"Why did she go away?"

"I cannot even guess her motive. I said very little to her ; she was angry about something, and I left her, expecting that she would sleep and forget. I must have done something or said something that she could neither forget nor forgive."

He walked across the room agitatedly, feeling that movement of some kind was necessary.

Grace stood looking at the window, eyes open, and apparently trying to catch some slippery idea that was eluding her efforts as the bright-winged butterfly eludes a boy, and is farthest from him just when he thinks it is safe under his cap.

"I must have done something," Walter went on, "to pain her terribly. It is always those we love who pain us most." (Aye, Grace knew that.) "And she did give me all her heart. I have been too gloomy for her bright nature—I have been dreaming too much, and have accomplished too little. I chose a profession in which it seemed possible to reconcile quiet thought with the full discharge of duty. Wrong in that—men must act rather than think, to do any practical good in the world. Wrong in that, wrong in everything ; it is a little bitter, is it not, to have to acknowledge that one's whole life is a failure?"

"Walter!"

That little cry of affectionate surprise pulled him up more sharply than a volume of argument would have done.

"Forgive me ; I never could speak of these things to any one but you, and it is an intense relief to be able to let out the gathering of painful thoughts into the ear of one of whose sympathy we feel sure. I have tried very hard, Grace, to do what seemed to be right, and the result appears to be failure in every direction."

"Time is on your side, and a brave heart will overcome everything."

"That is one of the platitudes with which I have been trying to console myself ; but it has much more meaning when you repeat it than when I say it to myself."

Grace caught the butterfly, and she took Walter's arm.

"We'll go out to the garden."

They went out, and arm-in-arm, pacing up and down the path between the gooseberry bushes and the strawberry beds, she spoke—

"I have a suspicion of what put Teenie out of humour, and why she has gone away."

"What?"

"It was my fault."

"Yours?"

"Yes ;" and at this point Grace stopped, feeling awkward and unhappy, because she had to speak of her mother.

"Well, how was it your fault?" he asked, after waiting for her to speak.

She faced the position with a calm, brave voice.

"I told her that my mother had again refused to save Dalmahoy. Teenie has gone away in the hope that her absence would make mother change her mind."

That was a revelation to him ; he saw and understood all—the scene with Dame Wishart, Teenie's passionate, sensitive nature, her anguish in the belief that she had been the cause of the loss of Dalmahoy, and her brave attempt to save it by sacrificing herself. His grief was the more poignant, although he did not know that other element which influenced her action—the belief, or half-belief (for it was only when angry that she really believed), that he had expected to obtain a large portion of the Methven fortune when he married her.

"Heaven sent you to be a comforter of the, sorrowing, Grace," he said warmly ; "you have made me glad, for you have relieved me of a heavy burden of doubt. I thought she went away because she did not care for me ; you have shown me how true her love is—God bless you, Grace."

She needed a blessing as much as she deserved it ; it was because her own love was so pure and great, that she was able to divine Tecnie's motive. The same motive would have instigated her to the same action under similar circumstances, although her calmer judgment would have shown her the foolishness of attempting to set matters right in that way.

Keenly as she felt the bitterness of her own fate at times, she was rarely unjust to Tecnie, and always liked her. As for Walter, even his apparent blindness to the acuteness of her suffering did not make her angry with him. She only wished that she could learn to like him less, and that the touch of his hand, the least tender look or word from him, would not thrill her with such painful joy.

"You will be happier than ever when this is over, and she will be more contented."

"I shall try to believe that ; but the first thing is to find her. I am waiting for a message from my father ; as soon as it arrives, I start again to seek her."

"You will let me know ?"

"I shall go round by Craighburn before coming home, if alone ; if she is with me, I shall send to you."

END OF CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIFTH.

ALONG THE BECK.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS.

THE art of taking an enjoyable walk in the country, it may be said with confidence, was unknown before White of Selborne, and the author of that delightful story, "Eyes and No Eyes," discovered it. In the last century's prose, what Johnson said of the country and its sameness is known to all. If we turn to its poetry, the same artificial mode of viewing the beauties of "Arcadian scenes," and the same ignorance of the commonest facts, is everywhere apparent. Thus Somerville wrote in old age a long poem on "The Chase." He might be expected to know something of so common an animal as the otter, and yet this is his description of it :—

"The subtle spoiler of the beaver kind,
Far off, perhaps, where ancient alders shade
The deep still pool, within some hollow trunk
Contrives his wicker couch, whence he surveys
His long purlieu, lord of the stream, and all
The finny shoals his own."

The otter has nothing to do with the "beaver kind," and does not form "a wicker couch." His nest or lair is simply a pile of dead aquatic weeds and sticks confusedly heaped together.

Let us turn at random to another poet of the last century, Savage, the hapless friend of Johnson, and could morning be more ridiculously described? Poor Savage was familiar with sunrise in Drury Lane, but not with the country :—

"Mild rides the Morn in Orient beauty drest,
An azure mantle and a purple vest,
Which, blown by gales, her gemmy feet display,
Her amber tresses negligently gay.
Collected now her rosy hand they fill,
And, gently wrung, the pearly dew distil.
The songful Zephyrs and the laughing Hours
Breathe sweet, and strow her opening way with flowers."

Similarly the Spectator, when he retired into the country to find new subjects for his pen, never thought of looking at anything but the manners and customs of its inhabitants. He would have betaken himself back to Will's Coffee House at once, had it not been for Will Wimble, Moll White, and the Squire's Chaplain.

Yet how much of pure pleasure and delightful recreation lies in observing the natural history and scenery of the country! Every one whose lot is to abide there ought to interest himself in some branch of natural history, and then the most ordinary walk will furnish him with much to engage his thoughts.

Living on the confines of a marshy district, few strolls are more pleasant to us than down the "beck," which is a north country name for brook, and of itself shows the Scandinavian influences which once prevailed in the district, even if the names of the majority of the villages did not end in "by" (dwelling). Let us ramble down the beck this fine summer evening, and see what it offers for our amusement. But a mere aimless walk is a mistake. What sylvan implement shall we take—a butterfly net, a botanical vasculum, or what?

The wind is westerly, and the hand naturally takes down a fishing rod. With this, and a cast of flies wrapped round our hat, we sally through meadows, much burnt up by the persistent drought, to a plantation by the brook. The wood-pigeons coo at our approach, and scarcely deign to fly off their nests. "It is only an angler," they seem to say, "don't be afraid." A brood of young crows flaps out. They are scarcely fledged enough, or else have not yet learnt the fear of man, to care to fly far, and there they sit balancing on an ash. Milton makes Satan assume the form of a cormorant, but a crow would have been quite as much to the purpose, besides answering better to Patristic tradition. Every one must have noticed how suddenly crows become tame in the country on Sundays, when they seem to know that no one will molest them, and how they behave with a fitting decorum. Yet Hawthorne will not give them the benefit of this relief to their otherwise sable character. "A crow has no real pretensions," he says, "to religion, in spite of his gravity of mien and black attire. Crows are certainly thieves, and probably infidels." Their habits are, however, so black already, as all country-folk know, that they cannot be any further blackened; besides, on this peaceful evening we would not say a word even against them.

Alas! fishing is out of the question at the present time. Looking down the valley, the pools in the beck shine in the sun's slanting rays like pearls strung on the very slenderest of white threads. Water only just percolates from one pool to another. Millers and drainage together, say old anglers, have been the ruin of the fishing in this district.

We fear it is so; yet there is something so poetic about a mill, the miller himself is generally so cheery, and the very atmosphere around it so suggestive of peace and comfort, that it is impossible to quarrel with mills. From Chaucer, who writes—

"At Trompington, not fer fro Cintelbrugge,
Ther goth a brook, and over that a briggge,
Upon the whiche brook ther stont a melle" (mill), to Tennyson, who sings—

"I loved the humming wave that swam Thro' quiet meadows round the mill,
The sleepy pool above the dam,
The pool beneath it never still," mills have always been dear to our poets. And the one which we now reach is specially dear to us. Its lichen-stained roof is pitched at all angles; everywhere are projecting porches, cornices, and dormer windows; nothing about it is regularly built; while a flashing stream pours continually over the hatches by the lazily-moving water-wheel, which makes the most delicious music on the stillest night. It has given us many a dream, and spite of sundry ugly stories about the miller's nets and eel-spears, we would not wish his house away for many a trout.

Skirting the mill we reach a bushy corner, where willows and a few young firs cause a gloom thus early in the evening. Sitting on the gate perfectly still, a rustling within the dry grass comes nearer and nearer, and out of the fence into the ditch crawls a fine hedgehog. How his eyes glitter! He has not the least suspicion that we are so close, and trots briskly up within three yards. All at once he stops—his fine sense of smell has alarmed him; turning up his eyes, he takes in the position at once. After a moment's irresolution, he turns, and keeping one eye fixed on our motions, sidles off sideways in the most absurd manner under the fence. We remain perfectly motionless, and he fondly withdraws himself into the gloom, and thinks no one has seen him. A more perfect piece of acting than thus beating a retreat under the belief that his enemy has not seen him could not be found in English wild life.

Lying on the bank in the sunlight, the faintest click, that no ear but an angler's would notice, is heard two or three times. That means a trout is silently feeding. There is a splash! He has leapt out of the water after a fly, and betrayed his position. Silently crawling, flat on our face, up the bank, so that his quick eye may notice neither substance nor shadow, we find a pool six yards by three, like a polished mirror. It seems vain to throw an artificial fly there, but it is just worth the trial.

As lightly as the natural fly, our "Hoffland's Fancy" drops near the edge beneath us, and its red silk body is too fatal a lure. A rush, and we have the trout fast, and he tears round the pool and lashes it into mud with his tail. In vain! The landing-net is under him, and he is safe in the basket—a fish getting on for three-quarters of a pound in weight—before he well knows what has happened.

A little further, a big water-rat scuttles along at the edge, and finally runs under a projecting shelf, leaving his long tail visible against the red clay bank, but as firmly convinced as ever was ostrich with his head in a bush that no one can possibly see him, as he sees no one. A stone judiciously dropped into the water just below it effectually disabuses him, and he swims out and away, too terrified even to dive. He need not be alarmed. We would not harm him for the world. He does no damage to fish or flesh of any kind; in fact, he is not a rat at all, and lives on the aquatic weeds, and especially the arrow-head, which he finds in the brook.

The miller, it is true, has a standing grievance against him, because he undermines the banks of his dam; and poachers do not find it pleasant, when fancying they are tickling a trout, to discover that they have tried to tickle a water-vole (his correct designation). Owners of osier plantations also grumble at him for destroying the bark of their saplings. But he laughs at persecution, owing to the secure nature of his subterranean retreats. Much of the damage laid to his charge is really caused by the brown rat, which often takes to life by the water-side, and is omnivorous in his appetite. No angler would ever injure the harmless water-vole, which so often amuses him in his rambles.

Passing through a hay-field, it is curious to notice the head of every scabious covered with the red-spotted burnet moth. Each tuft thus becomes a flash of colour to an artistic eye, the burnished black wings with their intensely crimson spots glittering on the lilac-blue flowers of the scabious, like one of Nature's brightest harmonies. Opposite us is another of her arrangements, equally beautiful in its way. A board is set up by the side of a glassy reach, with the inscription, "NO FISHING ALLOWED;" and at the foot of the post, and, oddly enough, nowhere else near it, is a large cluster of the lovely turquoise flowers of the "water myosotis." They are reflected in the water below, and most emphatically repeat to the trespasser the notice above—Forget me not.

Here we come upon three boys of ten or twelve, sauntering to meet us. They have sticks in their hands, and try to look so unconscious of being out of their place that we are at once rendered suspicious. They have come from a village a mile below, and it is absurd to suppose that they are taking a duty-walk, or even admiring the beauties of Nature as we are doing. Clearly they are on mischief bent, either to get partridge-eggs, or (more likely) to harry the trout now the beck is so low.

"Have you seen any fish, lads?" we ask carelessly.

"There is three or four, sir, agin them willers," they reply with a studious air of indifference; but, like our friend the hedgehog, the acting is too good, and we feel bound to give them a warning not to meddle with the fish. Of course there are no fish to be seen near the willows, and the lads have either pelted them into their holes or got one or two in their jacket-pockets. In our mind's eye we see those same boys, before many more years have passed over them, skulking along a hedge-bottom in a grey autumnal morning, with two or three hares which they have snared, and in a week or two more they will be pulling their forelocks to the "beaks" on the bench. So dangerous is it to be born with a sporting taste.

Whirr! up leap a pair of those beautiful birds, the green sandpipers, from one's very feet! A pair or two of them are to be found down here every summer. A field lower down, a heron flies off with heavy flapping wings. There is not a breath of wind, and he can hardly get away, he is so gorged with sticklebacks and eels. Two or three herons are always features in the beck scenery, though there is no heronry in the vicinity. If fortunate, the angler, as he glides along the beck, may hear the snipe drumming over his head, and occasionally one—as it has done with us—will light within two yards, if he remain quite motionless. Fishing is a famous employment, not merely for its own ends, but also that it offers so fine a chance of observing our native birds and beasts. We make friends with them all. Even the fish which inhabit the different pools are, in a manner, acquaintances. We often drop them a line on passing down, and more than one have been caught and, after having a piece snipped out of their tails for future recognition, been replaced to grow larger. Of course they may be taken by other anglers, but they are generally in possession of haunts where they can only be captured by one tolerably familiar with the locality.

Here is the fairest expanse of water we have yet seen, and the fly is sent careering across it. At the second throw it is taken by something weighty, but there is no leap into the air, and swift dart down the stream, which marks the tactics of a trout when hooked. There is still light enough to admit of a corpulent fish being seen, which, like the Father William of "Alice in Wonderland," seems insanely endeavouring to spin round on his head. Winding him in, while still engaged in this fatuous proceeding without making any attempt to dart off, it turns out to be a fat roach, with splendid silvery scales and crimson fins, more than half a pound in weight, and that the first we have ever taken with an artificial fly.

Never was the difference between a sporting fish like the trout, and a clumsy common fish, better exemplified. The former always dies hard, after a severe struggle for liberty; this roach reminded us rather of a plithoric alderman after a City feast, turning round and round in an idiotic manner to escape a pickpocket who was trying to drag his watch out from his fob, instead of hitting him hard between the eyes at once and making a fight for his property.

The mill above has now let off the water, and a turbid stream rushes along like a mimic eagle, bearing on its front sticks and nettles and willow-branches. We must seize the opportunity, for it will bring the trout from their lurking-places, each longing to capture the flies which are swiftly borne down.

But what is that? Under a thicket on the opposite side is a large round lump of black feathers, contracting and expanding on the top of a long green peg, as it seems. We gently stir a bush near, and soon down comes a tail from the ball of feathers, then another green peg, which turns out to be a leg, immediately afterwards emerges a red sealing-wax-like bill from under the wing, and with a curiously puzzled expression, as if still half asleep, a water-hen hops through the thicket and disappears.

The sun is now setting, and the pipistrelle bats come forth in the grateful dusk, to prey on the multitudes of night-flying moths which are also abroad. As the swallows retire, the bats, by a wise provision of Nature, take up their office of keeping down flies. How pleasant is the heavy smell of the elder-flower! and here is a meadow with its clover cut down, and as fragrant as the most deliciously scented tea. There is very little of it, however, this dry season; and in this next field, which should be green with young turnip-plants, spite of its having been twice sown this year not a leaf is visible. No wonder farmers are longing for rain. Wet weather most effectually destroys that pest to turnips, the turnip-fly.

Its activity always begins in the dusk, but the colony which has devastated this field is fled, or has died out, so it is vain to search for one. As we lately heard of two people, who had lived in the country all their lives, endeavouring to persuade a farmer, the one that the fly turned into a butterfly, the second that it became a daddy long-legs, it is worth while sketching its history. From April to September the eggs are deposited on the under side of a rough leaf. Hatched in two days, the larvæ attains perfection in sixteen days, during which, if fine and warm weather prevails, it eats away the surface of the turnip's young leaves with voracity. The chrysalis retires for a fortnight into the earth, and then emerges as a small brassy-black beetle, an eighth of an inch long, with a pale yellow band on each wing-case, and able to skip with much agility, whence it attains the name of Haltica or leaper. It at once attacks the small leaves of the turnip and speedily ruins the crop. It can scent the turnip crop from a great distance, and flies to it even against the wind. There are thus five or six broods in a summer, but they do not feed much after the end of September.

With a fish or two in our basket we reach home, after a delightful ramble of a kind that a lover of Nature may enjoy any night in the country. "Good night, sir," says a belated labourer; "stra—ange weather this; 'tis all along of this 'ere comet." And then another, with the rustic's usual fondness for meteorological speculation, adds, "The moon changes to-night; now we shall have some wet."

When will country folk unlearn this superstition? But the evening primrose is fully expanded and warns us to end, for rustic superstitions are endless.

THE THREE INDIANS.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF M. LENAN.)

BY JOHN OXENFORD.

NEAV'N in its wrath the tempest wildly scatters,
Old forest-oaks with reckless might it shatters,
Niagara's roar is in the tumult drowned;
A rod of rapid fire the lightning flashes,
And in its course the foaming torrents lashes,
Till down they tumble with an angry sound.

Three Indians stand upon the noisy shore—
They listen to the raging billows' roar,
And to the forest's groan, so deep, so long.
An aged man is one, though he appears,
Spite his grey hair, too upright for his years;
The others are his sons, well-built and strong.

Upon those sons the old man gazes now,
And a dark cloud is gathering on his brow,
Like those above that blacken all the sky.
As thus he speaks from his o'erflowing heart,
Flashes more bright than those which o'er him dart
Gleam from the depths of his foreboding eye:

"Curse on the whites, and curse upon the waves
Which brought them to our coast, the fawning slaves,

Who soon the beggar's attitude forgot;
A hundred curses on those hateful gales
That, to impel them hither, filled their sails,
And curse upon the reefs that wrecked them not!

"Daily their ships across our waters haste,
With some device our ancient home to waste;
Like poisoned arrows, bearing death they fly.
Us has the robber-horde of all bereft—
No, not quite all, our hatred still is left.
Come with me, children, come, and let us die!"

Thus spoke the grey old man, and from a tree
They cut their boat; exulting now, and free,
Athwart the watery plain their oars they fling, Float towards the rapids' midst—son, father, brother,
With hearts that beat with love, embrace each other,
And joyously the song of death they sing.

A ceaseless thunder is above them crashing,
Around the boat are forked lightnings flashing;
Sea-gulls exult—the storm's loud voice they know.

The men, with souls unshaken, reach the fall;
Son, father, brother, bravely singing all,
Down the abyss, where death invites, they go!

MIZPAH.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER THE SECOND.

"SHRINKING AWAY FROM HIM."

NIGHT in a sick-room: a room where the red fire-light leaps up in weird flashing forms against the pictured wall; where the heavy damask curtains are drawn closely across the windows, as if to shut out all sound even of the rain beating wildly against the panes without.

"Mizpah, are you there?"

"Yes, dear."

"It is very near the end now."

"Do you feel weaker, John?"

"No, but I feel—dying. Come closer to me, my wife. I want to talk to you."

She is seated between the bed and the fire, a woman still young, and strangely beautiful, but with the patient gravity of middle age settled like a waxen mask over her fair pale face. Her movements, too, are softer and quieter than usual at her age, as she rises, and going to the bed, stoops down above the face, wrinkled and worn, deeply lined and fringed with thin grey hairs, which lies there upon the pillow.

"You have been crying," he says, his keen anxious eyes peering curiously into her face, his nervous withered hand tightening on hers.

"Yes," she says simply. "It is so hard to see you suffer."

"My dear, the bodily suffering is nothing to that which has tortured me for the last six years. Torture! I wonder I have lived so long under it."

She makes no answer. He often utters these ambiguous allusions; but Mizpah is not an inquisitive woman. Perhaps she has had secrets of her own.

"Mizpah," he says suddenly, "do you remember why you married me?"

"Why talk of that now, John?" she asks, flushing timidly.

"Because now is the only time I have. You were only nineteen, Mizpah, and you married because your parents' death had thrown you on my care; because the world said ill-natured things of your living with a guardian of forty-eight; because you wanted to keep a delicate little sister with you, and could not afford to do it unmarried; because—chiefest reason of all—the man you were engaged to, the man you loved and who was away in Canada, had proved false to you; because you saw his marriage in an American paper, after for six months your letters had received no answer. Because of these reasons you married me."

"And because you were the best and truest friend I had in the whole world," she broke in with quivering lips; "because Minnie loved you, and I—liked and honoured you with all my heart. John, I told you all this then. Have I disappointed you, that you go back upon it now?"

"You have been an angel of light to me," he answers hoarsely. "Oh, child! if you only knew what you are to me! If you only guessed how madly, passionately, I, old enough to be your father, have loved you from the first moment I saw you till now! Mizpah, try to think of it. Try to bear it in mind when you would turn from my memory with hatred and loathing."

"John! could that be possible?"

"I wish to Heaven it were possible to avoid it. I had meant to leave it till after I was gone, to keep the kind look on your sweet face till after I was dead; but I cannot; I——"

"John, don't say any more," she interrupts, trembling very much. "If there is anything wrong which you have done, do not tell me. Even though it have hurt me, let me remain in ignorance. I will forgive it, whatever it be. If it be written in your papers, I will burn them unread. Trust me."

He smiles faintly—a sad, hopeless smile.

"No, child, this you could not forgive; nor shall you promise to do so. Listen to me while I have strength, and answer first. Did you not meet Gerald Dacres the day before you were taken with that long illness, nearly six years ago?"

"Yes, John," she says quietly; but how fast her heart is beating!

"And he told you that he had never married—that he had written to you constantly, and got no answer?"

"He spoke of his letters in the one that reached me—the one that told me he was coming here—but not of his marriage. Since it was not true, the report may not have reached his ears."

"And you! Did not you speak of it?"

"No, John."

"No? What explanation, then, did you give of your marriage with me?"

"I gave him none." Her voice is faint with remembered anguish; but the answers are ever straight and true.

"I don't understand you," he says. "What did you say to him?"

"I told him I was married, and bade him go away and forget me."

"What! no more than that? And was he satisfied? Did he ask no explanations—nothing?"

"No, John; he was not satisfied. Do not talk about it—please do not." The pain even now is greater than she can bear. He presses her hand more tightly.

"I will only ask you one thing more, Mizpah. I know that you will answer it with perfect truth. Why did you do this? Nay" (as she hesitates), "I wish to know."

"Because I was a married woman, and my husband trusted me. Because—oh, John! forgive me—I loved Gerald so dearly, he loved me so long, so well and fondly, that I dared not tell him any excuse for my apparent falsehood. I knew his perfect honour, I knew my own innocence; and yet I could not—John, I dared not trust to either while we loved each other. Please do not think ill of me. I knew that I loved Gerald more than my own life; and because I loved him, I sent him away."

She is on her knees now, weeping bitterly, with her face hidden on the wrinkled hand in which hers is clasped. The fire-light flickers on the wall—on the bent golden head. Only the shadows of the curtains fall upon the tortured face of the dying man. Very slowly he speaks.

"I thank God that the sin which dooms me has purified one saint more for heaven. You have made your confession, Mizpah; listen to mine. It was I who kept back your lover's letters; I who stopped yours; I who had that advertisement inserted in the New Brunswick paper; I who invented all the uncharitable gossip which so worked upon your sensitive delicacy. And I did this because I loved you—because I thought that time, and patient idolatry, and every luxury that riches could supply, would win your love away from the remembrance of a young fellow who probably did not love you half so well, and could only have led you into poverty. God only knows how I have been punished; not only now, but in every hour and moment of these seven years which have seen you mine, and not mine. For a few months—not a year—I hoped. Then you and he met; in your fever you told me that; and hope died for ever. Every day since then—every moment that has witnessed your patient obedience—your silent, uncomplaining gentleness—your sad little face sobered into age so early—so early—has been but one long punishment."

"Hush!" she interrupts—she has sprung to her feet long before, shrinking back and away from him, with hands clenched upon her bosom, and face white and horror-stricken—"Hush, for pity's sake! I begged you not to tell me. Oh! why, why did you do it now, when it is all over, all ended past any recall?"

"Mizpah!" he begins feebly.

"Not now, John, not now," she cries, breaking into bitter tears. "I will be good in a moment; but don't say any more just this minute. I—I can't think."

He makes no answer. The shadow is darker on his face; and she has turned to the door, when something, some tender womanly impulse, makes her come back to the side of the bed.

"Don't think me unforgiving," she says; "I do forgive you—I shall soon, when I have thought of all your love and kindness. I—John, do you hear me? John!"

But there is no answer still. The fire-light has died down in the grate. The rain beats and wails against the window. Outside the wind raves, and the branches creak, like the cries of a tortured spirit; but within all is silent, all still; for earthly love is gone—called out to meet its God—and love unselfish, love presanctified is left alone.

"Mrs. Le Feuille, may I introduce my husband's cousin, Mr. Dacres. He is quite a lion with us; only just returned from two years' travels in distant lands."

Mizpah looks up. She is sitting slight and graceful in her widow's dress, one of a fashionable crowd in a fashionable London drawing-room. Two little red spots rush into her cheeks, and her eyes leap up with a sudden light, as she puts out her hand, saying—

"Mr. Dacres and I are old friends."

He does not ~~act~~ like an old friend. He does not even seem to see her hand, but bows with grave formality; and after a word or two of commonplace civility, words which the beating of her heart will hardly let her answer, he moves quietly away, and leaves the room.

So they meet again, and so they part. The locket which bears her name—that name with its quaint sacred meaning, "The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another"—still hangs at his watch-chain; but he has not forgiven her yet. He never will.

Has the Lord watched in vain?

* * * * *

Twilight again. The sky a pale apple-green fading into blue in the east. One long bar of liquid gold low down on the western horizon. Above it a bank of greyish violet cloud fringed with fire. Far away, behind that dark clump of trees, a jingle of bells ringing for evening service. Indoors a wood fire sparkling merrily, an open window draped in lace curtains, which rustle softly in the sweet flower-laden breeze; and beside the window Mizpah seated in a low chair, the broad tulle streamers of her white cap floating like a veil round her slight rounded figure; her golden head resting against a stand of azaleas, white and pink, in full bloom; an open letter in her lap, and a flush bright as a moss-rose bud in either cheek.

There are steps in the passage, and the flush grows deeper. The bells keep ringing, but Mizpah's heart beats too loudly to hear them. The door opens and she is on her feet, her beautiful eyes shining through dazzled tears, her clasped quivering hands outstretched, her whole womanly form heaving and panting with silent, passionate gladness. Against the gold-green background of the sunset sky, Gerald sees her standing like some mediæval saint. The next moment she is in his arms, folded down upon his heart as though he could never let her go again, and kissed lips, hands, and brow—as if the arrears of ten long summers of waiting had to be paid in that one moment.

It is not for a long time that any sensible word is spoken. The bells have rung their joy-peals all unheeded, and up above the purple hills the moon hangs like a lamp of gold on high.

"My darling," Gerald says, "do you know, I could hardly believe it when I got your letter this morning. I never deserved such an answer, Mizpah indeed I scarcely dared hope for one at all."

"Love does not go by desert," Mizpah answers,

"and you see I could not help loving you, Gerald. It grew in me. Besides, I felt it would come right some day. But, oh! I am glad it was not delayed much longer."

"Thank Heaven for my meeting your sister Minnie last week," says Gerald, stroking the bright head fondly.

"And for your confiding to her your hatred."

"Hatred! I tried to hate you, love, but I never could."

"And I tried to forget you, but I never could. Ah, Gerald!"—nestling closer to him, and laying one hand on his locket—"you kept the name, but I kept the verse. Verily the Lord has 'watched between me and thee when we were absent one from another.'"

THEO. GIFT.

THE POETS OF THE SOFTER SEX.

SECOND ARTICLE.

BEFORE the writers we have already noticed were lost to us,* a woman appeared who was destined to surpass in splendour of poetic genius and loftiness of aim all the previous efforts of her sex.

Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has been justly termed "one of the chief poets of modern times, and the greatest female poet of any age or country." Few are ignorant of her classical attainments, of which the fine translation of "Prometheus Bound" is a striking proof, or of the trying circumstances under which she persevered unremittently in study and composition. Among her early writings the longer poems are not equal to her less ambitious pieces. The most important of the former, "The Drama of Exile," is beautifully conceived, but imperfect in the execution. "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" is a romantic narrative holding an intermediate place between these and her smaller poems. It is remarkable for descriptive power and nobility of sentiment, as well as for the melodious flow of the versification. Many of Mrs. Browning's fugitive and lyrical pieces are among the most beautiful in the language. The exquisite elegy on "Cowper's Grave" is well known. So are the graphic and sympathetic verses in which she celebrates her dog "Flush." In a still more beautiful poem, "My Doves," the poetess draws a touching lesson of submission from their gentle cooing "within the city prison"—

'Twas hard to sing by Babel's stream,
More hard in Babel's street;
But if the soulless creatures deem
Their music not unmeet
For sunless walls—let us begin,
Who wear immortal wings within.

"To me fair memories belong
Of scenes that used to bless,
For no regret, but present song
And lasting thankfulness,
And very soon to break away,
Like types, in purer things than they.

* See page 130.

"I will have hopes that cannot fade,
For flowers the valley yields;
I will have humble thoughts instead
Of silent, dewy fields:
My spirit and my God shall be
My seaward hill, my boundless sea."

Woman-like, Mrs. Browning took the little ones under her especial care. We need only allude to that wonderful poem, "The Cry of the Children." Her "Song for the Ragged Schools" is worthy of a place beside it. Few can read unmoved her pleadings for these—

"Little outcasts from life's fold," or fail to heed the exhortation—

"If no better can be done,
Let us do but this—endeavour
Th' the sun behind the sun
Shine upon them while they shiver,

"On the dismal London flags,
Thro' the cruel social juggle,
Put a thought beneath their rags
To ennoble the heart's struggle."

Many of the sonnets—both those entitled "From the Portuguese," but in reality original, and those published under Mrs. Browning's own name—are equal, in their way, to anything in the language.

Mrs. Browning may be considered as supplying the link between the poetry of Wordsworth and Tennyson, and that of her illustrious husband. Abounding in exquisite descriptions of nature, and possessing a capacity for great sweetness of versification, she hesitates not to sacrifice these graces in order to bring her convictions home to her readers' minds in the most direct and emphatic form. To her intense earnestness, growing more intense as years passed on, rather than to any conscious influence of Mr. Browning's genius, we may ascribe the occasional ruggedness of "Casa Guidi Windows," and "Aurora Leigh." The former is a spirited plea for Italian liberty. It embodies a narrative of the events which passed under her windows at Florence, and contains much noble and vigorous writing.

It would take a volume to consider the thoughts that are suggested by Mrs. Browning's great work,

"Aurora Leigh," a book full of the loftiest poetry and the deepest wisdom. A late writer, while doing full justice to the genius with which it overflows, blames this poem for raising problems it does not solve. The same criticism has often been passed on Mr. Carlyle's works, and even if it were just we would regard it as of little value. Such writers rouse you to action, and if they do not solve the problem, they direct your feet into the paths wherein you may find the solution for yourself. But "Aurora Leigh" does much more than this. It teaches us, by Romney's failure in his philanthropic plans, that to confer any lasting benefit on men we must work from the inward to the outward. While sin and ignorance prevail, misery will also prevail. What a lesson is conveyed in the lines——"Men who work can only work for men,

And not to work in vain, must comprehend
Humanity, and so work humanly,
And raise men's bodies still by raising souls,
As God did first."

The mission of the poet is therefore a very noble one—

—"Art's a service—mark:
A silver key is given to thy clasp,
And thou shalt stand unweared, night and day,
And fix it in the hard, slow turning wards,
To open, so, that intermediate door
Betwixt the different planes of sensuous form
And form insensuous, that inferior men
May learn to feel on still from these to those,
And bless thy ministrations."

Poets, with Mrs. Browning, are—"The only truth-tellers now left to God,

The only speakers of essential truth,
Opposed to relapse
And temporal truths"

And it is theirs to read for us the spiritual meanings of sensible things—

—"There's not a flower of spring
That dies ere June, but vaunts itself allied
By issue and symbol, by significance
And correspondence, to that spirit-world
Outside the limits of our span and time,
Whereto we are bound. Let poets give it voice
With human meanings."

Some critics have judged this book as they would a novel, demanding the same vraisemblance in the plot, and realistic portraiture in the characters. It is a question whether we should exact, in poetry which aims at typifying higher truth, the same amount of probability we expect in a representation of everyday life. The age is past for epic poetry with its supernatural machinery. De Tocqueville has well said that the epics of our time are "Childe Harold" and "Jocelyn." Mrs. Browning expresses the same truth in glowing and energetic words—

"All actual heroes are essential men,
And all men possible heroes; every age,
Heroic in proportions, double-faced,
Looks backward and before—expects a morn,
And claims an epics."

But it is to "essential truth," not "relative, comparative, and temporal truths," that the poet should give utterance.

Other criticisms have been passed on this great poem, which only serve to show how prone we are to mistake the shadow for the substance. Did our space permit, we would rather indicate some of the innumerable beauties with which the poem abounds—that passage, for instance, in which Aurora, the poet-child of an English father and a Florentine mother, describes an English landscape after she has learned to love it, and comes to the conclusion that her——"father's land was worthy too

Of being her Shakespeare's."

No one who has read this description will think it too much to say that it is worthy of a place beside Shakespeare's own picture of—

"This precious stone set in the silver sea."

To say that Mrs. Browning has sometimes redundant or useless words and phrases, and that more frequently she strives in vain to shape her great thoughts into words, is only to say that she is human. But the great thoughts are there, and most often they are expressed with a power and fulness of which only the greatest poets have been capable. "The touch of Christ's hand" is on all she has written. Early in her career she warns us against mistaking material for moral and spiritual progress—

"Little thinking if we work our souls as nobly as our iron,
Or if angels will commend us at the goal of pilgrimage."

And all through she has been true to the same high purpose.

A poetess too soon taken from us, Miss Adelaide Procter, dedicated her hereditary gift to the same noble ends as Mrs. Browning. In the volumes she has left behind her, there are many pieces of inferior poetic value, but not one which does not bear the impress of a sympathetic and thoughtful mind. Her legends are, on the whole, superior to her lyrics. She tells these short narratives with a tender feeling and expression which are very charming. The "Legend of Provence" is a beautiful embodiment of a strikingly beautiful mediæval legend.

One of the most exquisite poems of its kind in our language is "The Wayside Inn." The story of a life has never been told with more simple beauty or truer pathos. Many of the others almost equal these. "True Honours," "The Tomb in Ghent," "Philip and Mildred," may be mentioned as examples of a pure and delicate gift for narrative poetry.

Her short poems, when good, are very good indeed. Some of them are extremely fine; they have the harmonious flow of Mrs. Hemans' verse, with a healthier and braver spirit. Nothing can be more vigorous than the lines beginning—

"Rise! for the day is passing,
And you lie dreaming on;
The others have buckled their armour,
And forth to the fight are gone.
A place in the ranks awaits you,
Each man has some part to play;
The Past and the Future are nothing
In the face of the stern To-day."

The imperfection in all mortal things, "divinely appointed, that the law of human life may be Effort, and the law of human judgment, Mercy,"* has never been better described in poetry than in Miss Procter's lines on "Incompleteness." In "Unexpressed" she has shown true insight into the feelings of the artist or the lover, who yearns to express all that speaks to him—

"In the voiceless silence of his heart."

No one can fail to be struck with the beauty of the epithets in the last stanza, or to feel the haunting music of the verse—

"Things of time have voices, speak and perish,
Art and Love speak—but their words must be Like sighings of illimitable forests
And waves of an unfathomable sea"

Some of the most beautiful of these lyrics are well known and popular as songs. Besides the "Legends and Lyrics," Miss Procter published a "Chaplet of Verse" for the benefit of a charitable institution. The poems contained in this small volume are almost wholly devoted to illustrating the special religious views she had adopted.

It must be admitted that among our female poets at least—

"The sweetest songs are those which tell of saddest thoughts;"

and that in general they give too much predominance to the melancholy aspect of things. Miss Jean Ingelow is not free from this tendency, though at times she adopts a healthier tone and grapples bravely with the realities of life. "The Dreams that came True" is a powerful poem. There is a weird grandeur about it, a dignity of style which harmonises well with the solemnity of the subject. The hard, unfeeling landlord, dream-haunted in his prosperity by the terrors of conscience, is finely contrasted with the dying widow cheered in her destitution by visions of angels. "Honours" is a not unsuccessful attempt to deal with the problems and the disappointments which await the student. "The conclusion of the whole matter" is well expressed—

"Far better in its place the lowliest bird
Should sing aright to Him the lowliest song,
Than that a seraph strayed should take the word
And sing His glory wrong."

"Laurance" is a beautifully told idyll of domestic life, somewhat in the manner of the Laureate's

"Dora." In Miss Ingelow's verse we often come on thoughts that want only some more careful condensation and polish to merit a place among those——"jewels five words long,

That on the stretched forefinger of all time Sparkle for ever."

But a fatal facility of rhyming seems to be the besetting sin of our female poets. The reputation of all, or nearly all, would gain much if they only exercised the same strong determination to publish nothing trivial or unworthy of their genius, that our best poets of the other sex have done.

Miss Ingelow's most ambitious effort, "A Story of Doom," must be looked on as a mistake; the story of the Deluge is a subject only to be grasped by the giant intellect of a Dante or a Milton.

A pure taste and a delicate fancy are the chief characteristics of Miss Christina Rossetti's verse. Born in a family richly endowed with intellectual and artistic gifts, she has an easy, graceful, and highly finished style. There is a quiet beauty about many of her short pieces, but little of that brilliancy which tempts one to quote detached passages. We shall, however, give a fine stanza from the poem on "Memory," otherwise not one of the best in the collection—

"I have a room whereinto no one enters
Save myself alone.
There sits a blessed memory on a throne—
There my life centres."

and two others on the nightingale, which are worthy of being read even after Keats and Coleridge—

"Hark! that's the nightingale
Telling the self-same tale
Her song told when this ancient earth was young
So echoes answered when her song was sung
In the first wooded vale.

"We call it love and pain,
The passion of her strain,
And yet we little understand or know;
Why should it not be rather joy that so
Throbs in each throbbin

The devotional poetry, which Miss Rossetti has placed by itself at the end of each volume, gains in power from the nature of the subjects treated. Some of it is very fine. We subjoin the last stanza of "Dost thou not Care?"—

"Lie still, 'be strong,' to-day; but, Lord, to-morrow
What of to-morrow, Lord?
Shall there be rest from toil, be truce from sorrow
Be living green upon the sward
Now but a barren grave to me,
Be joy for sorrow?—
'Did I not die for thee?
Do I not live for thee? Leave Me to-morrow,'"

The compositions of Mrs. Augusta Webster show great intellectual powers. They are written in a style of which simplicity and self-restraint are the chief characteristics. In "Dramatic Studies," and "Portraits," the subjects are mostly tragical even to repulsiveness. There is one "Portrait," however, so sweetly joyous as to cast its sunshine over the whole volume. Mrs. Webster's latest poem, "The Auspicious Day," is a mediæval drama founded on the then popular belief in astrology and witchcraft. It is remarkable for power and dramatic truth of character. The finest passages rise naturally out of the situations, and can only be indicated by giving some outline of the plot. Dorothy, the daughter of Lord Wendulph, is betrothed to Sir Percival Dufresne. Her love is deep and true, but her affianced is led away half by pity and half by the softer charms of Amy, a dependent kinswoman. Sir Percival supposes he is bound in honour to Amy—flies with her and makes her his wife. She is seized and accused of bewitching Percival. Dorothy's faith in her lover is so strong that she accepts and presses the accusation. Out of this arises one of the finest points in the play. The high-minded chaplain, Father Gabriel, has been long convinced that witchcraft has no foundation in fact; but thinking that—

"Some truths will in some minds strangle out
The needfuller truths souls live by,"

he has allowed the superstition to remain unchecked in the mind of his pupil Dorothy. His remorse, when he finds that by thus sacrificing truth to expediency he has perilled at least one life, is finely painted. Amy is condemned to die on the "auspicious" day that Lord Wendulph's astrological calculations have led him to fix for the marriage of Dorothy and Sir Percival. Amy attempts to escape, aided by Dorothy, who has seen her error; but the poor girl is stoned by the populace, who can only be appeased by the wedding pageant, to which Dorothy is forced to consent to save her own life and that of her betrothed. The characters are finely drawn and well contrasted. There is a scene in which Dorothy's happy unconsciousness of the miseries that are gathering round her is beautifully wrought out. She exclaims—

"Nay, why too happy?
'Tis a thin wisdom would make happiness
A bugbear to our hearts."

and the contrast she draws between her own happiness, "boundless as the sky," and the sorrow that she can as yet only imagine, is admirable for dramatic fitness.

We are compelled for want of space to pass over many female writers who deserve notice. Among them are the Hon. Mrs. Norton, the granddaughter of Sheridan, whose writings extend from the period of Mrs. Hemans to our own time, and who has written much that is worthy of the gifted family to which she belongs; Sadie (Miss Williams), and Emily Brontë, both taken away before they had fulfilled the promise of their youth. Nor can we stay to notice the graceful Tennysonian verses of Miss M. B. Smedley. We must hasten to close this short paper with a few words on the poetry which our greatest living novelist has turned aside from her triumphs in prose-fiction to bestow upon us. Besides the "Spanish Gipsy," George Eliot has published a volume of shorter pieces. As might be expected, all her poetry is marked by great power, and condensed and vigorous expression. The writer's peculiar gifts of delineating character and painting natural objects have not forsaken her, and many lines are worthy of being treasured as words of "wit and wisdom." Nevertheless, these poems will be oftener read for the sake of the author than for their intrinsic beauty. They shine by the reflected glory of her great novels, but their form precludes many of the qualities which make these so admirable. The melancholy that is relieved by the inconsequence of a Mr. Brooke, or the keen satire of a Mrs. Cadwallader, becomes oppressive in the poems. "Armgarth" is the least dreary of these remarkable productions, for the moral (George Eliot always has a moral) that we should count as a gain that loss which brings an increase of nobleness and sympathy, harmonises well with the highest Christian truth. Armgarth is a girl endowed with exceptional musical gifts, including an exquisite voice. The loss of this last opens her eyes to the want of brightness in other lives, and she learns in the end to rejoice in the loss of a power which had closed her heart to the sorrows of her kind. Some of the finest lines the author has written are to be found in this short poem.

The "Legend of Jubal" is really a glorification of Death—not the friendly angel who is to give us back those treasures that "wait us in the far-off skies," but the dreamless sleep of annihilation. The versification is smooth and highly finished, but no poetic graces can lighten the gloom which this thought casts over the poem.

"The Minor Prophet" and "O might I join the Choir invisible" are fine expositions of the writer's noble but dreary philosophy, unutterably dreary at best, for what were even a perfected world overshadowed by the doom of hopeless partings?

The "Spanish Gipsy" is so well known, and has been so generally studied at a comparatively recent date, that much need not be said of it here. It is unquestionably a fine poem, but there is more straining after effect, and more of doubtful ornament, than in the novels. It is a question, too, whether Fedalma, in her self-sacrifice, has really chosen the better part. But a great novelist loses too much by confining himself within the limits of verse. Scott saw this when he said that "Rokeby" was a good novel spoiled; and we could better spare the "Spanish Gipsy" than "Romola" or "Middlemarch."

In this short survey of the poetry we owe to female writers, it is very gratifying to note that their talents have ever been enlisted on the side of virtue and truth.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SIXTH.

JOB'S COMFORTERS.

THEY walked towards the house, and Grace went in, to see that Baby was properly cared for, just as the Dalmahoy ladies came sailing along the path in their newly-turned silks covered with white muslin.

Miss Burnett carried her parasol before her as if she were making a charge at something, resolved to impale it; Alice fluttered hers about as if the force of habit were too much for her, and she was obliged to coquette even with the sunshine.

Having almost run the parasol into Walter's face, Miss Burnett halted and dropped the point of her weapon.

"How funny!—I did not think you were so near, Walter. It's very hot to-day. What is this dreadful news about Christina?—is it true that she has gone away without telling you?"

"It is true."

"It is quite a romance," murmured Alice.

"I call it a disgrace," said Miss Burnett severely, and the "giddy young thing" stood corrected, fluttering her parasol from one shoulder to the other, and fanning herself with a delicately perfumed lace handkerchief. "It would not matter if she was the only person concerned; but the whole family suffers by it, and it is extremely wicked of her. But what could we expect? I would never run away from my home."

And the consciousness of virtue added several inches to her stature.

"I would if I got the chance, but not alone," tittered Alice, who was again reprimanded.

This was irritating enough to him, but he spoke quietly.

"Will you grant me a favour, Helen?"

"Certainly, if it is reasonable."

"I only wish to ask you to say nothing about Teenie until she comes home."

"Oh, we have no desire to mention the subject; but it is natural that we should be anxious about a matter which puts us all to shame. Of course, if you decline our sympathy, there is nothing more to be said. The man is waiting, so we shall go home at once."

Tossing her head, and sniffing the air as if to detect the contamination that must be in it, she went off to the carriage, which was at the gate. Alice, as she was about to follow, just touched his arm, and whispered—

"Poor Wattie—I am sorry for you, and for Teenie too. I loved her very much."

He walked with her to the gate, and was there in time to assist Miss Burnett to her place. She was not at all reconciled to him when the carriage drove away.

He was about to go into the house, when another interruption occurred.

Mr. Pettigrew, as behoved an elder of the Kirk, was amongst the first to catch the whispers of scandal concerning the minister's household; and feeling a solemn duty incumbent upon him to admonish the minister or to sympathise with him, as might be advisable, and feeling it to be an equally important duty to be the first to discover the details of this romance (why should anything sad or bad be called a romance?), took the first opportunity of speaking to Walter.

After much clearing of his throat and shuffling, he made his mission known. Was it true that Mrs. Burnett had—had, in fact, eloped?

"Mr. Pettigrew," said Walter, looking him straight in the face with his grave pale eyes, which compelled the man to study the geological character of the gravel, "my wife has chosen to go from home for a time. She did not think it necessary to send the bellman round the town to advertise her intention. Do you think it was?"

"Oh, not at all, sir—not at all, that being the case."

Walter, who did not choose to explain further, said "Good day," and retired.

Mr. Pettigrew had an uncomfortable suspicion that the minister had been telling him a "lee;" but he had not liked to say so. Somehow he never could get on with this young man as he wished; he never could tell him the truth—if the truths happened to be always unpleasant, that was not his fault—as he felt he ought to do, and as his position as a merchant and an elder entitled—indeed, called upon him to do. But he made up for his reticence here by speaking his mind with all necessary embellishments when he stood once more on his own doorstep, and felt himself master of the situation.

Walter saw in these incidents the indication of the petty annoyances to which he would be subject for many days to come, and he felt keenly ashamed of being an object for scandalmongers to work their stupid will upon. His natural inclination was to turn his back upon the place for ever, and so escape the vexations which were in store for him.

Grace held up Baby, who crowed merrily, kicked vigorously, and tugged his father's hair. Walter kissed the child, and, looking at him, resolved that he would not shun the place or the people. He would remain there to confront the slanderers, to shield his wife from shame, and to enforce respect for her by the honesty of his life. They would and rock. The voices commanded and implored her to go back; the spectres crossed her path, and the waving branches seemed like arms directing her backward.

She broke through all at first, and would go on; but voices and shadows persisted, and her heart echoed the cry, "Go back, go back," for Baby's voice seemed everywhere ringing in her ears. Then she hesitated, began to tremble, and sank down upon a stone, crying. The desolation of her posibelieve her innocent when they knew that he did not doubt her truth.

Message from the Laird—

"Have discovered nothing yet; telegraphed to all the stations open."

Walter took horse, and started again in search of her.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SEVENTH.

ON THE TRAMP.

THE fright which the "tattie-doolie" gave her had roused all the superstition of Teenie's nature; there were, to her, voices in the wind, now loud and threatening, again low and wailing; there were fearful spectres in the shadows of bush and tree tion overwhelmed her, making the utterly vague nature of her quest plain for the first time, and she felt as if she were a little boat that had broken away from its moorings, and was being tossed about by the sea, without any hand to help or to guide it.

Under the swift-flying black clouds, amidst those eerie shadows, listening to the loud wind, and to the deep boom of the sea—telling its grim story of wreck and death—she yearned for the child, the husband, and the sheltering home she had left behind.

She would go back, and yet she could not. She shrank and quivered with shame for what she had already done; she feared that he would mock at her, scorn her—she feared that more than all the terrors of the night, more than the apparent hopelessness of the journey she had undertaken. She felt now that it was stupid and ridiculous to expect to find her father any sooner by leaving home than she would have done by waiting for him. But then, if she could only hide herself, Dame Wishart would relent, and that would accomplish all she wanted. At the same time she was frightened by that terrible feeling of desolation, and she started up to go home.

The petty feeling of shame restrained her again, and she turned in the opposite direction. The farther she went, the greater became her terror of returning, until she felt as if she could do anything, endure anything, rather than go home. So she went on and on, too much disturbed in mind to be conscious of physical fatigue; but by-and-by Nature asserted itself, she tripped often, staggered sometimes, and at length would have fallen, but that she obtained the timely help of what seemed to be a brick wall.

She had instinctively kept the coast-line; the loud voice of the sea had, perhaps, unconsciously guided her. A thick white mist shrouded surrounding objects, so that she had no idea where she was.

The dawn increased the whiteness of the mist, but scarcely helped to make objects more definite.

She groped round the wall until she came to what seemed to be a doorway. After a little hesitation she entered, groping her way along, but stumbling over loose stones. There was dim light from above, and presently she guessed where she was—it was a deserted lime-kiln, which she had seen on several occasions when out driving with Walter. She crept into a recess, sat down leaning against the wall, and then fell asleep in utter exhaustion.

A cold, damp morning, the sun fighting its way through the mist.

She started up, alarmed, stupified, and shivering with cold; stiff and pained in every joint. What terrible dreams she had been dreaming! She had left home—she was hiding—the white walls streaked with a slimy green caught her eye, the cold wind penetrated her bones, and she remembered it all. She had dreamed that she was dreaming—that she was at home, near Walter, near Baby, and the weary wandering on which she had embarked had appeared to be only a painful vision. Lo, that apparent vision was the reality, and the glimpse of home and the loved ones was the dream.

She could not go back now—it was too late. Walter would never forgive her—she could not forgive herself.

She was cold and hungry; the miserable cravings of the appetite drove her to seek some human habitation, when she most desired to avoid her fellow-men and women. She passed out from the shelter of the lime-kiln, and the cold morning air seemed to bite through her. She knew that the road lay along the top of cliffs which overhung the sea, now near, and again at some little distance from the water. Occasionally she caught glimpses of waves dashing high up against the rocks, breaking in white spray, and receding like a baffled enemy from the walls of a besieged town.

By-and-by she heard the blithe voices of children, who were engaged in a game of hide-and-seek, singing in loud chorus whenever the hider was discovered—

"I see the gowk and the gowk sees me—
A-tween the berry bush and the apple tree."

She hesitated a minute, but the voices of the children reassured her, and she advanced to the solitary cottage. Through an open window issued the sounds of vigorous scrubbing, and of a girl's voice singing. The air was slow, and the words melancholy, as they were generally rendered; but the singer in this instance, to suit the activity of her movements, transformed the air into a lilt, and whenever she was scrubbing with special vigour she hummed or mumbled, instead of uttering words. The song in this new arrangement ran somewhat in the following manner:—

"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
How can you bloom—um um, um-um;
How can you chant, ye little birds,
And I see—um, um um, um-um?"

"Um-um, um-um—I pu'd a rose,
Fu' sweet upon its—um-um—tree;
And my fause lover stole the rose,
But left—um-um, um-um—wi' me."

Teenie's shy knock at the door was not heard at first, but when she mustered courage enough to repeat it, the singer ceased, and the voice said cheerily—

"Come in, whoever you are; what are you standing chap-chapping there for?"

She timidly crossed the threshold, and saw a stalwart young woman, with flaring red hair, on her knees beside a pail, over which she was at the moment wringing a cloth, whilst she looked round to see who was the visitor. It was a bright, happy face, and its surroundings matched it admirably—a bed in a recess, covered by a patch-work quilt of many colours, in which there was not a crease; a deal table, wooden chairs, and three-legged stools, all "clean as a new pin;" a variety of tins hanging above the mantelpiece, polished like mirrors; a pleasant peat fire, over which hung on its cleek the porridge-pot; the steel top of the fender rivaling the tins in polish; the hearthstone newly whitened, the floor half washed, and everything presenting signs of cleanliness and content.

The woman's first look at Teenie was one of great surprise; the visit of a lady at that time of the morning was very unusual, and Teenie's clothes at once indicated that she did not belong to the peasantry. The woman got up respectfully.

"Guid morning, mem; and what's your will?"

Teenie was put out by this display of respect, and she felt it the more awkward to present her petition.

"I am on my way to Aberdeen," she faltered, "to try and learn something about my father, who is out whaling."

"Guid be here! do you mean that you're to walk a' the way to Aberdeen?"

"Yes, and I want something to eat."

"Ye'se ha'e that, but where do you come from?"

She hesitated, but answered truthfully—

"From Rowanden."

"You belong to the fisher-folk then. I wouldna have thought it from your claes. Thank goodness my man's a gardener, and I'm no fashed about storms or bad fishings. Come here and sit you down; you look wearied, poor thing, and I dare say the storm has taken some of your friends."

The woman became more familiar, and most hospitable, as soon as she discovered that the visitor was in distress about something; and she made no intentional effort to pry into her business, although she talked a great deal. She gave Teenie a drink of milk, which was very refreshing, and some bannocks, with the advice—

"You're no to spoil your appetite, for my man—Andra Fyfe, he's head gardener at Knocknaddie—my man will be in to breakfast in twa or three minutes, wi' a' the bairns, and you'll just sup a platel o' porridge wi' us."

When she had settled Teenie comfortably in a chair by the fire, she proceeded to finish the washing of the floor, talking all the time.

"And what might your name be, miss?—you're no married, are you?"

"Yes; my name is Burnett."

"Married!—aye, aye, you're a young creature to be a wife. And ha'e you any bairns, now?"

"One."

"A laddie or a lassie?"

"A laddie."

"Aye, aye, wha would ha'e thought it, and you that young-looking! But I have six mysel'—two loons and four lassies. I was just eighteen when I was married."

"You seem to be very happy."

"Oo, aye, happy enough. I just try to keep the bairns and the house tidy, and take things as they come. It's the Lord's will, you ken, whatever happens, and skirling never saved a sow from the fletcher. Andra's unco particular; but he's a guid sowl, though whiles he's ower guid at lifting his wee finger" (a euphemism for saying that he drank too much), "and then there's nae doing wi' him."

So Mrs. Fyfe ran on, her excessive energy finding vent in gossip or song, just as happened. She finished the floor, emptied her pail in the neighbouring "midden," wrung out her "clouts," and then arranged the table for breakfast: a row of yellow bowls, eight in number, with one more for the stranger. Then she took a basin full of meal, which she took up, in handfuls, and allowed it to trickle into the water, that she stirred continuously with the wooden "spurtle," or porridge-stick. When the meal was sufficiently boiled, she lifted the pot from the fire, and deftly poured out the porridge into the bowls, proportioning the contents of each to the age of the children.

The husband arrived. He was a dour sort of man. He expressed no surprise at the presence of Teenie, but his furtive glances indicated his curiosity about her. Having learned that she was on her way to Aberdeen, and wanted a rest and something to eat, he said she was welcome. Then the bairns were called in, and ranged round the table. The man pronounced a long and earnestly spoken grace, milk was served round, and all with good appetite supped the porridge.

Teenie was much benefited by the warmth of the house and the food, so that after breakfast she was quite ready to resume her journey. The peace and content of this home made her think bitterly that she had neglected something in the management of her household. But she could not redeem the past.

Dour Andra Fyfe, when he learned the destination of his guest, remembered that there was a cart going a few miles on her way, and, if she liked, he would arrange with the driver to give her a "hurl." She was grateful for this assistance, and also for the comfort and strength which she felt after the rest in the cottage, and her substantial though simple breakfast.

She shyly offered her half-crown in payment, but it was declined kindly.

"You'll need it all," said Mrs. Fyfe, flinging back her red hair, and restraining the obstreperous efforts of the youngest born to spring to the neck of the guest; "keep your siller, and God speed you on your errand."

Teenie lifted the child in her arms—a merry-eyed, white-headed little lass of three years—and kissed her.

"Ou was geetin'—what for?" said the child, with sudden gravity.

The mother had observed that fact also, but had said nothing; and now she endeavoured to interrupt the child. Teenie answered, lowering her face as if to hide it—

"I am not well."

"I'h, and 'ou's had to take salts and sinny!" (a remedy for every disease with the cotters, and the little one's chief idea of torment). "Me geet when mither gi'es it to me, and whiles mither skelp Bessie and whiles gi'es me a bawbee. Did 'ou get skelps?"

"Something as bad," said Teenie, smiling faintly, and thinking how much harder to bear was a mental skelping than a physical one.

"And 'ou that big!—wish me was big as 'ou."

"And I wish that I was like you."

Bessie opened her eyes wide, and tried to turn back the eyelids, to express her amazement at that incomprehensible reply.

"Set her down," cried the mother, with a sort of proud deprecation; "she's just a torment wi' her clatter. I dinna ken who she takes the tongue from—it's no from my man, and it canna be from me!"

Andra might have told another story, but at present he was at the door, grumbling that they would be too late for the cart. So Teenie placed the child on the floor.

"It has done me good to speak to her," she said, with distant sobs in her voice; "she minds me of my bairn—at—at home."

She found a strange difficulty in uttering the word "home," for the dreary sense of desolation came upon her again; she felt that she had no home now.

"Poor lassie!" murmured Mrs. Fyfe, her sympathy intensified by her suspicion that Teenie had not told her the precise truth about the object of her journey. "Is't the father you are going to seek?"

"No—my own father."

"Poor lassie!" repeated the good-hearted woman, thinking that matters were even worse than she at first supposed.

But Andra, hearing this, turned back.

"Are you married?" he asked gruffly.

The sad eyes looked at him with timid surprise at his sudden change of manner, and he felt abashed.

"Yes," was the simple reply.

"Oh!" he exclaimed, and stepped back to the door, satisfied when he learned that the bairn had been "honestly come by," as he used to say of such matters. He was, in his way, a stern moralist, and—although his own first child had been born before wedlock—he would not have helped Teenie at all if her answer had been different.

"Will 'ou come back again?" cried Bessie clinging to her skirt.

"Maybe; good-bye, Bessie, and I hope you will have a long, happy life. I'm obliged to you, Mistress Fyfe—thanks to you and your man, I feel a heap better."

"Lord be wi' you wherever you gang, and you'll aye be welcome here. I hope you'll meet your father. I'm doubting there's some sare trouble upon you; but I'm no to fash you with ony questions. You'll come back, maybe, when you're all well again, and tell us about it."

This was spoken as they moved to the road where Andra was impatiently waiting, and trying to preserve his temper by chewing straws.

Teenie said good-bye again to her friend in need, feeling all the time that she was not thanking her with anything like sufficient warmth, although she felt very, very grateful for the kindness she had experienced, and deeply affected by what she had seen and heard in the cottage. Mrs. Fyfe was quite content; she was not accustomed to much effusion, even of gratitude. Three of the bairns were standing beside her—the others had started for school, five miles off—and she uttered another hearty "God speed ye," as Teenie walked away with Andra.

He strode through a field as a short cut to the high road, where they were to meet the cart. Whatever might be the reason of it, Andra was not nearly so dour in manner now that he was away from his own house—indeed, amongst his cronies he could be merry enough. Although he did not attempt any conversation, he showed her certain trivial attentions—such as helping her over a ditch, or through a hedge—which she would never have expected from him. Men are so different when beyond the reach of the "guidwife's" controlling and subduing eye!

"We're just in time," said he as they stepped into the road; "yonder's Sandy Crab coming. He's a blithe loon, but there's nae ill in him, so you needna be skeared at anything he says."

Sandy Crab drove leisurely over the long straight road, sitting on the front of his cart, cracking his whip—not to quicken the horse, but to amuse himself—alternately singing and whistling, "When the kye come hame." He was a fair-haired youth, with a round red face, in which there was much simplicity and good-nature. But Sandy was, according to his own account, "a de'il among the lasses," and he was proud of the many conquests he had made, proofs of which existed in the shape of locks of hair, photographs, crumpled bows of ribbon, and a garter! The latter he had picked off the barn floor on the night of a kirk (harvest-home), where the dancing had been fast and furious; and the fun he made seeking the owner won him several hearts, as he said. He certainly obtained several photographs before the next term, although every lass in the place disclaimed the ownership of the mysterious garter.

He wore a brown Balmoral bonnet, jauntily set on the side of his head; a double-breasted jacket, the back and sleeves of which were of a thick woollen stuff, the breast of dark brown mole-skin, ornamented with rows of big white pearl buttons, and a medal he had won at the athletic sports for throwing the hammer; trousers of moleskin. He was a broad-shouldered, smart-looking fellow.

"Hey, Sandy!" shouted Andra, as the man approached ; "will you gi'e this lass a lift as far as you're going on the road to Aberdeen?"

"That will I, my dawtie," was the answer as the cart stopped ; "loup in, my lass. 'Come under my plaidie, and sit down beside me, believe me——'"

He did not continue the quotation, for he caught sight of Teenie's pale and somewhat frightened face ; and he knew by her dress that she was not, as he had at first thought, simply a country lass flitting from one place of service to another. Many a blithe day he had enjoyed in the course of such flittings ; but this was not to be one of them. Besides, she had no kist.

He jumped to the ground, took off the back of the cart, and made a sort of gangway of it, by which she could ascend, with assistance, and take her place on the bundle of hay which he arranged as a seat.

"Will you get in?" he said, sheepishly enough.

She hesitated a minute, and then advanced frankly. The two men, one on each side, helped her into the cart ; she sat down on the hay. Sandy fastened on the back, and jumped up on the front board again.

"Good day, mem, and a pleasant journey," said Andra quite kindly ; "I'll be glad to see you if you come our way again."

"You're awfully good, Mr. Fyfe ; I wish I could thank you as I would like to do," she said in a low quavering voice ; for the kindness of those strangers, and her own utter inability to make any fitting acknowledgment for it, impressed her deeply. All the world had seemed so cruel to her a few hours ago.

"Say no a word about it," answered Andra.

He nodded, and turned away to his work as Sandy cracked his whip, and the horse started forward with long heavy steps, the cart jolting over stones and through ruts made by the rains.

END OF CHAPTER THE FORTY-SEVENTH.

WOMEN WHO WORK.

BEHIND A COUNTER.

DOES, madam? What size? Six and a quarter? Let me see your hand, please. I'm sorry to have kept you waiting ; but that lady couldn't make up her mind. First she wanted a particular shade and three buttons, and then she thought three buttons came too dear, and wanted two, and I had to hunt through all the boxes for a pair of that colour ; and when it was found, she fancied she had seen a pair of a shade she liked better in one of the other boxes, and we had to go through them all again. Tiresome? Well, it is a little tiresome at first ; but one soon gets used to it ; and that is why we are expected to serve two and three customers at a time, so as to give one leisure for making up and changing her mind while we are serving another, you know. Yes, it is tiresome in another way, that sometimes the difficult lady needs us to help her through her doubts and deliberations, and then the second customer, who is more easily suited, gets tired of waiting, and perhaps goes away.

I was afraid you were going away, and if you had I should have been well scolded. There is nothing the men who walk up and down the shop (shop-walkers, we call them) are harder on us for than that—to let a customer go empty-handed. Ladies often complain that we waste their time by showing them a dozen things they don't want for one they do ; but a shop soon gets a bad name if you haven't just the thing a lady wants, and don't seem inclined to trouble about getting it for her. She goes away vexed, and tells the first friend she meets that you can't get anything you want at that shop ; and so it gets about, and people go elsewhere, and custom drops off.

Oh ! bless you, yes, shopkeepers know that quite well ; and that's why we go on trying to tempt a lady with one thing after another, when we haven't got the exact thing she has set her heart on. Three times out of four she sees something which takes her fancy nearly as well, and forgets her disappointment in the pleasure of the new purchase. In some large shops like this the girls get a commission on all they sell ; and ladies will now and then complain that they're not allowed to go without buying something ; but the reason is easy enough to understand, for girls don't get high wages, or even keep their places, if the shopkeeper finds out that they lose customers through shyness, stupidity, or indifference.

A young woman got turned off at a week's notice not long ago, for letting a customer go without asking whether there was any of the stuff she wanted in the store-rooms. It turned out that there was plenty, though what was up-stairs had been sold out ; and she was sent away. I was very sorry for her, for she has a mother dying of consumption, and I'm afraid she was thinking more of her than the customer ; but of course it was careless, and if an example was not made now and then, discipline couldn't be kept up.

You are smiling, ma'am, but you don't know what strict discipline we girls are kept in; and it is needed, too. There are ninety-five young women in this shop, and more in others, of all ages, and grades, and shades of morals and manners. You've no idea what a need there is among so many for rigid rules, and a strong hand to enforce them. The shopwalkers, they keep us in order, and we aren't fond of them, for they're our natural enemies, and always report everything that comes under their eye, of neglect, incivility, talking, or disregard of rules in any way. I don't suppose, however, that the large shopkeepers would get on as well without them. Of course in small shops there is no need of such supervision.

Difficult to know where everything is? Well, no, ma'am, not after the first. You see everything has its fixed place; and when you first enter you're put under the care of some one, who shows you all those places belonging to your own department. You get to know them thoroughly in a very few days; and if a lady wants you to serve her with something out of your department, and you don't know where it is, you ask the young lady at that counter, and she points it out to you.

There's a rule in many shops that the girl who sells you gloves is not to sell you ribands, and so on; but it's not very strictly kept to; for if a lady is in a hurry, she likes being served by one person; and as the customer's pleasure is the chief consideration, minor regulations, as far as possible, give way to it; and we like accommodating each other. Some girls, who are favourites with customers for readiness of serving, or sympathy, or pretty manners, will even get them things from quite other rooms; though the rule is stricter about that, and we often are obliged to tell ladies, "I must trouble you to step into the next room for that, ma'am; I'm not allowed to bring it you here."

Oh, yes, of course we get to know our own value, and whether we are good saleswomen, in time, as well as the employers, and we slight the rules on the strength of it occasionally. It pays us and it pays them, and it pleases the customer; but still you can understand that without the rule there might be no end of confusion and disorder, and that all the work would fall upon a few hands.

Yes, the standing is very tiring. If you look at the young women, you'll see that few of them look strong; and at first you often feel as if you must drop, or sit down on the floor, your back and legs get so deadly weary with standing still from one hour's end to another.

We come at eight, and get our breakfast here, dress the counters and shop-windows, and are generally done and serving by a little after nine. That goes on till noon, when a bell rings for dinner, and we go to it—not all at once, of course, but in detachments, so many from each department—and you can guess how glad we are to sit down to it. Now and then I've known girls faint—especially in selling-off times—directly they sat down.

We haven't much time allowed us, of course, because the others are waiting for their turn. It varies in different shops from half an hour to an hour. It seems short enough, anyhow, and then begins the standing, and smiling, and serving again till five, when the bell rings for tea in the same manner; after which we go at it again till a quarter to eight, when the shop shuts. This shop shuts, that is. In Regent Street they close earlier; and at tobacconists' and one or two other shops they are often open till midnight, and before any others again in the morning, for the greater convenience of men; but there the girls sit down most of the time, and are very well paid into the bargain. You see, they have to be pretty and engaging, or gentlemen don't care about buying from them; and very often they are wanted to speak a little French, German, or Spanish—the more languages the better at a tobacconist's, for all foreigners smoke.

Oh, yes, ma'am, you always see the prettiest girls and showiest figures in shops where gentlemen buy. It's an understood necessity; and perhaps that's why prudent mothers would rather let their girls go where they have less pay and harder work; but even ladies, you know, prefer being served by a pretty, winning-looking girl, to one who's downright ugly and ill-favoured. It's only human nature, I suppose, but it comes hard on the ugly girls who want to earn a living all the same. A girl was given notice to leave not long ago. She was very quiet and obliging, and the only support of two little sisters at home; but she had an awful ugly scar on her face, and the shopkeeper found that ladies passed her counter whenever they could, and tried to get served by some one else. She got that scar saving a lady's child from being run over. The horse knocked her down and put his hoof on her face. But you see you can't explain all that to every customer, and she had to go. She's doing sewing-machine work now, and one of the little sisters has gone out to service. It's hard enough to keep the other, and I don't think she'll do it long. She isn't strong.

Yes, ma'am, it's true; good looks and good figures do become real blessings, in an honest matter-of-fact sense, in a draper's shop; and in some departments they're really the chief recommendations. Have you never noticed the girls in the mantle room, how tall and graceful they generally are? A dumpy, vulgar-looking woman will go to buy a mantle there; sees it tried on by one of the young women; admires the sit and cut of it on a figure which would make anything look well, and buys it, thinking it will have the same effect on her. Don't the girls laugh at her, too, when she is gone!

There are not many women—vulgar ones especially—who will own that a thing meant for ladies to wear could look worse on them than on a common shop-girl; though, to be sure, one little woman—a lady she was—did come in one day after a jacket; and when she had seen our head young woman in that department put it on, and wave about before the glass in it, asking her if she didn't think it a beautiful shape, and if it didn't sit well and becomingly—says the little lady, "Yes, it does—on you." Now, please, send me one of your young women about my height, with high shoulders and narrow chest, no figure to speak of, and a round back, if possible, and let me see how it looks on her." She knew what the effect would be, and she didn't take that jacket, not she!

Pay? Well, ma'am, that differs, of course, in different shops, and with the different duties and capabilities of the young women. I get sixty pounds a year and my board, as you have seen; but some of the young women get more, and some less. In many of the fashionable shops none get under a hundred. No, our dresses are not provided, but we get them at cost price. They may be any stuff we like, only black, and black ribands and brooches; and then we get our commissions, you know, which is a great help.

No, ma'am, we don't live in the shop. I've a sister here who gets the same as I do; and we lodge in a house hard by, with about a dozen others. Oh, yes, the woman of the house is very particular about the sort. She won't take in any of the flighty ones. Most of us have only a bed-room, and then there's a big parlour we use in common; but in some shops—the large ones in Regent Street and Oxford Street particularly—all the young women sleep on the premises, and have as comfortable rooms, and as handsome a dining-room and drawing-room, as any lady. In one, the proprietor has a library for them, and a reading and billiard room for the young men, and most have pianos. We've one in our lodgings, and several of us can play a little. Of course, in those establishments I was speaking of, the men are kept separate from the young women, and the rules are very strict.

It's a difficult thing to keep respectable in a large shop—much more difficult than people fancy; and that very difficulty is one of the hardest things we have to go through. I'm often anxious about my sister—that pretty girl there, ma'am, with the fair curly hair. She gets a great deal of notice, not only from shopmen, but from gentlemen; and then she gets invitations of an evening to go to the play, and such like; and it does seem hard to be always keeping her at home with me. She's a good girl yet; but— Well, I hope God will keep her so. *

* Selling off? Yes, ma'am; that is our hardest time; and it comes twice a year, and lasts a month. I don't know which is the worst, the winter or the summer one; but you know what it is yourself to go into the large shops then, when they are so full of people that you can't breathe—such a whirl of hurry and confusion that you can't get served—such a steam, and crowd, and noise that you don't know whether you are standing on your head or heels. Sometimes, when I've told ladies that such and such a thing they want will be cheaper at selling-off time, they've said that they would rather go without it than come to the shop then. Yes, the want of air, and crowd, and confusion are terrible even for them; and think what it is for us, who have to stand through it all day, and day after day for a whole month.

Sometimes customers will remark how deadly white a girl is looking, and wonder what ails her, when they themselves are complaining of having to stand the stifling atmosphere and noise for ten minutes. Twice I've been dangerously ill after selling-off time; and it's not at all an uncommon occurrence for some of the more delicate girls to break down even before it's over.

I remember once I was serving four ladies at a time in a great crush. The shop had been so crowded all day, that I hadn't even been able to slip away for dinner. I'd have given anything for a glass of water, my throat was so dry, and there was such a buzzing in my head and weight in my back. One of the ladies would want piles on piles of lace overhauled for a pattern of Cluny which a friend had bought some days before, though I told her it was all sold out, and that in those days things sold so quickly, you couldn't be sure of finding an inch of a thing to-morrow of which there were scores of yards to-day. Another couldn't make up her mind, and changed it as often as she had decided on anything; while another sat by, saying it was "infamous that she was not served more quickly, and let get away from that poisonous air." I shouldn't have minded either, or all, at any other time; but I suppose I was overset and weak (it was the second week of the sale, and this sort of thing had been going on all day and every day), for I suddenly broke down, and burst out crying. Fortunately, the girl next me saw, and stepped into my place, and I got away somehow, and was taken below, where I went from one fit of hysterics to another.

Yes, that sort of thing would never do to last; but you see it only comes twice a year; and for the rest of the time, though the work is sometimes hard, and always monotonous, it is well paid and regular; and you've always the chance of a rise, and of laying by money. It wants patience, good temper, and steadiness. They are useful things anywhere, but you can't do without them if you want to get on behind a counter.

ODD FANCIES.

HOW little we can guess what may be the favourite amusement or "hobby" of any one we casually meet! Most people have some pursuit: one is a reader; another, a billiard player; another, a musician; and another, perhaps, is great in amateur conjuring, and prides himself on his skill in repeating, in a small way, the tricks of the popular conjurer of the day.

But there is a considerable body of people who are collectors. Not that they necessarily understand the objects they collect: the pleasure lies in the collecting and possessing them. Some people seem born to be collectors, just as a scholar was declared to have been "created to make indexes." The tendency is an instinct, and it seems to be left to accident to determine in what direction it shall display itself. Perhaps, to a certain extent, it is a part of every one's nature. What child has not his secret store of odds and ends—bits of string, and buttons, and coloured paper? and how indignant he is to hear it called "rubbish!" The mania appears under various forms at successive stages of life: the first visit to the sea-side generally marks the sea-weed and shell period, answering perhaps to the flint-knife period of our forefathers; then comes the zoophyte period; then the postage-stamp and bird's-egg period.

The love of collecting often shows itself in a fantastic form. You see your friend, on alighting from a cab, demand the driver's ticket; you saw nothing extortionate in the man's demand, and you anticipate a collision. Nothing of the sort, however: your friend is simply making a collection.

A friend of the writer presented to the British Museum a collection of shells, on which, in the course of years, he had spent a small fortune; but he was uneasy at the loss of his favourite pastime; "he was a collector," he said, by nature, and he "must collect something." What was he to do? Accident decided the point. A conversation happened to arise as to the comparative number of male and female writers who had published volumes of poems, when the thought occurred to him that he would settle the question by collecting all the volumes of poems by female writers on which he could lay his hands. In a short time he had obtained no less than two thousand.

One man will make a collection of horse-shoes which have been used to drive away evil spirits; another will collect letters remarkable for bad spelling, and a third is great in play-bills.

There are, however, several respectable and recognised forms of the mania. Book-collecting is one of the most respectable forms.

One man desires a complete library: he will possess all the historians, all the poets, all the novelists, etc.; another is a specialist: perhaps he takes to Shakespeare—he determines to have every edition, every commentary, every treatise on the infinite number of questions to which Shakespeare and his works have given rise. If he is a man of fortune, he will give high prices for anything rare.

Another phase is the collecting old and curious books of all sorts; uncut copies, copies with large margins, editions rendered curious by some well-known misprints, or any other peculiarity which collectors have agreed to regard as giving the book a special value. This is called "Bibliomania."

Then there are the collectors of manuscripts.

But who has not met with the collector of autographs—the enthusiast who besets his acquaintances for every scrap of paper they may happen to possess bearing the signature of any one who has become distinguished?

Then there are the collectors of objects of natural history: amiable race! The pursuit is open to all; even the Londoner can get away a few miles into the country, and, like Izaak Walton, can "prevent the sunrise," in search of anything living. Young and old delight in the pursuit. Who has not seen the elderly gentleman in spectacles, armed with a large green net on a rim with a handle? See! he gives chase to a butterfly; he runs as nimbly as a schoolboy. Ah! he has bagged it! It is a much-coveted specimen of Polyommatus ægon; he wants now only the Camberwell Beauty and Thecla betula, to complete his case of English butterflies. He has long been at work at insects and birds, and his walls are covered with glass cases; he is a correspondent of half the natural history periodicals, and is the first to hear the cuckoo and to see a glow-worm.

Then, too, there are the collectors of facts. The astronomer registers observations on the heavens; another records the rainfall and the direction of the wind at different places. Others collect facts about population, the rate of wages, the prevalence of diseases, the statistics of benefit clubs, of railway traffic, and an infinity of topics. The number of amateurs thus engaged is very large. They work silently, and their pursuits possess but little interest for people in general; but only let a question be raised in the daily papers, and it is surprising how many persons appear to have been for years giving their entire attention to the subject.

These men are all useful. Important principles are discovered by the comparison of a long array of facts; and the man who is utterly destitute of scientific knowledge may be of great service to society, by collecting materials for others to reason upon. Yes, the men are all useful; let us think affectionately of the "Collectors."

HALCYON HOURS.

"IT WAS NOT SADNESS MADE US STILL."

THERE was no fleck in all the blue
Of that pure sky we sat beneath,
And, wave by wave, the waters drew,
Or seemed to draw, a peaceful breath ;

A blessed calm was on the shore,
A roseate glow upon the sea,
The trouble of the world was o'er,
And life's unrest had ceased to be.

The anguish of the tortured breast,
The bitter pangs of doubt and fear,
These were but phantoms of unrest
That made the sunshine triply dear;
The gleaming lids of tear-bright eyes
There were no longer tears to fill.
Sorrow was lost in glad surprise—
It was not sadness made us still.

The life of that one hour to live,
That one to hold, the rest to lose
We were content, though clouds might give
The future all its rainbow hues;

A tender joy was all our own,
Naught else had in it place or part—
Love touched to its divinest tone,
The chords of rapture in the heart.

And when the hard awakening came,
The dream had glorified the sleep;
Our lives are brighter for the flame
That, incense-fed, our memories keep;
The angels of the hours we knew
For ever radiant we behold,
As those the monkish painters drew
Smile out of solid heavens of gold.

A Z A L E A.

A TALE IN THREE CHAPTERS—CHAPTER THE FIRST.

AZALEA: I shall never forget when the name first caught my eyes. It was late at night, and I was sitting up waiting for father's coming home. Our room, over Lambeth way, was hot and stuffy, and there was a restlessness on me as I sat in the dark, and looked out into the street that was full of moonlight.

Harry, my brother, who had been hot and feverish and drowsy all day, had tumbled to sleep on the hearthrug, and there was only his hard breathing to break the silence. I listened to it till its monotony drove me wild. I walked to and fro till I felt stifled, and at last I thought, "I will steal down and get a mouthful of air. The street's so quiet, I shall hear father's step long before he comes. And he may be glad if I meet him."

So I crept out of the house. I was so glad to breathe the fresh air, and it and the moonlight seemed all one, and soothed and quieted me. I wandered down the street towards the river, and stood at the corner waiting and revelling in the coolness. As I did so I noticed that the light fell strong upon a hoarding, covered with huge posters, round a building they were running up, and it was so light that I could read these quite plainly. There were many fine and smart, but none so big and showy as one with great letters that seemed tumbling forwards, and those letters made the word "Azalea."

"They are taller than I am surely," I thought; "I will go and measure. They won't tumble on me for all they look so terrible."

And I ran over the road—forgetful of all else in the moment—and marched up and down in front of the letters, which towered far above as if I had been in an arcade. For I was little more than a child, and so small and light that I looked even younger than I was. Though Harry was younger we looked much of an age, and were indeed singularly alike, especially as to our bearing and way of carrying ourselves; but this was not surprising, for Harry as an acrobat's son had been well trained, and I, out of mere daring and the love of the thing, could do all that he could do—some of the feats, father said, even better. But perhaps he only said this to spur Harry on, for he was not much given to praising us. He was a hard, stern man, with an eye like an eagle's, black and scorching under his bushy brows, that used to look us into obedience without his saying ever a word. Still he was kind to us in his way, and would have been more so, I think, but the acrobat's is a trying life, and the drink he took made him irritable.

I marched up and down before the letters, as I have said, and fell to wondering what they meant; and as I did so, all at once a rough hand was twisted into my curls—they hung right to my waist—and a rough voice demanded fiercely what I did there at that hour. It was father—the worse for liquor, I could see, for his eyes were like hot coals, and at first he was disposed to be angry; but as he looked up from my terrified face to the big letters, his stern face relaxed and he loosed his grip of my hair.

"How did you know of this, Minnie?" he demanded.

"Of what, father?" I stammered.

"The poster here: you came to look at the fine poster, didn't you? How did you find it out?"

He saw by my look that I did not understand him, and when I muttered something about only coming out for a breath of air, dragged me out into the middle of the road, and with irrepressible pride pointed again to the grand letters.

"Look at them," he cried. "Beautiful, ain't they? I've done the trick at last, my girl. The French gentleman that came to see Harry tumble, last week, will make our fortunes. Your brother is Azalea!"

I was so surprised that I could not answer. It fairly took my breath away. He gave one more look full of pride at the word, and we went back to the house. On the way he told me, with a garrulity unusual with him, of what had happened—how the French gentleman had hit upon a novelty—how that it consisted of a sort of "vampire-trap," from which the performer was to be shot up into the air twenty or thirty feet, and to alight on a stage there—and how that Harry had just met the French gentleman's requirements, both from his skill and his girlish appearance, because the excitement to be created about Azalea would be increased from there being a mystery whether it was a boy or a girl.

We entered the house as he finished, and I tripped up-stairs and lit a candle, which I gave to father as he entered our room. Harry was still sleeping on the rug, breathing hard. The light showed us his face—it was bright red. He had been stricken with fever; and before the week was out, we two, huddled together in the corner of a couch, followed the poor boy to his grave.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

AZALEA took the town.

"How!" you will exclaim; "was he not really dead then?" Alas! yes, and truly, deeply mourned over. My father was in a passion of grief at his loss, and in despair at the consequences. The French gentleman came to the house half-frenzied. "But, man," cried he, "I have spent a fortune in advertising this—this son of yours!"

"True, and it is most unfortunate——" my father began.

"Bah!" cried the other, and bounded out of the room. In doing so he nearly tumbled over me as I crouched weeping in the passage, so that I cried out. He stepped aside—started—rapped out a French oath—and darting into the room he had just quitted, slammed-to the door. There was a long conversation in subdued voices, and when at length he quitted the house, his face was radiant and his courtesy profuse. On the mat he presented me with the rose from his button-hole, and kissed the tips of the tight gloves he seemed to have been born in, all the way as he backed down the steps out into the middle of the road.

That night I gave my father a promise that I would face the public in place of our poor lost Harry, and try my hardest to realise the golden dreams his death had shattered. And later, when he thought me sleeping, I stole out to have another look at the great letters on the wall. They had a fresh meaning for me now, and oh, how huge and terrible they looked! Surely they were bigger than ever as I cowered down before them. And they bent forward farther and farther, as if to crush me—poor little mite that I was—till I was fain to cry out and tear myself away from them in mortal terror.

I kept my word though, and practised hard; thinking much of what I had to do and little of what might come of it; sustained moreover by encouragement both from my father and the Frenchman—who every day gave me a flower from his button-hole, and kissed his glove-tips whenever he caught my eye, as if in that act he administered some reviving cordial—and so at length the first night's performance came with triumphant results, and Azalea was the idol of the town.

There was something vastly pleasant in the position. The performance I had undertaken involved danger every night. But I had no fear, and the ringing plaudits, and the sweet sense of popularity, drove all thoughts of danger out of my head. Sometimes I fancied that there was an anxious, a pained look in my father's face, as he waited on me and watched my every movement, inspiring me with confidence by his eagle glance; but whatever his apprehensions I did not share them, and in time grew easy to indifference. At last—but quite at last—I even overcame my awe of the great letters on the wall, beside which I was so insignificant, and grew to amusing myself with the fancy that they simply bent forward out of courtesy towards me, joining in the general homage.

So I was proud and happy in my strange life, and I might have continued to be so, but for one circumstance. I had noticed, but without attaching any meaning to it, that on most nights a particular box was occupied by a curious-looking person, who watched me with a concentrated attention. He was an elderly man, with dyed black hair hanging long about a colourless face. A singular ravenous look was in his eyes, and he had a habit of twitching up his face, so as to show a long row of white teeth, evidently false. As he sat he would rest his thin bony hands, clutched together hard, on the front of the box, a tremulous diamond showing that he endured strong nervous excitement.

These peculiarities I should never have noticed, but that all at once a rumour reached me, investing this man with a terrible interest. I came to know—I cannot tell how—that he had a fixed conviction that my career would terminate fatally, and a morbid desire to be present on the occasion. Thus he never missed a night. He was always in the house, and always, if possible, in the place in which I had noticed him.

Slowly but surely the presence of this man, combined with the knowledge of why he came, began to have a strange effect upon me. I began to be haunted with the thought of him. It mixed up with my dreams and broke my rest. It troubled my waking hours to such an extent that I grew nervous, distracted, and irritable, and pride and pleasure alike went. I began to shrink with apprehension from my nightly task. I found myself speculating on the possibilities of failure, of mutilation, of sudden death. Doubt of my own powers tended towards real incapacity. The terror of the letters on the walls revived, and at sight of the now familiar name my heart would throb violently, and my limbs tremble.

"If he would only absent himself for once—for once only!" I found myself repeating all day; and "You will fail! you will fail!" rang in my mind like a demon chorus.

There could be but one end to this. At last it came. One night, as I was nerving myself for the great leap (a dead silence and hush of expectation in the house), and just as I had given the signal, this man rose from his seat. His doing so attracted my gaze, my concentration was lost, my will was paralysed. The spring sent me flying into the air—there was a cry, a crash, a surging as of tumultuous in-rushing waves, and then a blank.

After that night Azalea appeared no more.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

IN the very clutch of death I was yet spared; my father had saved my life; but I had received injuries which resulted in a long and weary illness. Happily my exertions had placed us in comparative affluence, though the success had chiefly enriched the old Frenchman, who never failed during my long illness to call daily, leaving me a flower and his card, until I had whole packs of the latter on the little table at my bedside.

When I began to recover we travelled, and once I was horrified at seeing on the platform of a railway station, as we dashed past, the white face of the man who had waited to gloat over my death. Eventually we settled down in a little midland village, where we were unknown, and our antecedents unsuspected.

And so the story of my life might have ended, but that it chanced to me to meet and favourably impress the son of a gentleman of that neighbourhood. He made me the offer of his hand. With the memory of the past vividly before me, I promptly refused. It was not right, I knew, that one who had filled the compromising position I had done should become the wife of a man of family and position. But he would not be repulsed. Again and again he urged his suit, till refusal became rudeness, and there was but one thing left for me to do. It was necessary to take him into my confidence, and I did so.

Need I say that his amazement knew no bounds? He could not for the moment find words in which to give expression to it. When he did, it was only to express his half-incredulity. He had himself witnessed Azalea's exploits. And was it indeed a woman? And I that woman?

"You see," I urged, "there is a barrier between us which nothing can overleap. Would to Heaven you could have believed this, and spared me this humiliation."

He took my hand.

"Minnie," he said, "be my wife."

"No, no, no," I protested; "consider your position, your family, the friends it would estrange, the contempt it would bring upon you. I dare not!"

But my protestations were in vain. He prevailed, because he loved me, and because I returned that love, oh, so truly, so utterly! I became his happy wife—happy, yes; and yet one little cloud would hover in the blue expanse of my married life.

Never for one instant did Frank reproach me with the past; never, that I could discern, did he shrink from allusion to it, as to a subject which we could discuss freely and openly, without shame or regret. And yet I worried myself with the fear whether in his heart of hearts he might not sometimes regret the step that he had taken, and whether he might not even unconsciously come to regard me with less respect, with less consideration than those about him upon whose past there was no shadow, and who had within their hearts no secret. In all this I deeply wronged him. His heart had no such feeling; the loyalty of his affection was untainted by any such reproach.

I came to know this in time for true and certain. The cloud was lifted, and went in a day, in an hour—ay, in a single minute. That minute I shall never forget. Our first baby-child, our little bright-eyed darling, lay upon my knees, laughing, crowing, and striving to thrust its dimpled hands into its mouth.

Frank bent over—the evening sunshine on his curls.

"Baby must be christened soon, dear," I said; "she must have a name, and we have never talked this over."

"There was no need," he answered

I looked up.

"What! you have chosen, then?" I asked.

"Yes, love."

"Oh, tell me! tell me! what are we to call her?"

He bent, kissing my brow, and with a smile that showed how well he knew that he kissed away my hidden trouble, answered—

"Azalea."

W. SAWYER.

FUSSY FOLKS.

Y dear! my dear! have you got your comforter?"

"No, my dear; I don't want it in this fine weather."

"But it might change to rain; or an east wind might come on. One can't be sure. Do take it."

—Mr. Denshire, make John take his comforter.—And, oh! John——

"All right, my dear, what is it? I'm in a great hurry."

"Don't forget the salmon, and—John, you've not got your comforter on. Do wind it round your throat, twice round—a middle cut of salmon, mind, and——"

"I know, my dear, I know. You've told me all that already."

"But I am sure you will forget. John, please make a note of it, and—wait one moment—a middle cut; and be sure it is not Christchurch salmon? and—oh, dear me! one instant do make a note of it; and, John, tie your comforter tight.—Mr. Denshire, would you remind him?—not Christchurch salmon; it is twopence a pound dearer.—And, John, don't forget the middle——"

But, with the prospect of missing our train before us, John dragged me away, pursued by his wife's tongue till we were both out of hearing. Five minutes' sharp run, not over-agreeable to men of middle age and portly—shall we say dignified?—figure, and we reach the station just too late!

"Next train not for 'alf an hour, sir."

"Confound it!" says John. "And I've a most important business appointment at eleven. It's all my wife's fault; she's so consumedly fussy."

And I, who have also an appointment in the City, the loss of which may entail a corresponding one of pounds, shillings, and pence, excuse the adjective in sympathetic irritation at the cause. It is all his wife's fault; and fussiness is a fault which men—I thank goodness for it—seldom possess; but which seems indigenous to womankind, and in some cases grows and grows upon the owner till she becomes even more of a burthen to herself than to her long-suffering neighbours. I have known passionate women, and pitied them; venomous women, and detested them; treacherous women, and despised them. I have rarely suffered more in bodily and mental comfort than from my knowledge of "tussy" women.

Home is the synonym of peace; therefore home without peace is an anomaly; and as the presence or a fussy woman is utterly destructive to every peaceful and placid element, it stands to reason that the home where such a one reigns is of all places the most unhomelike, wearisome, and discordant; and instead of being the resting-place to the man of business, and the healing grotto of the invalid, must inevitably drive the well but weary husband to his club, the sick and suffering one to the hospital—or the grave.

You think that I speak too strongly? Let us see.

One of the most special characteristics of a fussy woman, and one which, while seeming too trivial for notice, is peculiarly productive of discomfort to those about her, is her utter inability to decide for herself on any one single subject in the whole circle of life, from choosing a bonnet ribbon to settling the destiny of her firstborn. However urgently you may be occupied on other matters, she must have your advice; and having obtained it, will pull it to pieces, argue over it, scout it, revert to her first idea, and pass one half-hour in holding it up for admiration in contrast to your own, and another in combatting all the arguments which you might (but don't, if you are wise) propound against it; and finally, if you give in to her by way of ending the subject, will return to your view, hesitate, vacillate between the two, retire to get a third opinion, return more undecided than ever, possibly melt tears, probably lose her temper, and most likely in the end go off on some fresh subject, and leave the question to be gone over again at some future time.

Is this exaggeration? Let me exemplify, and you can judge for yourself.

I am busy in my study, writing an article on—let us say animal magnetism. To me enters a fussy woman, bonnet in one hand, hand-box or rag-basket in the other.

[N.B.—Fussy women are always encumbered with boxes, bundles, and baskets of odds and ends.]

I don't look at her. If I did she would speak to me, and I don't want to be spoken to; but I see her out of the sub-corner of my left eye, and groan inwardly.

"Is it not tiresome?" she says.

No answer. I am too busy even to hear!

"This bonnet is not fit to wear. It is really dreadful not to have a bonnet to put on, isn't it?"

No answer.

"And I don't like to buy another just at the end of the season. By the way, though, Mrs. Jones has got a new one. Didn't you see her in it last Sunday?"

"No"—very shortly.

"Didn't you? A plum-coloured one with mauve feathers. I don't think the feathers were real tips though. Perhaps she got it cheap. What do you think? Now, if I could get a cheap bonnet; but I am so unlucky. I think they always charge me double what they do other people. Do you remember the price of that lavender and—why, I had the bill just now. What can I have done with it? Dear me, how provoking! Have you seen it? Mary must have taken it away with the breakfast-things, or perhaps it is on the floor. If you would move your chair a moment. No, Mary must have taken it; or is it under the table?—Mary, have you seen a bill for a bonnet? Oh, I am sure you have taken it, for it was here just now, and—why, dear me, here it is in my pocket all the time! Well, that is strange. No, Mary, I don't want you any more, and you can put the bill in the fire. It is paid. I only wanted to see if it was £3 10s. or £3 15s., and—"

At this moment something which has long puzzled me as to relative psychic force suddenly dawns across my intelligence, and I really cease to hear for a moment. I am recalled by a voice and look of injured appeal, and the remark—

"I really think you might attend to me for one little moment. What do you think?"

"About what? I beg your pardon."

"Why, I have been telling you! About the bonnet, of course. Do you think I could go to the Smiths' in a home-made affair? or must I go to the shop and buy a new one?"

My eye wanders to the rag-basket, and in dread of a discussion of its contents, I decide instantly for the shop. It is no use.

"Do you really think so? But it is so extravagant. I have only had this six weeks, and to buy another! But I suppose I couldn't go on wearing it; and yet—I don't know. What should you say?"

"Hem! Don't know really"—without looking up.

"Why? Do you think I could? I thought you hated shabby things so much; and blue, of all colours, fades so quickly. I wish I had not got blue at all. I should never have done so if Fanny hadn't advised me; and such a light blue too. Is it not annoying? If I do get a new bonnet, what colour would you like it to be?"

"Better go to the milliner's and choose there." This is a bright suggestion, and ought to relieve me. It does not, however, for she answers plaintively—

"But we ought to have some idea before going there." (We! Is it my bonnet?) "Now, do advise me. Don't you think green—"

"Green? Yes, very pretty. Have green." I return to my article briskly.

"But it is so trying, and at my age too. By the way, I have some green ribbon here which—but I don't think I could wear green. Oh, no! that would be quite out of the question—quite. How do you think this looks?—only I am not sure how to put it on. Plaited, I suppose—eh?"

(No answer.)

"But I thought plaitings were quite gone out. Fanny's bonnet has none on it. Dear me! I can't make up my mind, and you won't help me with your taste in the least."

"I have no taste in bonnets, and I am frightfully busy. If you would kindly let me finish this at—"

"Well, really I never saw any one so selfish and indifferent. I think it is my fate to live with selfish people; and when my only wish to look nice is to do you credit. But that is all the gratitude one gets. And then, perhaps, if I do my best at making one, you won't like me to wear it."

"Oh, yes, I shall, I promise you."

"Then you think I had better do so. Why didn't you say so before? I would begin it at once only I am not sure about the shape. If Fanny were only at home! And would you mind my emptying this basket on your table? I want to see whether there is anything in it that would do—this, for instance. And then, if I make it like Fanny's—but really I don't know. It might be a failure. I wonder if I had better go and buy one in Regent Street." And so on, ad infinitum.

Think, good friend, how much "animal magnetism" remains in your brain after the first five minutes, and how much Christian kindness in your heart after you have tossed the article aside in despair, and gone forth knowing that the happy idea, once lost, may never return. And this is no imaginary sketch, but only the opening chorus of the discussion without which this unhappy person finds it morally impossible to buy herself so much as a single inch of ribbon.

But independent of this habit of boring you about their affairs, another annoying peculiarity in tussy women is that they are equally incapable of letting yours alone. They cannot be happy without having a finger in everybody's pie, even while their own remains unfinished and neglected. They are for ever offering unasked suggestions, and obtruding undesired aid; and yet, as we have seen, cannot perform the simplest action without worrying all around for advice and assistance in it. They have such a passion for talking, that they cannot suffer anybody to pronounce the most ordinary opinion without first contradicting, and then disputing it, with a vigour only proportionate to their absolute ignorance of the matter in question. They are for ever hurrying others, and for ever behindhand themselves; for ever restless, and for ever unhappy; for ever tired, and for ever tiring others by the constant fuss and fidget which accompanies every action of their lives.

If you sit down to sketch, the fussy woman is at your shoulder suggesting that this is out of drawing, and that out of perspective; making pencil-marks on your paper, crumbling your bread, blurring your tints, lamenting over the wash you have just put on, and deprecating the one you are about to add.

If you fly for a little peace to the piano, she follows to exclaim at imaginary false notes, requests you to play over again bars just completed, checks your most brilliant runs by dabbing down her finger on the keys to see whether they be dusty, and spoils your enjoyment of the most delicate harmonies by humming three or four variations of them, all out of tune and time, to show you how wrong is your own rendering.

Woe betide you if you fall ill in the house of a fussy woman! for should she be taken up with any hobby, however trivial, at the moment, you may actually die without her being even aware that you are ailing; and this not from unkindness, but because, mark you, inveterate fussiness entails habitual selfishness—selfishness which is not necessarily sinful, but consequent on entire absence of all leisure for thought of others' comfort.

But should her mind be free, you are no better off, for she is as likely as not to kill you by the fuss and fidget which in many ailments is worse than any ill-treatment. She is sure you are going to die if you look pale—she is certain that you are in a raging fever if you are flushed; she wonders if it is typhus, because there was a case in Marylebone last week—and argues that it must be small-pox, because it is prevalent in Chelsea. She prescribes a remedy, and thinks of a better as soon as you have begun to try it. She torments you with inquiries as to your symptoms, when you are trying to forget them; and wakes you from a doze by manipulations of your pulse. Your head spins while she discusses whether she ought, or ought not, to send for a doctor; and if so, what doctor; and when she has at last fixed on and sent for one, she discovers that she has no confidence in him, argues over all his opinions, and dissuades you from all his prescriptions.

When she is ill herself—if, indeed, her little finger aches—the case is infinitely worse. She is sure that no one ever had such a finger before. She is certain it is some abnormal disease. She talks over it—she cries over it—she takes it from person to person, and doctor to doctor, to be examined, felt, pitied, and prescribed for in every imaginable way. It is rheumatism; it is gout—rheumatic gout—inflammation of the bone—cancer—gangrene. She is in such torture that life is unendurable. She is going to die, when—all of a sudden—some other trifle usurps her fancy; and the finger, over which her whole family have been writhing in vicarious agonies, is entirely forgotten!

Is it wonderful that the servants of such a one seldom stay over a month—that her governesses give warning at the end of a quarter—that her children are sickly, fractious, and ill-conducted—her husband prematurely worn and aged—her whole life a misery to herself, a bane to every methodical mind, and a torture to every peaceful spirit?

THE FRENCH LESSON.

BLUE-EYED, as if the summer skies
Above were always in them glassed,
With smiles before whose light care flies,
Demure she sat and simply wise,
As up the garden walk I passed.

Around two girls th' acacia hung
Its creamy blossoms for a frame,
Standing by her they glibly sung
Their French verbs, while with ready tongue
She spake, they following—Que j'aime!

That picture treasured in my breast,
Her sweet tones murmuring day and night
Que j'aime within my ears, no rest
I found within the distant West,
And dreams did but renew that sight.

'Twas useless there base gold to save
Ling'ring, my heart was far away;
And Hope her honeyed counsels gave,
Bidding me cross the rolling wave,
Seek England's rock-walls lashed with spray.

Al! happy me! returning home (Where Julie lived, home seemed to be),
'Twas sweet near those blue eyes to come,
See them break into smiles, and some—
The best—were aye reserved for me!

One morn—the lark above his mate
In rapture sang by bank and brae—
I plucked up grace to dare my fate:
“Que j'aime, I heard you conjugate;
Answer me, please—Vous m'aimez?”
She stopped—grew pale as death—the blush
Flew o'er her cheeks; as with a dart
My soul was pierced; what that quick rush Meant, I divined; and she—well, hush!
Next moment wept she on my heart.

Al! happy me! each rising tear
I kissed away, and soothed her long,
Whisp'ring, “French verbs are finished, dear,
Save that more perfectly each year
We'll try to say, Nous aimerons.”

CHAPTER THE FORTY-EIGHTH.

IN DREAMLAND.

SHE sat with cloak drawn tightly about her, head bowed, but occasionally glancing round in a vain effort to identify the part of the country through which she was travelling.

Sandy hummed or whistled to himself in an undertone, stealing many sheepish glances at the lady—for a lady she was, he had no doubt; and he wondered much how she came to be a friend of Andra Fyfe, and why she was travelling by road to Aberdeen, when there was the train to take her in a very short time. At length—

"Are you cozy?"

"Quite, thank you."

The voice was a very sweet one, and the manner friendly; yet all Sandy's arts failed him, and he felt unable to continue the conversation. He had a series of jokes, which were always successful with the lasses; but this one seemed so sad that the jokes were damped. He went on cracking his whip—doing even that quietly—humming, whistling, and wondering.

She was thinking of the happy home she had seen that morning; how blissful was the lot of Mrs. Fyfe! how blithe the bairns! She could have been happy too, in a humble cot like that, where there were no worries about money—no bitterness of disappointment about great fortunes, and where the round of duties consisted in keeping the house and bairns tidy, making the porridge and kail, and having a pleasant smile for the guid-man when he came home from his work.

They were content—aye, there was the secret of it all; and she had marred the happiness of her home, because she had not been content. Her heart swelled and throbbed as she realised how foolish, wicked, and wrong she had been in leaving Drumliemount. She wished she could go back, but shrank from that. The petty feeling of shame—of pride—barred the way. She could not go back now; it was too late.

But it was all so strange—the journey through the night, the rest in the deserted lime-kiln, the friends of the next morning, the bright home, the bairns' voices, Mrs. Fyfe's queer song, and the jolting over the road in a cart. She seemed to be travelling in dreamland: it must be just one of those waking dreams which had so often visited her, and in which she had tried to see the strange lands and peoples of the ballads and fireside legends; or tried to comprehend that vague yearning for the something beyond her daily life, which had been part of her nature since ever she could remember looking out in wonder upon the moors and the restless sea. There seemed to be always something wanting to complete her state, to perfect her happiness.

What was it she yearned for? Was not this the expression of a discontented spirit, restless and ever changing as the sea? Nobody had perfect happiness on earth, yet she had been craving for it all her life, like a child crying for the moon to play with. It could not be love she sought, for she had found that. She felt very miserable as she began to think that selfish discontent was at the bottom of it all. And yet she loved him; she was going to prove that by hiding away, by sinking utterly into the dreamland, so that he might be happy.

Dreams, dreams, dreams! Presently Walter would speak, or Baby would cry, and she would waken up in the dear home, and she would be so practical and steady that they would all be glad this wandering had been only a dream.

"What way do you no take the train to Aberdeen?"

That was a voice far away; but it reached her, and was slowly drawing her down from the clouds to the everyday commonplaces of her position.

"Are you sleeping?"

The voice was louder and much nearer.

"Oh, are you sleeping, Maggie?" sang the voice, and went on with the rest of the verse.

She raised her head drowsily, and saw the ruddy face of Sandy Crab, bent towards her, laughing.

"I'm wae to rouse you, for you look weary," said the rustic beau; "but unless you mean to gang up to the hill with me, and help to load the peats, there's nae help for't. We're near as far on your road as I'm going. You'll never tramp to Aberdeen; what way do you no take the train?"

The repetition of the question roused her to its significance. The train?—she had never thought of it; all her ideas had been so confused; she had only wished to get away from Drumliemount, and to move towards the granite city in the faint—almost absurd—hope that she might there learn something of the Christina. Her distress had been too bitter, her mind too much distracted to form any definite plans as to her movements.

"I don't know," she answered shamefacedly ; "I—I did not think of it."

"Od, that's queer ; but it's your best plan."

"Where could I get the train?"

"At Steenhve, about six miles from here ; but if you take the footpath through the wood, it's not more than four and a bittock."

"What is the fare?"

"I'm no sure, but about half-a-crown, I dare say."

That was just the sum of which she was pos-go yet, and I maun be hame before even. The work has to be done, you sec, whether we like or no, and I'm no one of those lazy beggars that just says, Come even, come saxpence" (meaning that the day's wage is paid whether the work is done or not).

"You have given me a good lift, and I've had a fine rest, thank you," she said, "and I would not like to take you off your road. I'll easily walk to the train."

"Go down there, then, till you come to a slap"

"HAD ENOUGH?"

sessed : she would have nothing to give to Sandy, and she would arrive in a strange city penniless. But it was best to hasten her journey, and she would not think of what was to happen when she reached the end of it.

She was still dreaming.

The cart stopped at the corner of a narrow road, which led up to the hills whither Sandy was going for peats. He dismounted, took off the back of the cart, and offered his assistance to her in descending to the ground. She just touched his shoulder, and jumped down.

"You loup like a two-year-old," he said admiringly ; "by my sang, I would like to hurl you all the way to Steenhve ; but I've a long road to (opening) "in the hedge, syne follow the footpath through the wood, and across the bog, and you'll come on to the road. Syne turn to your left, and you'll come into the town. You canna go wrong in broad daylight, although many a one has lost theirsels there at night."

"I'll remember what you say ; but—how am I to pay you?"

"Hoots ! I need nae pay ; I was coming this gate anyway ; but if you'll gi'e me something to mind me of you—a bit ribbon, or anything—I'll be rale proud."

She gave him a bow which was fastened on the breast of her dress : it seemed to her very little, and she was somewhat astonished by the request.

But she took it as a simple desire for a remembrance of one to whom he had done a kindness, and she did not hesitate.

Good-bye was said—merrily on his side, as he pinned the bow beside his medal; earnestly on hers—and he drove off to the hills, quite proud of his new trophy of conquest, as he regarded it. He was an irresistible chap among the lasses according to his own belief; but, then, very little satisfied him!

She walked down the muddy road, which was pock-marked by the steps of a drove of sheep not long gone by. The opening in the hedge was easily found, and she took the footpath into the fir-wood.

The trees were jewelled with rain-drops sparkling in the glimpses of sunlight which broke through the heavy clouds at intervals; again a gust of wind shook the branches, the heavy drops fell in showers, and there was a patter in the underwood as of children's feet. Light and shadow played about the trunks, and there was a fresh, grateful odour in the wood. At first she walked upon soft moss or long thick grass, because the footpath was so miry; but presently the ground beneath the trees became bare and brown, relieved only now and then by a little patch of moss, or a group of fungi, and in one part by a solitary wild flower, which lifted up its head courageously to brighten this dark place, and caught new beauty in its solitude as a ray of sunlight fell at its feet to comfort it. Teenie stooped as if she would kiss the flower, but she did not pluck it; she left it there to cheer the path of whoever followed her.

Walter was riding along the road, passed the gap in the hedge, and yet he divined nothing of her neighbourhood. No instinct told him that she was near; his horse's hoofs tramped out her foot-prints, and he did not know.

Half an hour earlier, and he would have found her parting with Sandy Crab; but the latter was now a mile or more on his way to the hills, and she was in the centre of the wood.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-NINTH.

BY THE WAYSIDE.

THE footpath became more difficult to discern as she advanced, and at last all trace of it disappeared. She turned back to seek it—failed; thought she had gone a little too much to the right, and so turned to the left—with no better success. She was puzzled—looked all round; but each direction seemed to be so like the other, that it was impossible to decide which way to turn. Long rows of bare trunks, light and shadow, the brown mould underneath—nothing sufficiently distinctive to guide a stranger to the place.

After a little hesitation, she marched straight forward. An hour's walking, and she emerged from the wood upon a narrow road scored with deep wheel-ruts, and having a ditch on either side.

She was tired, and rested there, sitting on a stone, leaning her back against the bole of a tree, and a black shadow shooting aslant her face and body. Hands resting limply in her lap, head thrown back, and eyes half closed. A sunbeam fringed the shadow, but did not dispel it. There was a warm drowsy moisture in the air, and she sank into dreamland again—the region of constant endeavour without accomplishment. She felt, as one frequently does in dreams, like one trying to escape some danger that was all the more terrible because of its vagueness; but her feet were heavy, and, try as she might, there seemed to be no possibility of moving beyond reach of the enemy. She was sensible of deep depression; she wished to get away, and could not.

She hoped that some one would pass, and direct her to the right road for Steenhylve; but no one came. The birds were making merry overhead, and she sat so still that one little fellow dropped down beside a pool almost at her feet, and bathed himself with much fluttering of his plumage.

At length she got up, and resumed her journey, taking what she thought was the right way, but utterly indifferent as to her course, she felt so weary in body and soul.

The direction she had taken was towards the hills; but it was late in the afternoon before she became aware of that, and then she was utterly worn out, ready to lie down by the wayside and die. If it were not that Walter must hate her now, that he would spurn her from him, she would crawl back to the home which became dearer and more beautiful to her the farther she strayed away from it, and crave his pity—even that she would be satisfied with now.

But it was for his sake she had left—for his sake she must keep away. She felt stronger in thinking of that. Presently she was bewildered and weakened again by the disagreeable question, what was she to do, without money or friends, until her father returned?

Still, it was for his sake: she would think of that and nothing else; and so she would be able to carry out her resolution.

She came to a clear spring, sparkling like silver, in a hollow by the roadside; and standing over it, leisurely filling a brown pitcher which had a broken mouth, were two children—ragged, dirty, bare-headed—with black hair, almost white with dust, and unkempt for many a day. They were swarthy-looking, thanks to the sun, and quite as much to the dirt which seemed to be engrained in their skin. One was a boy between ten and twelve years, the other a girl about nine.

Their features were sharp and old-fashioned;

their eyes bright and dark. They looked healthy, in spite of the dirt. One moment they were laughing and admiring themselves in the mirror of the spring—the girl was trying to arrange her brush-like hair in ringlets—and the next they were quarrelling about who should carry the pitcher.

"I carried it last time," cried the boy.

"No, you didna, and you're just a big lazy sumph."

"Say that again, and I'll gi'e you a clyte in the side o' the head."

Instead of saying it again, she put out her tongue at him; and he might have fulfilled his threat, but they were interrupted by Teenie asking for a drink. The children displayed no surprise at her sudden appearance, but they gazed at her boldly. Then the boy—

"Do you mean out o' the pig?" (pitcher).

"You'll have that, but it's a far better drink if you put your head down and lick it up out o' the well."

"Do you no see the leddy would soil her bonnie ribbons?" said the girl.

The boy was reasonable, and at once saw the force of that argument. He lifted up the pitcher. Teenie knelt on a stone, and avoiding the broken part, placed the edge of the vessel to her parched lips, the children examining her curiously all the time. He held the pitcher so poised that she could take what she required without inconvenience.

"Had enough?" he asked, as she drew back her head; and added encouragingly, "There's plenty more."

She thanked him, and felt much relieved. She inquired the way to Steenhyve.

"I'm no sure, but it's a bittock from this. My father could tell you, for he kens every road in the country; but this is Saturday, and he aye gets fou' on Saturday. Mither will do, though; come on and see."

He took the pitcher and marched on ahead, Teenie following and talking to him; the girl coming last, in order to inspect the stranger's dress.

"What is your name?"

"Willie, and my father is Will Broadfoot."

"Where do you live?"

"Everywhere, frae Yetholin to Johnnie Groat's. We ha'e a house that gangs on wheels."

He said that with much pride.

"On wheels?"

"Aye, yonder it is."

He pointed to a dingy-looking caravan which stood at the corner of a field; a bare-boned, half-starved horse grazing near it on the roadside.

A woman sat on the wooden steps which led up to a miniature door. She was nursing a child, or rather, she was allowing it to lie across her knees, whilst she employed her hands in washing and scraping potatoes, which were in a tin basin at her feet. A dark, haggard face; her hair, untidy as the children's, had once been black, but was now streaked with grey, and was further altered in colour by the dust which had been allowed to fasten upon it. Round her neck was a string of bright red coral beads; a red shawl crossed her shoulders and breast, passed under the arms, and was tied in a big knot behind; her skirt was of a thick brown stuff, much faded.

Teenie did not like the appearance of the woman, or of the house on wheels. She should have seen the latter at night in the village market stand, when the back was let down to form a stage, lit by four flaring and smoking naphtha lamps, which showed piles of Sheffield cutlery, warranted; Brummagem jewellery, watch-chains, dog-chains, work-boxes, mirrors, brushes, tea-trays, and the endless variety of nicnacs with which the country folk were tempted by Will Broadfoot, the most notable of gipsy cheap Jacks. Then the caravan looked brilliant, and the gaping crowd were too much interested in the jokes and drolleries of Will to notice the haggard woman sitting grim and silent in the background, handing out the various articles as they were required. Light and laughter in front, and she a sad shadow behind.

Without lifting her head, or pausing in her occupation, the woman glowered at Teenie as she advanced with the children.

"Father's no here," said the boy, as if he were well pleased with the absence of his parent; then stepping up to his mother, "There's the water, and here's a woman wants to ken the road to Steenhyve."

"Ten miles or more," answered a low, harsh voice.

Teenie's limbs bent under her at that announcement. Ten miles! and she was already aching in every joint, with pains more acute than she had ever felt before. She felt sick, and was speechless.

"Take the bairn, and I'll let her see the road."

Teenie saw a wee pinched face, lifted up with a feeble smile to Willie. The face was that of a boy of four years, the body was so shrivelled that it was no bigger than that of an ordinary child of ten months. Willie raised his burden easily; the child was so light that a baby might have carried him.

"He's got spinal complaint, and there's a kind o' fever on him the-now," explained Mrs. Broadfoot—Agg she was called by those who knew her. Nagg she was playfully called by her husband. She rose to her feet, a potato in one hand and a knife in the other. She spoke with what seemed such callousness to the boy's ailment, that the listener shuddered.

Agg went on—

"You go down the road, and take to your left by the beltane of wood; follow the road, keeping the wood on your right, till you come to the auld coach-road. Turn to your left again, gang straight forrit, and you'll come into the town. Look, yonder are the kirk-steeples."

Through the haze in the far distance, over wood, meadow, and moor, Teenie dimly descried the steeples of the town. Trying hard to remember the directions given to her, she said wearily—

"Let me rest here a while."

"Rest," was the answer, and Agg sat on the step again, and proceeded to prepare the potatoes as if she were unconscious of the presence of any one; never looking up, although she was taking furtive glances at the stranger, and would have been ready to identify her anywhere—never uttering a sound.

Teenie sank down on the grass. She took off her hat—a broad-brimmed Leghorn, trimmed with roses and a blue ribbon—and tried to realise her position. But she was very weak, and instead of thinking about her own affairs, she was watching Willie nursing his sick brother.

Willie was chattering to his nursling, and—rude as he had been to his sister at the well—was treating him with loving care. He was plucking reeds and wild flowers to amuse him, and trying to coax a smile from him by tickling his nose with blades of grass. Two shrivelled little arms crept out from the dirty shawl which enveloped the child, and wee worn fingers touched his grimy cheeks affectionately.

"Bonnie Boolie!" said the faint voice tenderly—through all the dirt and rags the helpless one saw beauty in those who loved him—"you're awfu' guid to Patsy, and Patsy's gaun to dec. Whar do you think they'll bury him?"

"In the moon, and there'll be bonnie starns for his gravestane. But we canna do that enow, so you're going to live to be a big man, and help Boolie to fecht the bubbly Jock [turkey-cock] at Jedburgh."

"That would be fine fun," said Patsy, smiling wanly at the idea of him being able to help his big brother and nurse in anything.

"Will it no? and father will dance a fling on the tap o' the house, and take a smoke frac the lum."

The withered frame shook with laughter at this conceit, and the child murmured again—

Bonnie Boolie

"Come awa' down to the burn, and you'll catch a lot o' minnows," said Willie blithely, as if he were speaking to a companion as active as himself.

He carried the child down to the burn, always maintaining the fiction that Patsy was going along without being carried; and then he caught minnows, and pretended that it was all Patsy's doing. The child quite understood the farce, and loved Boolie all the more, clinging to him as he had never clung to mother or father.

Teenie was very weak, and she wept, listening to the children's talk. The tears did her good. Mrs. Broadfoot went on with her work apparently unmoved, but her eyes brightened when she was shyly asked if she could change half-a-crown. She placed two shillings and a sixpence in Teenie's hand without a word; but she tried the coin with her teeth suspiciously.

Teenie went down to the burn where the children were playing, and gave Willie a shilling. He was amazed at this wealth—he had never before possessed so much all at once.

"I can do what I like with it?"

"Yes."

"What would you like, Patsy—tarts or sweeties?"

She took the helpless child in her arms, and fondled him tenderly; somehow, love had cleansed the poor thing of dirt, and made his rags appear as good as purple and fine linen.

"I'll keep the shilling," said Willie gravely, "as a luckpenny, and to mind me o' you—it maun be a lucky penny when you're that guid."

She kissed them both, and said good-bye. Willie hoped she "wouldna catch the fever," and wished that she could bide near them.

She walked briskly enough for a quarter of a mile, but her limbs were feeble, her feet faltered, and she knew that it was impossible to tramp as far as the town that night. Happily she reached a little inn, and there obtained a bed.

In the morning her joints ached still more than yesterday, and there was a severe pain at her heart.

The kindly mistress of the inn insisted that she was too weak to resume her journey, to say nothing of the wickedness of doing so on the Sabbath day.

A day and a night of physical torture that would have been unbearable but for the unutterable agony of her mind.

Monday morning she started. She tried to eat the breakfast provided for her, but could not. She offered the landlady a ring, one of Walter's gifts, in payment of her debt; but the good woman refused it, saying that she would trust her, and only asked for her name and address. After some hesitation she complied—it never occurred to her to give a false name—and then she went away.

But the pains of body and mind were very acute. She could not understand herself, the sensations were so strange. She seemed unable to walk. At the corner of the road, beside the wood, she saw a man who was kneeling upon the ground, and bending over a prostrate donkey.

A HOUNSLOW HEATH TRAGEDY.

IN the afternoon of Friday, the 5th of November, 1802, Mr. John Cole Steele, a lavender distiller, left his shop, No. 15, Catherine Street, Strand, to go down to Feltham, a village on the borders of Hounslow Heath, to visit his lavender nursery. He had on a light drab great-coat, a striped waistcoat, half-boots, and a round hat. Mr. Steele left Feltham the next day for London about seven o'clock, with only twenty-seven shillings in his pocket.

At eight o'clock the driver of the Gosport coach, passing over the heath, heard a man shriek and groan twice between the trees and the eleventh milestone. The passengers said to each other that there was a robbery taking place, but that it was dangerous to stop. It was a moonlight night, but the moon was shrouded at the time, and the driver lashed his horses faster across the ill-omened heath.

Mr. Steele not returning on Monday to Catherine Street, his brother-in-law, Mr. Meyer, became alarmed, and went down to Feltham to inquire if he was unwell. To his horror, he found Mr. Steele had left there on the Saturday evening. Mr. Meyer instantly went to the barracks, and procured a party of soldiers to search the common. They very soon found Mr. Steele's great-coat in a gravel-pit, in the water, and covered with flags and rushes. The pit was fifteen yards from the road, on the left hand as you go from Hounslow to Staines. The body of the murdered man was soon after found on the other side of the road, about two hundred yards from the path, and six hundred yards from the barracks. It was in a ditch near a clump of trees, with the bank pulled down upon it to hide it. It was lying on its back, the flap of the coat over its face. There was a leather strap round the neck, with a knife run through one end of it. The face was smeared with blood and dirt, and the death-blow had been at the back of the head. There was no hat, and there were no shoes; but not far off, on the south side, were found two old shoes and an old soldier's hat bound with ragged worsted, and a heavy blackthorn bludgeon stained with blood. There was a trail near the trees, as if a body had been dragged there from the south side.

The murderers remained concealed for several years, but about the end of 1806 the Worship Street magistrate received information that a man named Hanfield, then at Portsmouth under sentence of transportation, and on his way to Langston Harbour, had given hints of a wish to confess the murder of Mr. Steele, in which he had been a sharer. Hanfield—first a post-boy, then a hackney-coachman, and lastly a thief—had been sentenced to seven years' transportation for stealing a pair of shoes. On his way up from Portsmouth he pointed out to Vickery, the officer, the spot of the murder, with great exactness.

The informer is generally the worst man in the gang—the abettor, and often the proposer of the crime. The rascal's story was this:—In November, 1802, two thieves, named Haggarty and Holloway, met him at the Turk's Head in Dyot Street, an infamous street between Bloomsbury and St. Giles'. Haggarty was a plasterer, and Holloway a labourer. Holloway called him out, and asked him if he had any objection to be in a good thing—a low toby (a footpad robbery), to sarve a gentleman on Hounslow Heath. He named the Saturday following, and fixed the place of meeting at the Black Horse in Dyot Street. The three villains met on that day about noon, drank together, and then went on to Hyde Park Corner. They next walked on to Turnham Green, had more drink there, and went to the Bell at Hounslow, the last house in the town. Towards five o'clock they walked on the heath, talking about the prospects of booty, till they reached the eleventh milestone towards Bedfont. About dark, they hid in a clump of trees till the moon rose. Then they walked for half an hour, and returned to their shelter. The moon clouded over just as they turned to the left before the eleventh mile-stone. Holloway, who had planned the robbery, told them the man they expected came down to pay his workmen, and would therefore have money on him.

They then, just as the moon hid, came out of the clump of trees; and Holloway, the most anxious, said he thought he heard a footstep, upon which the three scoundrels walked along the road, and saw the dark figure of a man approaching them, on the right-hand side-path of the road from London. Hanfield went up, and ordered him to stop and deliver his money, and Holloway got behind him. Mr. Steele said he would willingly do that, and hoped they would not hurt him. He then gave them twenty-seven shillings, and Owen Haggarty, Holloway, and Hanfield next told him to deliver his pocket-book. He replied he had no book; but Holloway insisted he had, and as he did not produce it, struck him down with his bludgeon. Hanfield then took hold of Mr. Steele's legs, and Holloway stood over him, swearing if he spoke he would knock out his brains. Mr. Steele was strong, and struggled nearly across the road, and kept shouting, "Do not ill-use me." As Haggarty was searching him, there came the sound of wheels—one of the heavy night coaches was approaching. Mr. Steele made another violent effort to rise, and cried out loudly. John Holloway then said, "I'll silence him," and beat Mr. Steele on the head. The latter gave a deep groan, then a second, and his limbs began to stiffen.

"John," said Hanfield, "you've killed the man."

"It's a lie," replied the murderer, "he's only stunned."

Informers are always, according to their own account, horrified at crime; so, if we can credit Hanfield, he instantly replied, "I'll stop no longer, but go on to London, and you can overtake me." He then went on to Hounslow, where he met Holloway and Haggarty again, near the Bell, opposite the road to Bath. He asked them if they had got the book. Holloway replied that as he had not shared the danger, he should not share in the spoil. They returned to town at past twelve o'clock, stopped at the Black Horse in Dyot Street, shared some gin, and separated. The next day, when they met, Holloway had on Mr. Steele's hat, which was too small for him. They met again at Dyot Street on the Monday, and Hanfield remonstrated with him for wearing the hat, which had Mr. Steele's name written inside it. He at last agreed to destroy it, and met him in the same evening, when he resolved to throw it over Westminster Bridge. Hanfield thought it might float, so he filled it with stones, tied the lining over it, and then threw it over the bridge, just opposite Astley's. They then went into a public-house in Bridge Street and drank with some friends. Holloway at the time wore a short smock-frock and a flannel waistcoat under it. Haggarty wore a velvet jacket, swan's-down waistcoat, and velvet breeches.

Holloway, on being apprehended, declared he was innocent, and said, "Oh, dear! I know nothing about it. I will down on my knees to you and the justice if you will let me go." Haggarty, who had joined the Marines, was taken on board the Shannon frigate in the Downs off Deal. He was very ill when apprehended, and the officers feared he would not live to come to London. When he was taken before the port admiral and asked where he was four years ago, his countenance altered, and he would have fallen, had not Vickery, the officer, given him some water and let him sit down.

The more Hanfield's character was examined, the blacker it appeared. Though only twenty-six years old, he had deserted from six regiments. He had, as a soldier, been lodged in the Hounslow Barracks, and therefore knew the scene of the murder well. He had also as a post-boy, hackney-coachman, and guard to a stage, traversed the road often; and in the five years which had elapsed since the murder, heard a thousand times the details of it. At the Coldbath Fields Prison, and at the Middlesex House of Correction, he had said that he alone murdered Mr. Steele, and that Holloway and Haggarty were innocent. He told one man that the hulks was such a dreadful, shocking place, that rather than be seven years there, he would hang as many men as were killed at the battle of Copenhagen. But the counsel for the defence made no point of these conversations.

Holloway and Haggarty were tried for the murder at the Old Bailey, before Sir Simon le Blanc, on the 20th of February, 1807. The evidence proved that the bludgeon had been cut from a birch-tree on the heath. The evidence proving the prisoners to have ever been together in 1802 was very unsatisfactory. Collin M'Daniel, the landlord of the Black Horse in Dyot Street (now George Street), had seen Hanfield and Haggarty together at his house; and William Beale, landlord of the Turk's Head, had also seen these two drinking in the same tap-room, but not with Holloway. Isaac Clayton, the beadle at Hounslow, swore he had seen the man at Hounslow, but the only reason he remembered it was that Holloway had been driving a turnip-wagon, and was with a wooden-legged man from Buckinghamshire of the same name. Edward Crocker, a Bow Street officer, who knew Dyot Street and all its dens, had seen Haggarty and Hanfield together, but never with Holloway. John Sawyer, the landlord of the Bell at Hounslow, swore he had seen the pair in company for years before, somewhere between Hounslow and Brentford.

Holloway, in his defence, said Hanfield was an entire stranger to him; he had only seen him in the streets. Haggarty said he had never known Holloway till after he entered the Marines, and denied all knowledge of the other. The witnesses called by Holloway to prove that he worked for them in 1802, all proved that he had only worked for them in 1803 and 1804.

The chief evidence relied on by the prosecution was obtained in a most disgraceful and unworthy way. When the prisoners were confined in two adjoining lock-up cells, Bishop, a police officer, hid himself in a closet, and took down every word they said. The prosecution relied chiefly upon these doubtful passages:—

EIGHTH OF DECEMBER.

Holloway.—Owen, are you there? I never heard such a man in my life.

Haggarty.—Did you tell them you knowed me?

Holloway.—I denied it entirely. I told them I was never at Hounslow Heath in my life.

Haggarty.—So did I.

Holloway.—It is two years since I've seen you; where have you been?

Haggarty.—I've been in the West Indies.

TENTH OF DECEMBER.

Holloway.—It is four years ago—when I worked at Watford for Davis and Barber for five months. He is a regular rogue. If I was at Stedman's at the time, we never shut up shop before twelve or one, for it seems to hang a good deal that way.

Haggarty.—Where is it you told them you saw me?

Holloway.—At the top of D₃ Street. You know I must say somewhere thereabouts. There is no proof of anything yet, nor there won't be none. Which way did he say we came over the back fields?

Haggarty.—I don't know.

Holloway.—I never saw such a stick in my life as he has bought. I have got a hat at home now I had in 1802.

TWENTY-SIXTH OF DECEMBER.

Holloway.—Where did he say we had the gin?

Haggarty.—At the Black Horse.

Haggarty.—We must have had the gin there?

Holloway.—They all know you—the traps [police].

Haggarty.—That's being so much about. Did Hanfield say we took the body and buried it anywhere?

Holloway.—He did not say such a word, as I heard.

Haggarty.—It was done in November?

Holloway.—Yes.

Haggarty.—The red-nosed old thief [the Hounslow beadle] said he saw me at Hounslow. They shall never do me in a thousand years. Next Monday it will be either the one thing or the other.

Holloway.—Yes.

Haggarty.—There is none of them can swear they saw us together at the time. If one is done, all is done. There is neither of us will suffer for it.

Holloway.—I laugh always. I don't know whether you do Haggarty.—They're getting very cool upon it, I can see that.

Holloway.—Ain't they?

Haggarty.—Here's luck. I wish you as much harm as I do myself. Why don't you gammon to be ill?

Holloway.—I wouldn't care if I had these irons off.

Haggarty.—He asked me where I worked. I would not tell him I worked at Gardner's, near Bow Street, and he has run away since. I can tell the very day and hour when I worked.

Haggarty was aged twenty-four, Holloway thirty-nine. Both prisoners were found guilty, and sentenced to execution on the Monday following. In the meantime, Mr. Harmer, an acute solicitor in Hatton Garden, took an active interest in the fate of the two men, whom he firmly believed to be innocent. Mr. Harmer discovered that Hanfield had turned informer in Newgate, and begun by telling every one that only three persons in the world knew who murdered Mr. Steele. When he was leaving Newgate to go to the hulks, he proclaimed openly that he should obtain his pardon in three months, and get a handsome legacy. It was also discovered that in 1808 Hanfield had been committed for stealing a hundred and fifty pounds from the house of a Mr. John Royle, in Orange Street, Leicester Square. It was found, however, that he was entirely innocent, and that his confession was only made in order to escape punishment for desertion from the Ninth Lancers. He had told several fellow-prisoners that Haggarty and Holloway were innocent; but that if they had not done this, they had done other things as bad. Self-preservation was the first law of nature, he added, and he should fly to religion, and everything would be forgiven.

In prison, Hanfield was always brutal, ferocious, and blasphemous. The statements of Hanfield's fellow-prisoners were made after the execution, so could not have proceeded from any eagerness to controvert an informer. The evidence was keenly analysed by Mr. Harmer. The discrepancies were palpable, and all tended to prove that Hanfield was either ignorant of the murder, or had committed it himself, aided by accomplices since dead, and who, therefore, could not refute any statement he made to criminate others. In the first place, as Mr. Steele had no regular day for going to Feltham, there could have been no arrangement of the three men to intercept him at a particular hour, on a night when the flax-workers were coming in great numbers from Feltham to Hounslow for their week's shopping. Hanfield also represented the murder to have taken place on the opposite side of the road to that on which the driver of the Gosport coach had heard the groans.

Hanfield appeared quite ignorant that the bludgeon found had been cut on the down, and did not even mention that a birch stick and a great-coat had been stolen from the body. The whole story of the murder seemed improbable. It was not likely that, having joined in the crime, he would leave before sharing in the booty, however small. It was not probable that the accomplices would go boldly together in open day to the heath, and there wait four hours for a man who was not likely to pass that evening. Nor was there any reason for dragging Mr. Steele to and fro across the road, when the best way of avoiding observation was to keep him as far as possible from the road; nor was it possible that a small man like Mr. Steele could have struggled much when beaten down by two powerful men, a third man holding him by the legs. If Hanfield left the men, horrified at the crime, was it likely he would have wasted an hour near the Bell at Hounslow, waiting till two such suspicious persons came up, to discuss the murder in the open road, where the highway to Bath and that to Portsmouth diverged? It was not possible that two men so implicated would have refused to give Hanfield his paltry share of nine shillings, their lives being at his mercy. Nor is Hanfield's subsequent story the least trustworthy. Haggarty would never have gone in Mr. Steele's half-boots, and Holloway in an expensive hat, to drink at an unusual hour at a public-house in Saint Giles', at which they were both well known. On the Monday he represents them as talking in open day about the stolen hat, and then boldly carrying a bundle, without fear of the police officers, to Westminster Bridge. Why should Hanfield, who had not benefited by the murder, feel such interest in Holloway's safety? Why, too, when every moment was pregnant with danger, go opposite Astley's to fill the hat with stones, and then re-cross to the Westminster side to throw it in? Hanfield says he never had any further conversation about the murder, though he saw Holloway and Haggarty frequently. Neither the fifty-pound reward at Bow Street, nor the discovery of the body, nor the pursuit or apprehension of various suspected persons, seems to have drawn from Hanfield any questions.

The conversations so unfairly taken down bear little on the case. The one suspicious question is, "We must have had the gin there?" (at the Black Horse); but the suspiciousness of the question turns on the one word the, and the officer who reported it owns he missed it altogether. Moreover, in the same conversation the men both denied a knowledge of Hounslow, and mentioned where they were working the very November of the murder.

The two men conducted themselves very well after their conviction. They were decent and respectful, and frequently called God to witness their innocence; and whenever Haggarty mentioned the sacred name, he took off his hat in token of reverence. The last night they spent in almost ceaseless devotion, Haggarty with his confessor, and Holloway with a gentleman from the Reverend Rowland Hill's chapel. Holloway slept soundly for three hours, and each time that he awoke resumed his devotions. Not a sigh or groan escaped him in his sleep, but while in prayer the hot tears ran down his cheeks. He then grew serene and composed, and smiled calmly. He said he felt comfortable because he was innocent. "I am innocent," he added, "and those who are within sound of my voice will hear me declare my innocence in my last moments." Holloway then pressed the hands of a friend between his own, and repeated, "I am innocent! I am innocent!"

Haggarty, too, joined fervently in the devotions, but steadily declared he should assert his innocence to the last. After some inward struggle, he said, "I forgive Hanfield from my heart;" and he said he could not die better than to die innocent of the crime with which he was charged. Mr. Harmer, his kind solicitor, then wrote a letter for him to his mother, in which he asserted his innocence. About five o'clock a letter was put through the grating into the cell, telling him to continue his devotions, as there was no expectation of a respite.

When Holloway was brought into the press-yard to have his fetters struck off, he bowed slowly and reverently to the Lord Mayor, the noblemen and sheriffs present. He then stood erect in the centre, and said in a firm voice—

"Gentlemen, I die innocent. I know nothing of this here affair that I am going to suffer for." He dropped on his knees, and with clasped hands said, "I am innocent, by God!" He then arose, and walked with composure to the scaffold.

Holloway several times told the spectators he was innocent, and in an emphatic manner called God to witness the truth of his assertion.

Haggarty too said, "And I also am innocent."

The last question asked him was, whether he was guilty; but he readily and solemnly again asserted his innocence.

About seven o'clock on the morning of the execution, a vast crowd thronged every avenue of the Old Bailey, and the mob increased to thirty thousand people by eight o'clock. About that time the two men appeared on the scaffold. The anxiety of the people to hear whether Holloway and Haggarty would confess their guilt was so great, that the crush then grew tremendous; those at a distance surging forward in turbulent waves, to get nearer the gallows. There were cries of murder, and many women fainted. At that moment, a cart opposite to Mr. Haley's wine vaults, being overloaded with spectators, broke down, and some of these persons were instantly trampled to death. A few yards from this—facing Mr. Henzal's, a tallow-chandler, at No. 16—a pic-man, jostled by the crowd, dropped his basket, and in stooping to pick up his pies, was trodden to death. Several persons near him also perished at this spot. About ten yards from Mr. Henzal's, there were three heaps of people trying in vain to rise, and over them the surging mob pushed backwards and forwards, unable to pass at the top of the Old Bailey, where thick clusters of carts and carriages had entirely blocked the street. Nothing was to be heard but screams of the dying and wounded, and agonising shrieks of "Murder, murder!" One poor woman was trampled to death, and the child in her arms rescued by some kind people at the window of a first-floor, who let down a rope with a noose, which a person standing by slipped round the child's body. An hour after, when the scaffold was removed, the marshals and constables cleared the streets. There were twenty-seven people lying dead, and forty or fifty wounded. A cart-load of shoes, hats, and garments was picked up round Newgate. Until four o'clock the friends of the dead and wounded were busy removing them from the neighbouring houses on shutters and in hackney coaches. A mother was seen carrying away the body of her dead child. There were several apprentices and school-boys among those who perished in this horrible catastrophe. A sailor-boy, with a small bag of bread and cheese slung round him, was found near the Old Bailey Yard. Among the dead there was a gentleman who lived at Holloway, a young American apprentice from Broadwood's, the piano-forte makers in Golden Square, a hairdresser's son, a boy from a school at Islington, a tailor's son, a young stone-mason. Four dead bodies were placed in the porch of Saint Sepulchre's Church, twenty-seven others were arranged in rows in the Elizabeth Ward of Saint Bartholomew's Hospital. The bodies were covered with sheets, and the faces alone left uncovered. The public were then admitted to identify and claim their husbands, wives, sons, and daughters.

Haggarty and Holloway were hung in chains at Hounslow Heath, near the scene of the murder.

MY MISFORTUNE.

"RETURNING LOADED WITH CORNFLOWERS."

THEY'RE the best in the island. I wouldn't let my own brother have a setting of them under a guinea, and I wouldn't let a stranger have one at any price."

Pointing with his stick to a fine brood of pure

Aylesbury ducks, large and white, with bills as yellow as butter, thus spake Farmer Honeyfield, a jovial, hospitable Isle of Wight yecoman. Honeyfield was his name, and his abode was Honeyfield Farm, a comfortable retreat, which any one who in making the tour of the "Garden Isle" has penetrated to Newport, the chief town in the centre, and gone from thence to the Back, will—if he chanced to take the right road—remember to have passed. Surrounded with walnut-trees, it lies at the foot of one of those short, steep descents, locally called "shoots," so common to this part of the island; and while the lands attached to it stretch up to the very summit of the bare, bleak downs, which shut it in almost on every side, the homestead itself is as snug and cozy as if it were a hundred miles inland, and seems quite unconscious of the always rough sea only a short hour's walk away.

It was in front of a big pond in the yard of the said farm, that the above words were addressed by Farmer Honeyfield to me, Bartholomew Laing, draughtsman and mapper to a London firm of land agents, by whom I had been sent down to take a map of the property (which happened to be in the market), and prepare one of those glowing but, I hope, always truthful descriptions often to be seen in the advertising columns of our newspapers. Standing a little apart, but within hearing of the remark, at the time, was my factotum and assistant-surveyor, Cowser Bill, who, as one of the leading characters, if not indeed the hero of this story, deserves a word or two of mention here. A genuine product of the island, native to Cowes, from which fashionable watering-place he derived his name, he was a piebald subject, being part ostler, part waterman, part drover, and whole rapsallion. By means of a greasy felt hat, waterman's serge frock tied in at the waist with a piece of rope, ostler's top-boots, and drover's ash stick, he contrived in an artistic and picturesque sort of way to represent the various elements of his ordinary calling, which was to convey horses, cattle, etc., across the water in the tow-boats attached to the steamers. I had picked him up, for lack of a better man, to help drag my measuring-chain, and had found him on the whole, by reason of several little infirmities, among which was an inordinate thirst for beer, more plague than profit.

We had finished our survey, though, at last. Three days of rather hard work, owing to the heat of the August sun, had brought it to a close; my traps were all packed up, and so far as business was concerned, I had nothing left to do but pay off my factotum, and make the best of my way back to town. But Farmer Honeyfield and I, as we stood in front of the pond, admiring the ducks, had no such immediate intention of parting. A pleasanter prospect was before us. We were dressed, and quite ready for starting on a pleasure trip to the sea-shore, at a certain spot on which was to be a large gathering of Farmer Honeyfield's friends that day. The ladies of the family, however, were not quite ready, and we were waiting for them. What with dressing themselves, and preparing the good things we were to take with us, their hands were full, and had been full, it seemed to me, for a long time. Although my acquaintance with them was only of four days' growth, I had become so much at home under the encouraging influence of the farmer's good old Isle of Wight hospitality, that I at last went in to give them a good-natured routing up. I found them all three—that is to say, Mrs. Honeyfield and her two daughters—busily engaged in packing a hamperful of plates and dishes.

Not at all bad specimens of Isle of Wight production were these two daughters, Jessie and Nellie, aged respectively twenty-two and nineteen; and their society had made my sojourn at Honeyfield Farm a very pleasant one. There was that in them which people imbued with the common notion about farmers' wives and daughters would never have expected, and which even I, who from considerable experience beforehand was able to form a truer estimate of them as a class, had seldom met with. Well educated and good-looking, gentle and refined in manner, and of very great intelligence, they might have passed muster anywhere. Jessie, the elder, was hopelessly entangled with a certain Mr. Tom Browning, an eminent but very swarthy young agriculturist of the neighbourhood, who at first seemed to look rather askance at me, but who, on finding I scrupulously respected the engaged ring his lady-love boldly wore on her finger, became my fast friend and boon companion. Nellie, the youngest, was to all appearance unattached as yet; and to her, therefore, as in duty bound, I gave most of my attention during the intervals of leisure I had whilst at the farm.

After a great deal of exertion, in which I was materially aided by the aforesaid Mr. Tom Browning, who came in opportunely at the moment, and was as eager to be off as myself, the ladies were got out, and mounted in the family four-wheel. The fourth seat in this roomy and comfortable but somewhat lumbering conveyance was allotted to me, Tom Browning and the farmer preferring to ride. A light cart full of provisions was also in readiness to follow us, and there was some talk of putting my factotum, Cowser Bill, in charge of this; but looking at his uncouth appearance, and great thirst for beer, I thought it safest for my own credit that he should remain at the farm, where he was left strictly charged by me, in private, to be on his good behaviour, and the cart was given over to one of the farmer's boys. Everything ready, the procession started, and made its way along some of the narrowest lanes, and up and down some of the steepest "shoots" I ever saw, to the place of rendezvous, Stapler's Chine, where, in and about an old fisherman's cottage, we found the rest of the party. A comfortable lot they were, take them altogether. The elders gave themselves up unreservedly to eating, drinking, and smoking long pipes, while we youngsters did the best we could to amuse ourselves and pass the time away. For myself, I had a sail in the fisherman's boat, several country dances or a lit of green at the back of the cottage, and last of all, a stroll along the beach in the twilight with Nellie Honeyfield. That would have been the pleasantest part of the whole programme but for one thing. I don't know how it was; I had never fallen into the same pit before at any other farm-house I had gone to; but Miss Nellie Honeyfield had somehow proved too much for me. Our four days' acquaintance had brought things to this pitch on my part, that if not desperately in love with her, I was very far gone in that direction. She, on the other hand, although very kind and friendly indeed, had manifested no sentimental symptoms whatever. Had I been her brother, she could not have treated me more kindly, or shown less inclination to talk nonsense. It was a tantalising position for me to be in. Here we were, alone. This was the last occasion on which we should probably be so. I had to be in town next morning, and should have no pretext for ever coming to Honeyfield Farm again. I was dying to open my mind, and yet received no encouragement.

Along the shore and down by one of the valleys we strolled, she darting away from me once and returning loaded with cornflowers. I talked as well as I could upon indifferent subjects until I could talk no more through biting my lips with vexation, as we drew near, and joined the rest of the party. My opportunity was gone, and did not return. She sat behind with Jessie on the road home; and when we arrived there I found Cowser Bill, with our horse harnessed, ready and eager to be off to Newport, where we were to put up, so that I could do no more than take a general leave of them all. Many were the good wishes I received, and invitations to call again if I ever came that way; but this did not by any means content me. True, I pressed Nellie's hand at parting, and she returned it; but they were all a warm-handed race, and when I came to Jessie her pressure was just as cordial, so there was no consolation in that. It was with a heavy heart that I got into the trap and drove out of the gate of Honeyfield Farm, from which pleasant spot I was very loth to part under the circumstances.

My reluctance did not seem to be shared in the least by Cowser Bill, although I am sure he had been as well cared for as myself. He appeared in an unaccountable hurry to get away, which was the stranger to me as he had, in fact, himself always expressed great satisfaction at his quarters, and the treatment he had received at the farm. Now, because I slackened speed for a moment to light up a cigar, he grunted—

"It's terrible late, master. You'd better get along, else we shan't get to Newport to-night."

"Oh, nonsense!" said I, not then being in the best of tempers. "What's the matter with you all at once? I wasn't aware you had any objection to late hours."

"We never ben so late as this afore," he replied, fidgetting about. "They locks the gate, o' the yard at twelve o'clock."

"Let them do it," said I; "it won't make much difference to me."

And under the dreamy influence of the cigar I let the horse jog along at his own pace, and was soon back amongst the corn, walking in fancy with Nellie Honeyfield, and unfolding a tender tale to her willing ear.

Never was a fellow more unfortunate in his love-essays. When on the shore in reality I could make no progress; and now, while seeking some poor consolation by pacing over in "fancy's flight" the same ground again with no obstacles in the way—no coldness on the one hand, or diffidence on the other—that vile earthworm, Cowser Bill, seemed determined to thwart me. He twisted and twirled about on the seat, muttered, and even swore so persistently that, try as I would, I could not ignore him. My kitish romance was constantly taking flight, and though I kept pulling it back by main force, no sooner was it on the perch again, than a fresh twist or another muttered oath sent it off once more. I gave it up at last, and smoked away with a sort of obstinate insensibility, letting the horse go as before, determined at any rate that my tormentor should not get to his journey's end one second the sooner for his importunity. How long we should have gone on in this way if nothing had occurred, I cannot say, for something did occur, startling me out of my insensibility, and almost out of my senses. In spite of Cowser Bill, I had got back to the shore again, when there came, apparently from right under my feet, a noise resembling nothing so much as the cry of a distressed and half-stifled duck—

"Qui-ack! qui-ack! qui-ack!"

"What on earth is that?" cried I, jumping up and reining in the horse.

"Wild ducks, master; wild ducks, sir," replied Cowser Bill hastily and eagerly; "that's a sure sign of a storm. Drive on, master, or else we shall ketch it."

"Nonsense!" said I; "that noise came from under our feet, not over our heads, I tell you."

"They allays flies low afore a storm; and the lower they flies, the wusser the storm. Drive on, master, I tell ye, or else we shall get as wet through as drowned rats."

As if to give emphasis to his entreaty, the noise was repeated—

"Qui-ack! qui-ack! qui-ack!"

"That noise, I repeat," said I, now thoroughly roused, "never came from overhead; it is under our feet somewhere."

"Then if it is, you've a ben an' druv over somebody's ducks, and be a resten on 'em now. Why don't 'ee drive on, I say?"

I drove on, and there was quiet for about twenty or thirty yards, but then the noise came again, though certainly fainter than before.

"There it is again," said I.

"Ay, there 'tis," jeered Cowser Bill, "jist what I told 'ee; it's them wild ducks a-flying about; an' if you don't drive on sharp, as sure as you're a man you'll have a souser."

Not half satisfied with this explanation of the mysterious noise, I drove on, expecting every moment to hear it repeated. It was repeated, and with a variation. This time it was—

"Qui-ack! qui-ack! qui-ack!—pat! pat! pat!"—a noise much resembling the clatter of horses' feet. The "qui-ack" still seemed to come from under us, but the "pat" was undoubtedly some distance behind.

"There!" said I pulling up and making a dead stop; "what do you think of that? Is that the wild ducks?"

"No—not it," said Cowser Bill unhesitatingly; "that's the rain a-coming behind us. Now you'll believe me, I s'pose. You dunno what these Illy Wight storms be."

"If that's Isle of Wight rain," said I, "I certainly am at a loss, for I never heard rain like it before."

"That's what I ses," he replied; "you strangers dunno what rough weather is. Jist lissen a minute, and hear how reg'lar it comes down, and then drive on to shelter, for mussy's sake."

I humoured him so far, turning partly round for the purpose. Strange to say, while the quacking had been from the first, and still continued to be, intermittent, the pat-patting was regular, and seemed drawing nearer and nearer. But the more I listened, the more convinced I became that it was not rain or hail, but neither more nor less than the patter of horses' feet. I said so. Cowser Bill jumped up, turned round, and began growling fearfully.

"Hosses' feet!" said he; "don't tell me 'bout hosses' feet. I tell ye what 'tis, master, I thinks you're gone off a-top. If you don't care about getting wet through, I do, so I shan't stand this no longer."

As I was turning round in surprise at this piece of unaccountable impudence, he snatched the reins out of my hand, caught hold of the whip, and lashed the horse into a gallop, nearly jerking me out of the trap.

"Stop, you rascal!" I cried, making a grasp at the reins as soon as I had recovered myself. "Stop, I say, this instant, you rascal!"

"Qui-ack! qui-ack! qui-ack!—pat! pat! pat!" chimed the mysterious noises in chorus.

"Ay, ay—I'll stop," roared Cowser Bill, pushing me off—"I'll stop when we gets to Newport, but not afore."

The night was very dark, but I could tell we were going up a hill, and therefore desisted for a time from any further effort to regain the reins, hoping the horse would soon get out of breath at the pace we were going, and come to a stand, or at any rate slacken its speed sufficiently to enable me to make another attempt without danger. The top of the hill was gained, however, before I was aware. Then there was a momentary pause, during which I could hear not only the "Qui-ack! qui-ack!—pat! pat!" but the sound of men's voices indistinctly borne on the wind towards us.

"There," said I; "now, man, what do you say about the rain? Don't you hear it's some people on horseback on the road? Give me the reins, and don't make a fool of yourself."

Had I employed the pause in taking the reins away from him, it would have been better for me. So far from becoming reasonable at the, to me, reassuring sound of the voices, he seemed perfectly maddened at it, lashed out at the horse with fury, and in another minute we were going down the hill at a breakneck pace, which seemed to promise certain mishap. All chance of my quietly regaining control of the horse was at an end. I was at an utter loss what to do. I had no mind to sit helplessly there, and allow myself to be driven to destruction; and yet I could not see how to avoid it. To have jumped out in the dark would have been madness; to have pushed out the ruffian beside me (as I had it in my mind to do once or twice) would have been little short of murder, at the pace we were going. Fast as that pace was, the horsemen behind kept up with us—gained upon us. Even in the turmoil of mind I was in, I could hear the clatter of the hoofs and the sound of the voices. They were shouting—I thought there was something familiar in the sound. I listened again. Surely I heard my own name.

"Qui-ack! qui-ack! qui-ack!—pat! pat! pat!—Laing! Laing!"

Yes, it was my name being shouted by Farmer Honeyfield and Tom Browning. The truth flashed on me all at once. It was the farmer's voice I heard calling; it was the farmer's ducks I had heard quacking. That wretched scapegrace, Cowser Bill, had stolen some of them, and had been practising these manœuvres in the hope of deluding me to drive faster, so as to enable him to make away with them before the farmer could overtake us. I hesitated no longer, but, utterly regardless of consequences, made a strong grasp at the reins, notwithstanding that Cowser Bill, perceiving my intent, and no doubt recognising the voices behind, struck at me savagely with the whip. I caught one, but thoughtlessly resting on that in my efforts to gain the other, pulled the horse so much on one side that he swerved violently into the hedge. With a frightful jerk, I was pitched across the road, falling on my shoulder against the opposite bank, and an instant after the trap came over, the edge of the splashboard falling on my leg, and almost, as it seemed to me, cutting it off just above the ankle.

I must have fainted, I suppose, for the first thing I remember after this was opening my eyes to what appeared to me for the moment quite a blaze of light, and seeing a group of people standing round me. There was a policeman keeping guard over Cowser Bill (who appeared not to be hurt in the least), a dark lantern in one hand, and a couple of Farmer Honeyfield's finest Aylesbury ducks in the other; five or six labourers, some with lanterns, some trying to fettle up the trap and harness; and there was Farmer Honeyfield, with Tom Browning, and a doctor. These three latter were having a consultation, and the first words I heard distinctly, came from the doctor, who apparently had just been examining me.

"The shoulder," said he, "is only bruised, but the ankle is badly dislocated. It will be a six weeks' job at the least, and the sooner he is got to bed the better."

Very reassuring words these, for me to hear down in that deep Isle of Wight hollow in the middle of the night. Six weeks lying by, far away from home, involving a world of expense and discomfort. I turned and twisted at the thought till I cried out with pain.

"Hulloa, my boy!—glad to see you come to life again," shouted the farmer; "but keep quiet, and don't flurry yourself. I've sent for a horse and cart and a truss of straw, and we'll soon have you in safe quarters at Honeyfield Farm again."

I protested as earnestly as my feeble state would allow me against this further encroachment on the farmer's hospitality, but to no purpose. He got quite angry at last, and when the cart came, bundled me into it with so little ceremony that the doctor was obliged to remonstrate with him. Finding there was no help for it, I resigned myself to my fate; the policeman marched off with Cowser Bill and the ducks, receiving a charge from the farmer to look well after the latter, whatever he did with the former; the labourers dispersed, except two who piloted the damaged horse and trap back to Honeyfield Farm; and the doctor, Tom Browning, the farmer, and myself, in the cart, slowly wended our way to the same harbour of refuge.

Six weeks of tender nursing I had there, tended variously by Mrs. Honeyfield, Jessie, and Nellie. It was fully a month before I could get out of doors, and then I had to hobble with the aid of two sticks. Still, the time passed not at all heavily, for when I did go forth I always had one or both the girls for company. Oftener and oftener, as time went on, it was Nellie alone. We wandered down the lanes—we mounted at last to the summit of the downs, where we could rest for an hour or two on the heath before returning, and watch the sea and the ships. Under such favouring circumstances, we two young folks could hardly help coming to an understanding, and the upshot of it was that before I went back to business we had, with the hearty consent of the farmer and his wife, fully settled matters between us.

As for Cowser Bill, who by his villainy had unconsciously brought about this pleasant consummation, he pleaded guilty to what he could not deny—stealing the ducks—and was sent to Winchester gaol for three months on the treadmill; though, when fully assured of the prize which had come into my hands through him, I would willingly have begged him off the remainder of his sentence, had it been possible.

OUR STREET-MUSIC.

HERE are some things in this world which possess the power of thrusting their consideration upon us, whether we desire it or not, and not the least among these is that element named at the head of this paper.

Very important is this street-music. In London alone it affects some four millions of people, their tastes and morals. Moreover, it influences us as a nation. A nation's music springs from, and is preserved by, the populace, so that upon the character of the street-music of to-day depends very much what our future style of music, if we are ever to have one, is to be. The supply is enormous, and increases terribly. The fact is, we live, move, and breathe in an atmosphere literally steeped with it. For these reasons, then, and many more besides, it becomes important to know the tendency of it all, and whether our street-music is conducive to a healthy taste; or, on the other hand, whether the atmosphere we exist in is vitiated and corrupted with noises vile and detestable. Before, however, an opinion is expressed upon this point, some readers, and especially those in the country, might like to have our London street music briefly summed up.

To say the least, it has one sterling quality, and that is, it is delightfully varied—so much so, that one is at a loss where to begin its description first. However, the street-organ comes to the rescue. Of all instruments, this is the one most frequently seen and heard. In fact, organ-grinding is the staple of our street-music. Of organs there are many kinds. The writer knows London well, and has seen many. There are the accordion organs, with their keys that move up and down, though turned by a handle; there are the wonderful shrill things—piccolo organs—turned out by Antonio Piccolomini Frères, and other makers, adorned in front with a long row of wooden pipes; great organs drawn by animals—donkeys generally; organs in barrows—the instrument at one end, and babies at the other (sometimes the poor things are on the top of the organ); and organs which play only religious music—the “Old Hundredth,” “Luther’s Hymn,” etc. These are going out, and what remain are tinkling, and very feeble. Then there are dioramic, cosmoramic, and illustrated organs, wherewith both senses of sight and sound can be gratified at once. There are others—organs faint and feeble, and most inhumanly out of tune, accompanied by monkeys; organs with full orchestral accompaniments—that is to say, with every conceivable instrument under the sun, for obligato or full band effects, all under the command of one sturdy Southerner, the music from which must surpass any that came from Nebuchadnezzar’s famous band; organs with bones and whistles obligato; and, lastly, there are the latest arrivals of the organ family, those magnified pianofortes turned by a handle, and which get so horribly out of tune after a little usage. Perhaps there are more kinds, but enough are mentioned to show how great a fact the organ-grinder, his organ and music, has become. Hurdy-gurdies are not so fashionable now as they used to be; nevertheless they have not all gone out. Some are left: big ones with blind old men, and small ones with guinea-pigs and pretty Tyrolse boys.

After “them horgins,” the next great reality is the street-band, of which there are divers kinds and qualities. The best forms go about in sets of from nine to twelve performers. The music they play is highly classical, with an occasional popular polka for the satisfaction and convenience of twenty or thirty girls, who are always to be seen in the rear of these bands as they move from one street to another, and who never mind waiting through two overtures and a “Faust” selection, for the pleasure of a polka up to time. Six p.m. is about their commencing hour, and then they are to be met near the leading West-end thoroughfares, depending upon lookers-on for the “needful.” Towards night they drift into the fashionable locales of Mayfair and the like, and quiet streets echo with strains of the sparkling Offenbach, Auber, and latterly Lecocq, frequently up to midnight. There are no lookerson in Mayfair, and who support the band in this region it is hard to tell. Some one must, or it would never be there night after night. It must be the supporters of the classical music at the day recitals. On this occasion the writer cannot tell where the full German band vanishes to for the small hours, or whether those comical music-stands, with their paraphernalia of strings and weights, are hurried off to a part of our metropolis where there is no night. To all appearances the bandsmen are going to play somewhere else, so unlike finished do they look.

But the German bandsman we know so well is a fair type of his countrymen for hardiness, and could play all the night and look none the worse for it. If he were made of stone, too, he could hardly be more indifferent to a hurricane. The pelting hail and rain never seem to move him. Then, again, he never freezes; and with all the puffing and blowing in July and August, it is not too hot for him. On the whole, he and his comrades accommodate themselves to us, if we do not to them.

There are, however, German bands and German bands. The Vaterland trio or quartett call for mention, motley groups though they be. Their distinguishing features are these:—They are generally youths of from sixteen to twenty-five. Not one masters his instrument; but some day we shall read of an inversion, and the instrument will be found mastering the performer, for that clarinet troubler always seems on the verge of collapsing. What music they play is a mystery; so outrageously out of tune is it, that it becomes unintelligible at long distances; and no sane person would ever stand by long enough to ascertain. These worriers of instruments seldom get into the fashionable streets or squares, where there is a discriminating public; they know other haunts. No fine uniforms with red or green trimmings, and gilt-banded caps, do they don, like the better grade. The only attempt at uniformity is about the neck, which is always encased, air-tight almost, with a huge woollen comforter, some half a dozen coils deep.

There is little doing now in the way of “string” in the streets. The fact is, it does not pay, for our climate is not favourable. A fiddle and harp constitute the largest string band you can see or hear, unless you include the nigger orchestra, with their banjos, guitars, etc. For the miscellaneous: there are “the niggers,” with their bones, whistles, fiddles, banjos, and the like, and very clever they are in their way. The troupe Mr. Punch conducts so prominently is the best of all, both for quantity and quality. There are the cellar-flap artists, generally a frantic cornet and harp, but sometimes stronger in the brass direction; there is Mr. Whistles, who can bring “Il Bacio” out of his coffee-pot; that imitator of Paganini, who is continually damaging or breaking his fiddle-strings and bow, and further diversifying his performance with feats on the clarinet and his own organ; the solitary ophicleide player, clad in long coat, round hat, and enormous spectacles; the man with the glass tubes, who plays "Home, sweet Home" and the "Last Rose of Summer" so pathetically; the bell-performer, upon a long row of real bells, which he manages very cleverly; the individual who plays upon plates of metal with hammers of wood or cork; another with strings in a case, like a zither, acted upon in the same manner with hammers; the blind harmoniumist, in a truck; the three young girls, and a boy who sings soprano very well, while the girls accompany on the weather-beaten pianoforte or harmonium—the best part of this performance is the finish, when the oil lamps are blown out, all made snug, and the instruments go on their way rejoicing—the "Scotch crawlers;" the tall and plaintive-looking "tom-tom" man; the frantic and hooting Laplanders, as they are commonly supposed to be, with their piercing pipes, working upon a horribly monotonous bass; the female cornet-player; and, lastly, the piccolo and harp duet, who with true musicianly feeling select the quiet nooks and corners of the city for their performances—which, by-the-by, are well worth listening to. These men are veritable artists, and the taste and skill with which they play are quite astonishing. Their répertoire is more varied than ever was Joseph's coat. Dibdin's fine songs, old and beautiful ballads, operatic airs, and the popular music of the day, are all given with a degree of precision and artistic fioritura which street-musicians but rarely exhibit.

Here must end our survey of what we possess in the instrumental way. There is another branch—the vocal—which must be referred to.

Of street-music purely vocal there is but little left. The truth is, this form has been driven out of the field by the instrumental. Moreover, the public now want more than the vocal for their money, so little patronage falls to their share. The "We've got no work to do" men do not ply the brisk trade they used to do in the Cotton Famine times. They are dying out, and so are the old blind singers that gave with so much pathos the "Advent Hymn," "Hanover," and "Adeste fideles." But the ballad-mongers are with us still, and flourish wondrously. The taste for this walk of art is as great as ever, and the man and woman who alternately drag out the why and wherefore of the tissue-paper song, concluding as it invariably does with the "Now, they're only one a'penny each, the new and popular," etc., drive a roaring trade in the less respectable neighbourhoods. Another character, alas! far from extinct, is the half-starved and thinly-clad female figure by the public-house door, striving with feeble voice, and songs of other days, maybe songs learnt and sung long before reverses had crossed her path, to move to generosity her reckless audience within.

Others there are: old soldiers and sailors, some minus arms, others with arms but minus legs, who have fought well and bravely for their country, and who deserve more care than this in their last days; some who don as much naval and military uniform as they can scrape together, but who have been mendicants all their lives, and do this for a blind; powerful labourers, with large families and stentorian voices; these, and many others, complete the least inviting feature of our street-music—the purely vocal.

Here then is the street-music of London at the present time, on the beneficial effects of which, whether rightly or wrongly, opinions certainly differ. There are those for it, and those against it: those who saw in the late Mr. Babbage an exact exponent of their feelings, and those also who see in noble lords, who take organ-grinders into their very houses for the purpose of enjoying the music, no other than the ideal of their sentiments. Probably six out of every seven readers of this—and the seventh will sure enough be a servant-maid, or a noble lord who has no scientific or learned calling to pursue will agree that the street-music where-with this foremost city in the world is afflicted, is a detestable and obnoxious nuisance, and not equalled by any other. We live and move in a perfect purgatory of noise, for anything milder than this it cannot be called. All day, and almost all night, the fearful noise ascends and quivers in the atmosphere. To escape from it is impossible, for those whom it affects most, are compelled, more or less, to be in it. Can the musician who plays, practises, and teaches in town, flee from it, and seek refuge in the quiet of the country? Can the clergyman, the doctor, the merchant, the author, the artist, the tradesman—can all these pack up and leave the noise behind them?

Then, again, the sick person who must not be moved, even could such an one afford the change—and, alas! how many thousands are there in this vast and wealthy city, mad with fever and other maladies, that cannot—what shall be done for quietness in such cases as these? What redress is there for the anxious relatives of a fever-stricken one, as he or she turns wildly about in need of perfect quietness, whereas the air is filled with sounds vile and detestable? Maybe the patient needs sleep. Loving friends around are longing for this restorative. At last, all is expectation. The one they love so much seems going off into a nice sleep, when—crash comes the BAND!!!

What remedy is there for the music composer who works so freely in imagination, and in his mind sees whole pages of composition long before they are committed to paper? What shall be done to prevent such an one losing his theme, perhaps for ever, by the combined efforts of two German bands, either at each end of his street, or before and at the back of his house? Where shall the clergyman go to prepare his sermons for the highly educated and very critical congregation he has to meet on Sundays?

Thanks to Mr. Bass, there is the law, which, however, can only be brought into operation after the mischief is done—that is, when the band has started a crashing overture, or the screaming organ has progressed half-way through some touching ballad; besides which, very few know the law regarding street-music, or among the poorer classes that there even is such a thing. Only an Act that would abolish street-music, wholly or partly, can be of any effectual use in ridding us of a set of fellows who possess the happy knack of starting their performances wherever straw is laid down; and until we begin to perceive the pure and ennobling sentiments of the poetry or music of their tunes, we shall continue to hope that some such remedy will be forthcoming to rid us of these “brazen performers on brazen instruments, beaters of drums, grinders of organs, bangers of banjos, clashers of cymbals, worriers of fiddles, and bellowers of ballads.”

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF “ROBIN GRAY,” “FOR LACK OF GOLD,” ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FIFTIETH.

FAILURE.

“BEATTIE, man, Beattie; what are you so thrown for? Can you no speak to me? Do you no mind that it's market-day at Abbotskirk, and if you dinna look sharp, we'll no get there afore nightfall? Fient a ballant will we sell then; and where's our supper to come from?”

He spoke as if he were reasoning with a refractory child; but Beattie never stirred a muscle.

“What's wrang with you, man? You never played me a trick like this afore. Poor sowl, I ken you've had hard work and scrimp fare; but there's a guid time coming now we've got rid of that confounded fortune; so rouse up, and let's be travelling.”

Habbie took off his cap, and drew his sleeve across his brow to wipe off the perspiration. He looked puzzled and distressed; he glanced round him as if seeking relief from the green fields and trees.

He saw Teenie, who was standing near, uncertain whether to make her presence known or to run away. But her heart yearned for the sound of any familiar voice, and so she remained, wondering at Habbie's strange address to the donkey.

“Guid be here, Mistress Burnett, where did you drop from?”

She hesitated; then, awkwardly—

“I am on my way to Aberdeen, to see if there is any news of my father.”

“Eh!—you're a long way off your road, then.”

“I—was walking and—missed the road.”

“Walking!—and where's the minister?”

“At home—I suppose.”

Habbie was quick enough to see that there was something out of joint; but he only scratched his head, and regarded her with a perplexed expression.

She took a seat on a green knoll near him, and began in a weary, abstracted way to pluck handfuls of grass.

“Yon' was awful work the storm made,” he said, watching her curiously.

“What did it do?—was anybody lost?”

“When did you leave hame, that you dinna ken?”

She felt herself caught, but she was indifferent now to everything.

“On Friday night,” she answered carelessly.

“In the name of the Lord, what's wrang with you, mistress? I ken by your looks, and by what you say, that there's trouble of some kind. What is it?”

“Nothing—only I want to—I want to go on,” was the lame answer. Then, as if afraid of herself in asking such a question, and turning her head aside, “When—did you see Mr. Burnett?”

“Saturday morning, working hard to comfort them that were sorrowing through the storm.”

His words recalled vividly the pale anxious face and the loving eyes of Walter, striving earnestly to discharge the duties of his office, however much his own heart might be racked. She had been thinking of him and of Baby constantly; but the presence of one associated even remotely with the old home-life made the memory keener, and the sense of all she had sacrificed the more bitter. If it had been to do again, she did not think she would have strength for it. How the memories of his kindness crowded upon her—the sweet vision of home—its tender anxieties, sweet though troublesome—the cry of Baby—the quiet evenings, which had sometimes seemed to her wicked nature dull—all filled her heart with yearning regrets. Elbows resting on her knees, hands covering her face, her bosom heaved with suppressed sobs.

“Beattie and me gave up the fortune at last,” said Habbie, as if seeking to relieve her by changing the subject of conversation; "and we came away for a daunder through the country. We've been blithe billies, I can tell you, till this morning, when Beattie looked queer as though he wasna weel. We came on right enough until he lay down here; and he'll no speak to me.—Do you no hear me, Beattie?—Lord be guid till us, he canna be dead!"

He had been patting and coaxing his old friend as he might have done to a child in a pet; but Beattie lay so quiet and pulseless that at length the truth blame you; you've been a guid friend and a faithful to me, and the roads and the nights will be dreech and dowie without you. It's that fortune did it; I've seen it wearing you to skin and bone, and breaking your heart as it was doing mine. Poor Beattie; many a weary gate we've wandered together, and some blithe days we've had too; and you were aye guid to me, auld friend; and I wasna ill to you, was I, now? But that's a' bye. I'll never be able to make a song again, and I might just as weel be lying down aside you."

"HE LOOKED PUZZLED AND DISTRESSED."

flashed upon him, and he drew back like one stunned by a blow.

His cry was so piteous that Teenie lifted her head and looked at him. He was sitting in a sort of stupor, glaring at Beattie, trying to cheat himself with the fancy that he still saw signs of life. Teenie's love of animals enabled her to sympathise with Habbie's distress. She went over to Beattie, touched him, and knew that the faithful donkey had forsaken his friend.

"Beattie's dead!" muttered the poet wistfully, and for a little while he repeated the words to himself, as if trying to comprehend them. "Beattie's dead!—Aye, man, and you've gane awa' that way, without ever a word of warning. But I winna

It was the last feather which broke the poet's back. He could whistle at the disappointment regarding the Methven fortune, and thank Heaven that he was released from all anxiety about it; but the loss of his old comrade and helpmate was hard to bear. He patted Beattie's side tenderly, muttering to himself in a dreamy way, "Aye, and Beattie's dead!—poor sowl!"

By-and-by he turned to Teenie, with a feeble effort to grin at the absurdity of his own conduct.

"You'll think I'm crack, Mistress Burnett; and maybe I am; a' folk are crack, more or less, on one subject or another. Beattie was father, mother, brother, and sister to me. Twenty year we've been comrades; there's no a road in the twa counties that we have not travelled together—no a house that did not ken us ; nobody will ken me now. He was getting auld, no doubt, and I did not make allowance for that ; but he's a guid creature, and he'll no set that down against me. He was just a poem on four legs, he was that kind and patient. Many a time he's gar'd me wish that men were donkeys, for syne we'd have honest folk to deal with."

He got up, looking at Beattie still, as if he could not believe that they were separated for ever.

"We must give him decent burial, any way. Will you wait there till I come back?"

Teenie assented, and he hirkled sadly along the road to some cotter-houses about a quarter of a mile distant. The brown and green spotted thatch of the cots was shadowed by the trees ; a tiny burn ran by the doors, the clear water glistening, and making a merry tinkling sound, which the children thought was the patter of fairy feet. He borrowed a spade and returned. Then he dragged Beattie a little way into the wood, and stopped at the foot of a tall fir-tree, on the bole of which the sun was glancing brightly.

"This will do ; the sun will come to him whiles ; and he was that fond of sunshine ! You should have seen him when we were resting, the way he would roll on his back and kick up his heels, and laugh just in sheer joy and gratitude for God's bonnie light. But it's a' bye now."

He began to dig. The earth was soft, owing to the recent heavy rains, and the work went on rapidly. Pausing in his task, and resting on the spade, he looked up at Teenie.

"Do you really think, Mistress Burnett, that there's a place all fire to burn us sinners?"

She was startled by that difficult question, put to her so earnestly.

"I cannot tell ; but I have heard that it is our own conscience which forms the fire."

Habbie reflected—thought of the toothache, rheumatism, and the agonies he had occasionally suffered after a "perfectly happy night." Then, drawing breath as if relieved—

"Oh, conscience?—I think we can thole that."

He resumed his work. Beattie was placed in the hole, and the earth shovelled upon him. Habbie dug up some patches of moss and wild flowers, and planted them on the grave. He cut the name "Beattie" on the bole of the fir-tree, and his task was done.

Teenie was sitting on the trunk of a tree which had been blown down by the storm, the torn roots rising above her, and twisted into fantastic forms. She followed Habbie's movements with a sort of mechanical interest, all the time her mind was full of confused visions of Walter, her father, Baby, the Laird, the home she had left, and the unknown homeless future toward which she was moving.

She wondered why she remained there when she wished to go on—anywhere so that she might lose herself if she could not find her father. She felt so very weak, and those pitiful commonplaces of life—the necessity of food, the want of money—so interfered with the grand sacrifice she desired to make, and turned all her efforts into the most prosaic failures.

She had the most disagreeable of all feelings—that she had been, and was, exceedingly foolish. What noble ends we might achieve if we were not fettered by the unconquerable conditions of nature ! She felt cold, and yet hands and face were burning ; the cheeks seemed aflame, and yet she was white as snow. The desire to go on with the sacrifice she had begun was strong and fierce ; yet when she rose to quit the place, she felt as if she could not stand.

Habbie caught her arm, and supported her.

"You're no fit to go to Aberdeen, mem, your lane. Come back with me to Rowanden."

She struggled against the thought ; but she was incapable of resistance, and he was quietly firm. He led her gently down by the cotter-houses, where he left the spade ; then on to the nearest station, where they had to wait a long time for the train. She shrank and quivered with shame at the idea of going home in this helpless state, with the knowledge that all her grand schemes had been frustrated, that she had inflicted much suffering upon herself, and perhaps upon others, without any result.

She would have run away from Habbie, but he kept close watch ; for although he had left Rowanden before her disappearance had become generally known, he had shrewd suspicions that there was something wrong, and in any case he had no doubt that home was the best place for her in her present state.

She tried several times to explain everything to this simple friend, and seek his help ; but the words stuck in her throat and she could not utter them.

The train came at last, and they were carried to Rowanden. Instinctively Habbie conducted her from the station by the least-frequented path. Weary and footsore she was guided up the hill by the poor poet, whose own heart was heavy enough, and yet he was able to feel for others, and to give kindly service.

The night was darkening as they ascended toward the manse. She hung back often, and he waited patiently. How would Walter receive her ? He would turn her from his door as one unworthy to rest beneath his roof. He must scorn and hate her now ; and she had failed so utterly in what she meant to do that she deserved his scorn.

She stopped, and wished to go on to the Norlan' Head, and obtain shelter from Ailie, who would forgive her anything. But Habbie said, No ; home was the best place, and they were much nearer to the manse than to the Norlan' Head.

Home—home was the word he kept repeating ; and unconsciously it influenced her steps. Yet she trembled with fear at thought of meeting the man she loved ; she shuddered in anticipation of his wrath.

The tramp of a horse's hoofs behind them ! Glancing back, they saw through the dusk a horse-man slowly ascending the hill.

She drew quickly to one side into a gap in the hedge, and dragging Habbie by the sleeve after her, she crouched down ; and Habbie made a pretence of trying to hide too, just to please her, but he was really wishing to be discovered.

The man rode by without seeing them, head bowed on his breast as if in despair, the horse dragging its legs as if utterly worn out.

It was Walter : she knew him. Two steps forward, and she could have touched him. Her heart swelled and throbbed like a wild bird, newly caged, beating itself against the bars of its prison, frenzied with fright and pain. Just to see him again—just to touch him—to kiss his hand—to whisper one imploring word, that might induce him to try to understand her—and then, she thought, it would be so sweet to lie down and rest, and to allow all this fever of mind and body to pass quietly away from her.

But he rode on ; she did not move, and he did not see her. Then she trembled with sobs which supplied no relieving tears.

Another weary day of seeking without result, until man and horse were ready to drop with fatigue. He would have gone on himself until he had dropped, but he was merciful to the horse. The burden of his thought was still the same—"She will come back ; she will come back ;" and so, like a moth to the candle, he hovered about their home, hoping to find there the tidings of the wanderer which all his journeys failed to obtain.

He dismounted at the gate of the field behind the manse, took off the saddle and bridle, and turned the horse into the meadow.

Ailie met him as he entered the house. She saw that he had no news, and did not speak. She relieved him of the harness, and as she was doing so, he asked—

"Has there been any message for me?"

"Never a word."

"My father has not been here?"

"No."

He passed into his room.

Habbie waited for his companion to speak, but he had to break the silence himself. Touching her arm, he said—

"Did you see yon', mistress?"

"I saw—oh, but he looked wae, wae, and I cannot go back!"

"Why no? When he's wae, that's just the time he needs you ; and I'se warrant he's been toiling himself to death seeking you. Come, mem, let's go up to the house. You need rest, and there's nae place like hame, ye ken."

She wished to go—she wished to be near him, and yet she shrank back, dreading his scorn. The poet took her hand. She trembled, but did not draw back. Baby's cry seemed to ring in her ears again. Her heart was bursting with home-longings, and, unresistingly, she was led up the hill to the gate. There she faltered again ; but Habbie opened the gate, and gently drew her in.

Then a kind of fierceness rose within her. She expected to see the door closed in her face ; to encounter pitiless disdain from him ; and the passionate nature asserted itself ; she was ready to be defiant and as scornful as he could be.

But the door stood wide open. So it had remained, by Walter's orders, night and day since her departure. There was a strange silence in the house—the silence which is in a house where some loved one lies dead.

Habbie drew her into the lobby, which was almost dark in the late gloaming. She yielded to him in her angry spirit more readily than she had done in her fear. She felt like one committed to a desperate adventure, and prepared to go on because turning back is impossible.

He glanced into the minister's room—the door of it was also open—and he whispered to her as he thrust her forward—

"He's there."

She saw him standing on the hearth, his arms crossed on the mantelpiece, and his head bowed on them. He heard the whisper, and the rustle of her dress, and turned round.

In the dim light each could just distinguish the form of the other. She was prepared to hear his bitter reproaches, and she stood, trembling, yet like one waiting for an enemy's attack. But he opened his arms, and said, in such a low tender voice—

"I knew you would come home, Teenie. Thank God!"

One big heart-bursting sob, and she would have fallen, but his arms were round her, and she was lying on his breast—new strength, new life thrilling through her veins in the knowledge of his love. Yet the new strength made her shame the greater ; scorn she could have met with scorn, but love humbled her. She could not look at him ; she could not speak to him ; all was so different from what she had anticipated, that she could only cling to him, hiding her face, and sobbing in the ecstasy of relief and shame. There are certain still moments which are pervaded by a sense of eternity, and love made this one of them to husband and wife. Their union was more perfect at this moment than it had ever been before.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FIRST.
FORGIVEN.

HABBIE retired to the kitchen as soon as he had seen Teenie safely into the room, and heard Walter's welcome to her. He found Ailie knitting in a vicious way, as if to keep herself from thinking, and Lizzie putting things to rights for the night. On his appearance, Ailie's first thought was to ask him if he had seen anything of the runaway. She thought of nothing else, indeed, except to lament her age and inability to trudge through the country in pursuit of Teenie. But here was the very man who was most likely to find her, if anybody could.

"If you'll give me something to eat, and promise that you'll no stir a foot from here till the minister comes, I'll tell you a' that you want to ken," he said, grinning to himself.

Ailie supplied him hastily with scones, cheese, and milk; and whilst he ate and drank he supplied her with all sorts of information except that which she desired most to have. When at last he told her, she would have rushed off to satisfy herself that he had spoken truth; but he held her back, and begged her to leave the minister and the guid-wife to themselves for a little while. Ailie was convinced of his truth, and although she was full of anxiety to see her bairn again, she discreetly sat down, and resumed her knitting-needles. But the "wyving" process went on in a jerky, impatient fashion, and her only relief was to explain to Habbie, so far as she understood them, the details of Teenie's disappearance. Habbie narrated, with some embellishments, how he had met "the mistress," and how she looked so sickly that he had persuaded her to come home. Lizzie, wiping up dishes, listened with mouth wide open, and had to be frequently called to attention to her work by Ailie.

So the two were left uninterrupted.

They remained a long time without a word passing between them—he too happy to utter a word, she too full of joy and remorse to speak. He asked her no questions—he treated her as if she had been rescued from some great sickness or peril, and he was too glad to find her safe, to think of scolding her for having wilfully thrown herself into danger.

She did not feel irritated with him now for his quiet ways, or for treating her like a child. She was conscious of the love which kept him silent, and grateful for the trust of which all this was the proof.

"You are weary," he said by-and-by, "come and rest."

His arm supporting her fondly, they went upstairs. Baby was in his crib, a candle burning by his side, asleep with a bonnie smile on his fresh healthy face.

She dropped on her knees beside the crib, and buried her face in the clothes. Then she fondled the child, timidly fearing to wake him, and feeling that she was unworthy to touch him.

"My bairn, my bonnie bairn," she sobbed, "will you forgive me, as he has done? Oh, but I've missed you, and the thought of you has been like the hand of God leading me home."

Walter stooped and raised her head. He passed his hand across her brow, trying to soothe her.

"My poor wife, you have been much tried. But come, you will rest now, and we shall be very happy again when you have got the better of your fatigue."

"Don't, don't, Wattie—you make me feel wild and ready to run away again. I wish I had never come back—I wish I had never been born."

"Hush!—I have been waiting for you. I knew that you would come back, and I'll try, Teenie, I'll try very hard to make your home a happy one. I shall hide every trouble from you, and show you nothing but the bright side of our life."

"That's just what I don't like. Oh, Wattie, make me part of yourself—tell me your sorrow as well as your joy, and that will content me. But you've tried to hide things from me, and that vexed me; it made me think you could not trust me as—as you trust Grace."

There was no bitterness or jealousy in that cry, only the piteous appeal of one yearning to be helpful, eager to share his pain as well as his joy—the cry of a fond heart craving leave to prove its devotion.

A mist seemed to rise slowly from his vision; he began to understand many things which had been hidden from him till now. He had regarded her too much as a creature of sunshine, and in his anxiety to divert all shadows from her he had inflicted the deepest sorrow.

"I have wronged you, Teenie—forgive me."

At that she stared, wondering if he were angry with her—it was so strange that he should be asking forgiveness from her who so much needed his. He was in sad earnest, and she wondered the more. There was such a buzzing in her head that she found it difficult to recall the past or to realise the present. She was home again—that was all she knew; she was beside him and Baby—that was all she cared for.

Timidly, as if still half afraid of a repulse, she reached up her arms and clasped them round his neck; he, seating himself on a chair, drew her upon his knee, and at that she clung to him as if drowning, and he had come to her rescue. She was ready to cry again for joy.

"You never wronged me, Wattie; you have been always good, and kind, and true—and, oh, I have been that wicked!"

"My darling, we must not speak of these things now; I want you to rest."

But she would not move ; she seemed afraid to unclasp her hands lest this should prove to be only another of the feverish dreams of home which had visited her during that weary aimless journey, and that she would waken and find herself again on the desolate road, friendless.

He saw that she was in a high state of excitement, and endeavoured to soothe her by loving words and caresses, whilst he avoided conversation.

Her eyes were fixed upon his face, eagerly scanning every feature, noting every change of expression ; it seemed to her as if she could never look enough. By-and-by she spoke again, in a low sobbing voice—

"And I blamed you, Wattie—fancy that ! I thought you looked upon me as the cause of all your misfortune, and that drove me wild because I felt it was true."

He tried to interrupt her with a kiss.

"Let me speak ; let me speak," she cried. "I was ready to do anything to serve you. I thought you would be happy if it was not for me, and so I went away, meaning to hide myself, and never come back. But you see I could not do that. I heard our bairn greeting and I heard you crying to me wherever I went ; and so my heart drew me home again, although my wish was to be far away. Are you glad that I am here?"

She put the question with tremulous earnestness, and he drew her closer to his bosom.

"There is nothing more needed for happiness than just to feel you are safe in my arms. We fret and worry over things that are lost, and never take account of the blessings that remain to us, until they too are swept away."

"And you would not like to lose me?" she said, fondling him, and, like a child that has been promised a new toy, she was eager to be told of his love over and over again.

"You know that I would not."

"Yes, I know now," she said, with a long-drawn sigh, for which there was no perceptible reason.

"Then I am going to be very stern with you now" (she looked frightened, and he smiled ; this was so unlike the Teenie who used to tease and defy him) ; "you will find that I have become a great tyrant, and you must obey my slightest nod."

"I'll do everything you bid me," she said very humbly.

"Then I am going down-stairs to get you something to eat and drink, and by the time I return you must be in bed."

"I don't want anything. Don't leave me."

He shook his head, pretending to frown, and she released him.

"Now remember : five minutes, and you are to be in bed."

He went quietly down-stairs.

She pinched her arm, to see if she were awake. She could not yet believe that she was at home, in her own room ; Baby lying sound asleep in his crib beside her ; and Walter unchanged, unless it might be that he was gentler with her than he had been of late. Yet she had been away three days, and he had asked her nothing, he had not scolded her, he had not breathed a word of blame, he had scarcely even alluded to her escapade. It was very bewildering to her.

She did not know the fierce struggle with passion through which the man had passed. She could not divine his brave resolve that he would win her back by love, to share in his attempt to reach that ideal life which he had imagined for them both.

Walter entered the kitchen so quietly that he startled two of its occupants ; the third, Lizzie, was fast asleep, sitting on a low chair, her ruddy cheek pressed against the black jamb of the fireplace.

He held up his finger, warning Ailie and Habbie to speak low.

"You cannot see her to-night, Ailie," he said in a whisper ; "but you shall in the morning, and then I want you to speak to her as if she had never been away from home. Ask her no questions, and do not let her talk to you of the past three days. Keep Lizzie down-stairs. Now, get me something to take up to her."

"Is she weel enough, sir, think you?"

"I cannot tell yet ; she is greatly excited and fatigued."

"Habbie thought she was kind o' fevered."

"The excitement would do that. Where did you see her, Habbie?"

"She came home with me, sir."

"With you?"

"Aye ;" and he rapidly told how he had met Teenie.

Walter grasped the poet's hand, pressing it gratefully. Kindness is a sort of telegraph ; it brings the most distant social spheres into close communication one with the other.

"I'm thankful to have been able to do anything for you and the mistress, sir. I hope she'll be quite weel in the morning again," said Habbie—adding with a wry face, as if he had experienced the worst spite of fortune—"I care for little now, Beattie's dead."

Walter sympathised with him, and promised that he should have another Beattie.

"That's no possible, sir ; I may get another donkey, but never another Beattie. But I'm obliged to you, sir, all the same."

It was arranged that Habbie should obtain a gig at the inn, and carry the good news of Teenie's return to the Laird, and to Miss Wishart.

Walter took the tray which Ailie had provided, and went up-stairs again.

FISH AND FISHERS.

BY GREVILLE FENNELL.

NECESSITAS non habet legem, which the 'school-boy translated, "Necessity has no legs," is true to a certain extent; but for all that, necessity often finds legs when most needed. We are further told that "Necessity is the mother of invention," of which there can be no dispute, and thus, doubtless, hunger was the primary motive power in originating fishing for a meal.

I am far from inclined to believe that Seth was the first to invent angling; for although the stretching forth a horizontal rod with a perpendicular line may be said to form the characteristic from which we derive the word "angle," the first man who coveted fish may have satisfied his wants, in the absence of all tackle, by diving under water and seizing his prey with his own right hand, at an equally acute degree from his body. In this way I have known men and youths catch large numbers of fish, principally trout and chub, which, like the famed ostrich under apprehended danger, thrust their heads into the gnarled banks of the stream, and in a sense of security permit themselves to be taken.

It is not with the antiquity of angling I would deal, but with the many modes, ancient and modern, which have been used to ensnare fish. The use of the hook and line is, however, traceable back into very remote ages. Angling is mentioned in the eleventh chapter of the book of Numbers, and the salmon thus brought to table were eaten with cucumbers, as at the present day. In Job, Amos, and Habakkuk mention is also made of angling as now pursued; while Bishop Lowth, in his translation of Isaiah, gives the prophetic destruction of Egypt as follows:—

"And the fishes shall mourn and lament;
All those that cast the hook in the river,
And those that spread nets on the surface of the waters shall languish,
And they that work the fine flax shall be confounded,
And they that weave net-work;
And her stores shall be broken up;
Even all that make a gain of pools of fish."

I will dismiss the numberless modes of taking fish by the net, which, by consulting the Rev. Charles Bathurst's "Notes on Nets," will be found to be almost as inexhaustible as the sea in which nets are used. I may, however, mention here the particulars of a circumstance which occurred to me but a short time since. Noticing two men go forth with their bat-folding apparatus, each with a net stretched upon two long and pliable poles—used over the ivied fascias of houses and barns, or by the aid of a lantern, to the light of which the birds disturbed in the trees will fly, and thus get enfolded therein—I followed the men to watch the process. These men, however, after I had tracked them for some distance, turned round upon me, and told me candidly their purpose was not the catching of birds, but that of fish, and that thus, with this simple means, they could, when the seasons were suitable, take by working in concert many bushels of fish, particularly at the mouths of ditches leading into the main river, or at the entrance to sewers, around which the fish congregate in great numbers.

The Egyptians do not appear to have used the float by which the bait in angling is kept in suspension, nor have they manifested their knowledge of fly-fishing, although several winged insects are represented hovering over the water in their paintings. Indeed, Wilkinson tells us, in his "Egypt," that fly-fishing is still unknown by this nation, though the fish of the Nile are occasionally seen to rise at insects on the water's surface.

Their favourite mode of fishing appears to have been with the trident spear, which they used with great skill. The anglers stood on the banks of a canal or river, or in a boat of papyrus, in which they glided silently over the waters, and upon seeing a fish they plunged the instrument, with one or both hands, some using a spear with a line attached to prevent its being lost.

Herodotus tells us how the Lake Mœris was utilised for the purpose of retaining the fish which enter it with the waters of the Nile. The money thus obtained by the fishery was devoted by Mœris as a dowry to the queen, for the purchase of jewels, ointments, and other objects connected with her Majesty's toilet.

Thebes and Beni Hassan abound with representations of gentlemen engaged in fishing for their amusement. In some remains from Nimroud there is a distinct representation of an angler, with his rod in his hand, fish by his side, and a fish-basket on his shoulder, exactly of the same construction as rods and baskets are now made in Britain. And in the Nineveh Marbles, in the British Museum, there are several representations of fishermen with baskets.

It would seem from Homer's "Iliad" that ground-bait as a lure was cast into the waters, to attract the fish within reach of the spear:—

"As from some rock that overhangs the flood
The silent fisher casts the insidious food;
With fraudulent care he waits his finny prize,
And sudden lifts it quivering to the skies."

Oppian, in the third book on "The Nature of Fishes and Fishing of the Ancients," says—

"By those who curious have their art defined,
Four sorts of fishers are distinct assigned.
The first in hooks delight ; here some prepare
The angler's taper length, and twisted hair ;
Others the tougher threads of flax entwine,
But firmer hands sustain the sturdy line ;
A third prevails by more compendious ways ;
While num'rous hooks one common line displays."

Some have been bold enough to say that the last line refers to the tackle used in "spinning," but it clearly alludes to the common "trot" of the fisherman, which, baited at intervals of a few feet, is left at low water to be submerged by the tide, and taken up upon the flood receding, to remove the fish thus captured, and re-bait the hooks.

There is a chapter in Ælian which obviously points to fly-fishing for grayling. It is entitled, "On an Unusual Mode of Fishing practised in Macedonia," a clever dissertation upon which is to be found in Frazer's Magazine for October, 1853.

The Romans used the hook as well as the net ; and Suetonius tells how the Emperor Nero was accustomed to fish with a net of gold and purple. Whether he caught more or less fish than others with such superb tackle, historians do not say. Perhaps, as there is no royal road to the art of angling, this exquisite paraphernalia was as useless as the expensively mounted rods, and hair from Barbary horses, which, with other extravagances, adorned the Fishing Temple at Virginia Water during the reign of our fourth George.

Plutarch mentions corks and leaden weights as additions to the nets.

Julius Pollux, in speaking of fishermen, divides them into the following orders :—"Anglers ; fishermen, by nets and fire (that is, a torch at the end of a pole for night-fishing with spear) ; divers for sponges, or the purple fish ; and catchers of wild fowl. The fishing-rods were slender, lest they should shade the water too much ; the line was made of the fewest possible knots, and the hair of horses, most especially of stallions. The whitest hair was recommended, to render the line less perceptible, and to be placed next the hook ; and above that was a small hollow piece of horn, which the fish was obliged to swallow before it could touch the bait, and which prevented it from closing its mouth so as to bite the line asunder ; and there were likewise round and straight hooks, according to the different kinds of fish."

The catalogue of boat requirements, etc., which I have omitted, and to which are added explanations from known practices, is confirmed by Plutarch and others, and proves that few or no additions have been made to this branch of the art of fishing in the present day.

In Norway, in the province of Christiansand, among some craggy and steep mountains, is a very remarkable and extremely dangerous salmon fishery on the river Mendel, near the bridge of Bieland, which is built on beams that project over the river. Not far from this bridge, towards the north, close to a farmhouse called Foss, the river precipitates itself from an overhanging crag, and forms a very large cataract. The fishermen venture beneath the arch of this fall, floating in wicker baskets fastened to a beam, to prevent their being swallowed up in the abyss. If this beam were to break, the fishermen would be lost, and if they fall among the rocks, which frequently happens, they are drawn out scarcely alive below the cataract. But if the beam remain firm, they float upon their flat baskets, quite under the arched rock, the hollows of which the salmon inhabit. They drive them out to the number of twenty, or upwards, and when they appear at the aperture, they are there caught.

I take the following from a French work :—

"At some distance above Sermiselle, where the silence and solitude of the country still reign, a very curious mode of fishing is adopted during the burning heat of the summer months. About mid-day, when the sun in all its power shoots the golden rays perpendicularly on the waters, illuminating every hole even in the profoundest depths, the large fish leave them, and ascending to the surface, remain under the cool shade of the trees, watching for whatever tit-bit of delicacy the stream may bring with it, while others prefer a quiet saunter, or with the dorsal fin above the water, lie so still and stationary near some lily or other aquatic plant, that they seem perfectly asleep. The enthusiastic sportsman, who fears neither storms nor a coup de soleil, makes his appearance about this time, without, it is true, either fishing-rod, lines, worms, flies, or bait of any description, but having under his left arm a double-barrelled gun, in his right a large cabbage, and at his heels a clever poodle. The fisherman, or the huntsman, I scarcely know which to call him, now duly reconnoitres the river, fixes upon some tree, the larger and lower branches of which spread over it, ascends with his gun and his cabbage, and having taken up an equestrian position upon one of the projecting arms, examines the surface of the deep stream below him. He has not been long on his perch when he perceives a stately pike paddling up the river ; a leaf is instantly broken off the cabbage, and when the Brachiostegus has approached sufficiently near, is thrown into the water. Frightened, the voracious fish at once disappears, but shortly after rises, and, grateful to the unknown and kind friend who has sent him this admirable parasol, he goes towards it, and after pushing it about for a few seconds with his nose, finally places himself comfortably under its protecting shade. The sportsman, watching the animated gyrations of his cabbage-leaf, immediately fires, when the poodle, whose sagacity is quite equal to that of his master, plunges into the water, and if the fish is either dead or severely wounded, fails not to bring out with him the scaly morsel. Thus, so long as the heavens are bright and blue, the water is warm, the large fish choose to promenade in the sun, and the sportsman's powers of climbing hold on, the sport continues. Sometimes the poodle and the fish have a very sharp struggle, and then the fun is great indeed, unless by chance the sportsman should unfortunately miss his hold, in the midst of his laughter, and drop head foremost into the water with his cabbage and his double-barrel—in which case, I beg emphatically to add, it would serve him right.

We have read about many absurd phases of a foreigner's notions of sport, but this is most ridiculous, and manifestly untrue, although told by one of themselves. Why should the sportsman be burdened with a cabbage, when the noble and expansive leaves of the dock are to be had at the margin of every river for the plucking? Why cast a leaf in at all, and why not have fired at the pike when first seen basking in the sun? Surely then he would have had a better chance for his butchery than when his quarry was covered with a leaf! And why shoot the pike at all at such a season, when perfectly useless as food? and if by the alchemy of French cookery we allow it could be converted into an entrée, why send half the carcase into wasteful shivercens by the discharge of a double-barrel gun?

The following is more to the purpose, if the perpendicular style of killing fish is to be observed.

"The water," writes Mr. Brookes, "was very clear at Hammerfest, in Lapland; you may see everything that goes on amongst the fish. A few feet down you may see the young cod snapping at your hook, if you have one; a little lower down, the coal-fish, and the huge plaice and halibut, on the white sand at the bottom; in other places, the star-fish, as large as a plate, and purple and green shell-fish of all sizes. The plaice is taken in the following manner:—In calm weather the fisherman takes a strong fine cord, to which he has fastened a heavy spear-head, like a whale harpoon. This he holds ready over the bow of the boat, while another person paddles it forward slowly. When the fish is seen at the bottom, the boat is stopped, and the harpoon is suddenly dropped upon him, and thus the fish is caught. In two hours the fishermen will get a boat-load. The halibut are caught with hooks. They sometimes weigh five hundred pounds, and if drawn up carelessly will overturn the boat."

In many of the mountainous districts the rivers swarm with trout, the habit of which is to conceal themselves beneath the boulder rocks in the bed of the stream, venturing out to feed only at night. Men, each with a heavy hammer, will enter these waters, and strike one or two blows on the stones, when the fish rush from their lurking-places partly stunned, and are easily caught.

In my edition of "Venationes Ferarum," date 1578, there is a plate of some men and children on a raft, on the four sides of which lanterns are placed, and the fish, attracted by the light, are leaping on the floating platform.

I find from a perusal of "Twelve Years in China," by John Scarth, that the spear is still used in that Oriental dominion:—

"In walking along the banks, we came upon a man fishing in a most peculiar manner. He was perched on a low bridge leading over the stream that joined the canal. At first I thought he had hooked an enormous fish, but on closer inspection found that it was merely a live decoy. Its dorsal fin was laced to two small sticks, one on each side; from these it was tethered to what I first took to be a rod. The poor fish sported about in the water, apparently doing its best to attract the attention of its finny followers. The man held a small arrow-pointed trident, with which he dexterously struck any large fish that came wondering at the antics of the tethered decoy. The whole apparatus was so simple, that I wondered the same system was not applied elsewhere. It would be a splendid thing," adds Mr. Scarth, "without knowing that he is suggesting the most arrant style of poaching which can disgrace our rivers, 'in the clear streams in Scotland, and would give all the pleasure of luxury without the confusion attending torches and night-work.'"

UNTIMELY AUTUMN.

IT sometimes chances, in the midst of June,
That some foreshadowing of October slips
Out of the clouded welkin, and the noon
Of the sweet season suffers dim eclipse.
Birds hush their notes and seek their coverts, fill'd
With prophecies of evil hours in store;
So that, the gladness of the year being chill'd,
For a brief space the summer is no more.

Thus, often, with prefigurement of pain,
Our human summer shrinks before the cold:
The blue heavens die; in the foreboding brain
The grey hairs gleam, and we at once grow old;
While all life's merry voices are struck dumb,
Fearing the autumn of our days to come.

EDMUND OLLIER.

UNDER A TREE.

"I SIT AND SKETCH THE SCENE."

THE sun is riding towards the west
Through rifts of crimsoned sheen,
The leaves like liquid jewels shine

That burnished sky between ;
And deep in clover, ripe and red,
A kingly carpet 'neath me spread,
I sit and sketch the scene.

On every side the forest fern,
 Like copse of fairy trees,
 Its varied fronds of red and brown
 Is waving in the breeze.
 Below, the fields of ruddy corn,
 By reaper's scythe as yet unshorn,
 Slope down like golden seas.

The breakers of their glory swell
 Beneath the western wind ;
 Like crimson flashes, drops of blood,
 Their brows the poppies bind ;
 And sweep in foam of fire to
 The forest belt of dusky hue,
 The purple hills behind.

Close tangling in my loosened hair
 The bindweed clasps and clings ;
 And faint, sweet scents of late-mown hay
 The wandering zephyr brings.
 The butterflies both blue and white
 Sway softly on the rushes light,
 And rest their fairy wings.

"God made the earth. Man made the town."
 They say so. They are right.
 And, looking on His handiwork,
 I bless the sense of sight

Which thrills through every languid vein,
 And wakes the wearied heart again,
 And floods the soul with light.

Not mine to live the woods within,
 And breathe the balmy air ;
 I can but come on distant day
 And see how good and fair
 The green earth grows beneath His hand,
 And all the soft and smiling land
 Doth blossom everywhere.

I come from close-pent city walls,
 From skies of dingy grey,
 From poisoned air to forest scenes,
 And bear those scenes away ;
 And bid the golden corn, the trees,
 The green leaves flickering in the breeze,
 Upon my canvas stay.

God gave His talent in my hand :
 "Take freely—freely give,
 An hundredfold on every side
 Like grain from Boaz' sieve ;
 That those who never yet have seen
 My woods and vales of living green
 May see My hand thy hands between,
 And look on Me and live."

THEO. GIFT.

THE WRECK OF THE "JUNO."

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

THE wreck of this vessel on the coast of Aracan, in 1793, and the extraordinary preservation of fourteen of her company on the wreck for twenty-three days, is well deserving of record, the series of calamities suffered by the seamen on this occasion being unprecedented in naval history.

But the vessel is memorable in addition as being that ship whose fate Byron has immortalised so vividly, but with such heartless bitterness, in that imperishable monument at once of his genius and his shame, "Don Juan;" and it is also interesting to mention that the second officer—William Mackay, the son of a Sutherlandshire minister, to whose account of the wreck we owe great obligations—was an ancestor of Doctor Charles Mackay, the writer of some of the most high-toned and admirable songs in our language.

William Mackay, in May, 1793, left at Rangoon a vessel to which he had belonged, and entered as second mate on board the Juno (Captain Alexander Bremner), and helped to take in a cargo of teak for Madras. The Juno was a ship of four hundred and fifty tons burden, very much out of repair, and in all respects badly provided for sea. Her crew consisted of fifty-three men, chiefly Lascars, or native seamen, with a few Europeans; and there were also on board the captain's wife, her maid (a native young woman), and some Malays to assist to work the ship—in all, seventy-two souls.

They sailed the 29th of May, 1793, and beating out with the young ebb in five to seven fathoms water, with soft mud, about six p.m. shoaled suddenly to less than four fathoms. The ship was immediately ordered about, but the helm was scarcely a-lee when she struck on a mud-bank. All was hove a-back in order to get her off, but without effect. Both the bower-anchors were let go to prevent her driving farther on, and they held her some time, till one of the cables parting, she dragged the other anchor, whereupon they let go the sheet-anchor, which brought them up. It was the last quarter-ebb, and they had no doubt of getting her off on the flood, providing they could prevent her upsetting at low water. They therefore struck top-gallant yards and masts, to relieve her of as much top weight as possible. At low water she heeled so much as to alarm them, but floated off with the flood. They hove up their anchors, standing off under a press of sail into deep water; and as she made no water, they hoped she had not received any material damage. On the 1st of June a gale commenced at S.S.W., with a very high sea; the ship laboured much, and soon sprang a leak. During six days that the gale lasted, it required the utmost exertions of all hands, without distinction, to keep her free, the pump-gear getting frequently out of order by constant hard working. They had, unfortunately, no carpenter on board, and scarcely any carpenter's tools; but they made shift, with the few they had, to repair the pumps as often as it became necessary. They were frequently foiled by the sand-ballast choking them, which obliged the crew to hoist out and clean them, after having to no purpose tried every expedient to prevent them sucking up the sand.

Consultations were held as to whether they should turn the ship's head round for Rangoon; but such a course was full of danger, for the lee shore was a low line of sand—so low as not to be seen more than ten or twelve miles off, and at that distance there were only seven fathoms water. The unanimous outcry was by all means if possible to keep clear of the coast of Pegu. On the 6th the gale abated, and the ship required but one pump to be kept constantly going. Discovering a leak along the stern-post between wind and water, they let down the jolly-boat the first calm day, and nailed over the gaping plank some turred canvas and oakum, covering the whole with sheet-lead.

This expedient answered admirably in good weather, and the ship required pumping only once in every watch. The Juno's people, delighted at this, congratulated each other on their deliverance, and proceeded cheerfully on their way to have the full force of the south-west monsoon in the Bay of Bengal. Infatuated men, blinded by hope! How could canvas and sheet-lead keep out the sea when a cranky vessel like the Juno began to labour? The pump-gear was hardly repaired, when a fresh south-west gale sprang up. The ship let in more water than before, the pumps choked worse than ever with the sand, and it became necessary for some to bale with buckets, and to toil day and night, while the others who understood the use of carpenter's tools repaired the gear. Mackay, who writes with delightful frankness and simplicity, says:—

"Towards the 16th, exhausted with fatigue and want of rest, we began to entertain serious apprehensions for our safety. We therefore determined to set all the sail we could carry, and keep her away, so as to fetch the nearest part of the coast of Coromandel, proposing afterwards to coast it along to Madras, or bear up for Bengal, as our situation should permit. We accordingly set the close-reefed top-sails and courses, and bore up; but the pump requiring such constant labour, it was not in our power to pay the necessary attention to the sails, so that before the 18th they were all blown away from the yards except the foresail, with which we lay to till the 20th at noon, being in latitude $17^{\circ} 10' N.$, and (by reckoning) about $9^{\circ} W.$ of Cape Negrais."

The miserable vessel now began to pitch so deep and heavy—the wet sand forcing in her timbers—that it was feared every heave she would never lift again. The men were all but hopeless, and could be with difficulty kept to their stations. About noon the captain wore, hauled up the foresail, and kept before the wind under bare poles, uniting in a general effort at the pumps and buckets, in hope to clear her, but in vain. The men who were below coming up at eight with the news that the water reached the lower deck, the Lascars gave themselves up to utter despair. The people were now clamorous for getting out the boats; but they had only an old jolly-boat and six-oared pinnace, both shattered and leaky.

To lighten the ship, and keep her afloat if possible till morning, about nine they cut down the mast; but the wreck unfortunately falling on board, the man at the helm, in the confusion, let the ship broach to, and the sea made a clean breach over her. At this crisis, the captain's wife rushing up the hatchway, Mr. Wade, the chief mate, and Mackay helped her to the quarter-deck rail, and were lashing her to the mizen-rigging, when the ship came to her last bearings, and began, with a quivering jerk like a death-struggle, to settle down. The water, however, still only just covered the upper deck, and as the doomed ship settled lower every wave, the survivors struggled up higher into the rigging. Captain Bremner, his wife, Wade, and Mackay got into the mizen-top; all the rest but one man, who gained the fore-top, were clinging to the mizen-rigging. Mrs. Bremner complaining of cold, Mackay kindly took off his jacket and gave it her, he being better clothed than her husband.

The ship still floating, the men with their clasp-knives cut away the yards, for fear the strain should be too great at the mizen-mast. Although the wreck rolled so furiously that it was difficult to keep hold, many of the worn-out men slept soundly, retaining their hold by instinct, as sleeping birds will do.

Mackay, who had felt quite resigned when death seemed certain, could not sleep when, after two or three hours' reflection, he saw the possibility of some vessel sighting them in the morning. The rest of the night he passed in listening eagerly for a gun. Several times cruel hope deceived him, and he believed he heard one (it was only the throbbing in his ears, or the roar of the storm); and whenever he cried out, "A gun!" others always fancied they heard it too. At first daybreak a man called out, "A sail!" The Mussulmans instantly broke forth in prayer and praises to the Prophet, and the rebuked Englishmen prayed to God also. But the man's eye was as much deceived as Mackay's ears had been. We see and hear what we hope or fear to see and hear. Their hearts then died within them.

"The prospect presented to our view," says Mackay, "on the return of day, was awful beyond description: a tremendous gale of wind, the sea running mountains high, the upper deck and upper parts of the hull going to pieces, and the rigging that supported the mast, to which seventy-two giving way. Every moment threatened to close the horrible scene. The shrieks of the women and the Lascars added to the general horror. Some, worn-out and hopeless, voluntarily yielded to their fate at once; while others, unable to keep their hold, were washed out of the rigging."

The gale continued unceasingly for three days, and now famine began to threaten the shipwrecked people clinging there in their hopeless misery. The men secretly resolved to eat the flesh of the first who should die, and the gunner (a Roman Catholic) asked Mackay if he thought cannibalism a sin. Finding a want of room in the mizen, some of the men tried to swim to the fore-top, and three or four perished in this effort. Mackay now began to feel a sullen indifference possess his mind. He longed for a state of insensibility, and felt angry at the useless lamentations of his fellow-sufferers.

The first three days being cool and cloudy, the men did not suffer so much from actual hunger and thirst, as from the dread of what would come; but on the fourth day the wind abated, the clouds dispersed, and a vertical sun poured down on them with tropical violence. Mackay, thoughtful and intrepid, remembered an expedient of Captain Inglefield's, which he instantly adopted. He kept dipping his flannel waistcoat in the sea, so that his skin might absorb the refreshing moisture, and leave the salt on the surface. This served to occupy his mind, and excite a hope of being saved.

That night Mackay had a deep refreshing sleep, and dreamt of home. He fancied that he was in a raging fever, and that his father, dressed as a bishop, was praying by his bedside. As long as the prayer continued, the fever seemed to subside, but it returned when the prayer ceased. Just as Mackay was putting the sacramental cup to his lips he awoke. The inference he drew from this dream was that his father was dead, and was watching him from heaven. He then reflected on the misery his family would suffer from his loss, and prepared to suffer death with patience and resignation.

On the fifth day, two men died of exhaustion—one suddenly, the other in great agony, violent retchings bringing on strong convulsions. This day the sun was terribly hot, and the sea very smooth.

The captain and chief-mate, having great confidence in rafts, ordered the men to make one from the fore-yard, sprit-sail-yard, and other spars still towed to the wreck. It was finished next day about noon, and the captain, seeing a movement towards it, hurried down with his wife and Mr. Wade.

Mackay, though strongly opposed to the plan, went with the rest. The raft being overcrowded forced the weaker to go back to the wreck. Just as they were getting loose, Mackay asked the captain in what direction the land lay, and what hope he supposed there was of making it, but the captain made no reply. Mackay then in vain tried to persuade the captain to return; no one would listen to him. They paddled away before the wind, with paddles cut out of planks. They had not gone far when they found their number too great. Mackay, joined by Mr. Wade, then renewed their entreaties; and the rest, willing to lighten the load, took them back to the wreck.

The raft again departed, and was out of sight at sunset. For a moment, thoughts of self-destruction passed through Mackay's mind, and he had only joined the raft from a feeling that it could not float more than four-and-twenty hours. But this despondency soon wore off, and he resolved to endure his fate with fortitude and resignation. At daybreak on the 27th, to their astonishment, they saw the raft alongside. They had paddled all night till they were exhausted, and then had drifted at random; and finding themselves at daylight near the wreck, had rejoined their comrades on the mast-head.

Captain Bremner now grew delirious, and this threw his wife into convulsions. At first he had seemed to shun her, as if reproaching himself as the cause of her sufferings, but he now would not let his young wife go from his arms. In his frenzy he thought he saw a table covered with choice meats, and wildly demanded why they would not give him any. Considering salt water as almost poison, Mackay had hitherto abstained from taking any, though tormented by a burning thirst; but he now believed himself dying, and therefore went down and drank about two quarts. To his great surprise this revived both his strength and spirits. He got a sound sleep, and the inward heat abated, though it pained him violently.

MEN WHO FACE DEATH.

THE CURATE.

I may most seem to be presumptuous in me to speak of facing death, as it would certainly be impertinent for me to represent myself as incurring those personal dangers to which so many men are exposed daily. My brother-in-law, for instance—one of the best fellows and, some of us think, one of the cleverest doctors that ever lived—has already said something about his experiences, and of the daily round of his most arduous duty, in performing which he met with my dear sister Bessie, who had for so long been my own helper and faithful house-keeper, that I should have felt something like a selfish pang of mistrust in parting with her to any other man.

As it was, John and I had been friends already—attracted to each other during our so unlike and yet so similar visitation of the sick—and I am of opinion that it was when I first mentioned how Bessie had begun to learn the art of nursing by trying her hand on me, years before, that the doctor found the heart to tell me of a regard which had made them more than comrades—or rather, let me say, had led them to the highest sentiment of all comradeship. For John—who pretends to be the calmest and most matter-of-fact scientist in Europe, and talks about cutting a man's leg off as though he were showing you how to decapitate a boiled shrimp—is the tenderest-hearted fellow going, and couldn't make up his mind to speak to me about Bessie, because he fancied that the expectation of being separated from her would be a great grief to me—or such a grief that I should be unable at first to do more than acknowledge their right to marry, instead of rejoicing with them at the happiness that I could read in both their faces.

It was my good fortune to meet with John in my own district soon after I first came there. Wherever I made my rounds amongst the poor, I heard the parish doctor spoken of in terms widely differing from those mostly employed towards medical men who take up parochial work, and I soon found out that we were both in a similar dilemma with regard to the actual immediate wants of our patients. In his case he found it of little use to administer physic, when he knew the true prescription was roast mutton and potatoes; and I, on my part, was often sorely distressed because I felt how, for the lack of the bread that perisheth, even the Bread of Life could not, as it seemed, be at once received with gladness. I almost think that had it not been for a terrible epidemic, which awoke some of the more wealthy of my congregation to their duties even by means of their fears, we should never have succeeded in organising a really effectual society for the relief of the misery and distress for which the district that I had in charge was so notorious.

To look on death under these conditions is often a hard trial. Even though one may strive to regard the last messenger as the consoler rather than as the destroyer, there is something inexpressibly painful in the contrast between the lingering majesty of his presence, and the sordid surroundings of a bare and miserable room, wherein the living have, as it were, to eat, drink, and sleep in the presence of the still, mysterious object, which lies covered with a borrowed sheet upon the mattress of shavings thrust into an old sack. I often think it is a sense of the incongruity, and of the unfitness of the manner of their daily lives, which causes the reluctance of the poor to send for the clergyman when they are visited by sickness even unto death.

With the doctor it is different. He is supposed to be familiar by his professional experience with all the small makeshifts, the dire necessity, the physical wants, and (though in these they try to deceive him) the vices and evil habits of those to whom he is called. Alas! not among the poor alone, but with all of us, rich and poor, high and low alike, there always seems to be so vast a space between this and "the next" world—so utterly impassable a gulf dividing the bodily need of to-day from the famine of the soul, which is to be put off till to-morrow—that the visit of the clergyman (and I speak of the clergy of all denominations) is too often regarded as the emblem of approaching death. Not till the patient is "given up" do anxious friends whisper of sending for one of us, to stand as it were with only a simulation of humanity on the threshold of both worlds, there to perform some strange rite in which there may be an influence to warrant hope.

It may be the fault of many of us that, from the influences of early education, a certain reserve or shyness of manner, and a reticence in speaking of the common events and the meaner incidents of daily life, we fail to secure that confidence for which we hunger. We are in some way regarded as men provided for, placed above or below the necessity for daily work, and with very little practical sympathy with poverty and toil; while God knows most of us are poor enough, we curates at all events, and not the smallest shift or most painful expedient known to decent destitution, but could be equalled by some of our number who starve and suffer, and almost look death in the face in silence, because to complain aloud would be to disgrace the Church to which we are attached, and perhaps bring reproach upon the profession of that religion which is more than flesh and blood.

It is this reticence—this half-suspicion which refuses to regard us as poor, striving, earnest working men—that eats into the heart of the true minister who seeks to do his duty among the people of large towns and teeming cities. From the false impressions caused by constant reference to the Church as a great institution for State patronage, as well as from the uncanceled impressions derived from satires, caricatures, and narratives, which were published when the Church itself was corrupt, lethargic, degraded, we are still looked upon as drones in the great working hive. The sacred office we have to strive to sustain is denied or misunderstood; hundreds of men who, in entering the Church, knowingly abandon a career in which their ability, their energy, and their education would secure fame and fortune, find themselves twitted with having an eye to the “loaves and fishes,” at the very time when they are thinking despondingly how they are to provide the commonest necessities of life for their families, and yet go decently, on an income far less than that of which a skilled labourer is deemed worthy.

It is this unworthy suspicion—this shadowy mistrust of the men, and perhaps as a consequence the vague apprehension of the living intense reality of the message which they have to deliver—this disbelief in the yearning desire to bring the Divine humanity before the spiritual apprehension, that makes it so hard for us to stand by a death-bed.

I think even those who so misunderstand us know that the mere danger of visiting the sick—of entering rooms where there are contagious diseases, or by bedsides where there is fever or other infection—is held but lightly in the practice of every earnest minister of the Church. Very often such visits have to be made at times when, from actual privation, the lamp of life has burnt low, and depressing anxiety for worldly necessities has obscured the heavenly light. The danger, such as it is, is often as great in a country village as in a town district. The low fever which haunts the stifled, ill-drained cottages, where rustic parishioners assert the rural prejudice against admitting fresh air, is as deadly in its way as some of the worst epidemic diseases which have perpetual hold of neighbourhoods like mine in London. I regard the danger from infection as comparatively little, however. Even if I dreaded it ever so much, I hope that I, and I know that, under similar conditions, hundreds of better men holding curacies, would go on the visitation of the sick all the same.

My brother-in-law, John, is humorous on the subject of the common belief that the doctor can always carry an antidote against contagion—a panacea against disease—in a pill-box in his waist-coat-pocket; and that if he should die, it is a proof of his want of knowledge. I fancy that parishioners have a similar idea with regard to the curate, only they have no definite idea how it is that he is to be preserved. I imagine that they regard him as being in some occult way under supernatural protection, and so far there is much to be thankful for, inasmuch as they do, however dimly, and with some distorted notion of a kind of conjuration, believe in a protecting and overruling Providence. Perhaps I shall be accused of something like superstition in some quarters if I say that I quite agree with their conclusions, not only as regards the clergy, but with respect to everybody who has high and holy duties to discharge, and performs them in a spirit of prayer and self-forgetfulness. May I say that my belief in the efficacy of prayer rests on similar ground?—namely, that of the possible entering into a higher region of life, in which we may be lifted out of certain conditions, and may even become instrumentally operative in bringing about earnestly desired results.

But this is preaching—pray forgive it in a parson. I was speaking of the erroneous estimates which led to what I may almost call the unhumanising of the clergy in the public regard: estimates which falsely persist in regarding them almost as a race apart—not as men, but as sacerdotal apparitions—and as falsely ignore the fact that they are nearly all poor, struggling, hard-working, anxious men—anxious not so much for themselves, let us hope, as for others—for the straightness of the furrow made by the plough, from which they dare not remove their hands—for the harvest, one sheaf of which it may be their highest and most glorious privilege to reap.

At about the time of my ordination, the Archbishop of Canterbury had publicly declared that out of twenty thousand clergymen of England and Wales, not ten thousand were in the receipt of a hundred a year each. I am not saying, nor did the Archbishop say, that there were not revenues of the Church distributed by Ecclesiastical Commission, which were altogether ill-bestowed by adding to the abundance of some few who were already rich; but it is a certain fact that had all the revenues been divided with approximate equality, half the clergy would still have been men so poor as to leave no alternative even to their enemies, but to acknowledge that they must have entered holy orders from quite other motives than the prospect even of a comfortable maintenance. If the pretended believers in universal clerical emolument had followed up the Archbishop's statement by close inquiry, they would have found that of these ten thousand so large a proportion received salaries so very much below a hundred a year, and often so little above fifty, that it would have become a wonder how it was that the whole country did not ring with Parliamentary declamation and indignant remonstrance; as would certainly have been the case if the same facts had been brought to light in reference to any branch of the public service, which were revealed when the Poor Clergy Relief Society published, for the first time, the report of its inquiries for the information of subscribers. It would be, I think, a very useful publication in the interests of truth, and as affording an instructive contrast to those very amusing drawings in humorous publications, which represent the curate as the sleek and favoured habitué of fashionable coteries, if the results of some further inquiry, like that I refer to, could be published and widely distributed. Sharing what I hope will always be the feeling of the clergy, I could not propose that these painful secrets of the poverty of the sons of the Church should be laid bare; but it would be possible, perhaps, to reprint some of the reports of the society referred to in an appendix to an episcopal charge. To read of thankfulness expressed by scholars and gentlemen—once among the best men of their college—for a gift of a few second-hand clothes; to know how men of high attainments, after faithfully fulfilling their duties with unblemished character for many years, venture to ask the society if it can afford them a pair of blankets to cover a dying child, for whom few comforts can be obtained out of sixty pounds a year, on which six people have to live without pleading poverty; to examine the testimony to scores of cases of sickness, suffering, hunger, cold, and want to which delicately-nurtured women, the wives of poor curates, are exposed, would make a story with as keen a touch of real sensation in it as can be found in the latest novel of society.

Even an appeal for aid from the funds of this society had to be made in secret. "To be poor and to seem poor"—we know what that has been pronounced to be. One clergyman, in begging for a few clothes for his six girls, and forwarding a letter from his archdeacon, earnestly asked that his application might not be made known in his own part of the country—"for I am surrounded by rich persons, who look upon poverty as a crime. They know that I am struggling and very poor, but an appeal to public charity would seem like a deep sin in their eyes. I know that a poor clergyman in this neighbourhood, whose child actually died from want of necessary food, was so snubbed and cut for appealing to these rich folk, or rather because a friend appealed for him, that he was obliged to give up his incumbency, and take a curacy near London."

Many even more painful appeals than these were contained in the report to which I refer; and I had good reason to remember the condition of some of those who had been my friends, and for whom I once or twice took duty. It might have been my own sad case, if I had been married—and married I should have been, as becomes the clergy of a Church which professes to be national, and to represent in its ministers the homelike influence and family life of the English people—but I had to look death in the face very early.

To be a fellow and a tutor of my college was my early ambition; but it passed, and I was ordained, even as my own old friend and tutor had been many years before. When I went to see him, he was living—not in such poverty as means squalor (no English gentleman and lady would do that), nor even in actual want of the necessities of life—but, with a wife and five children, every penny had to be rigidly turned to account. I could sympathise with him to some extent, for I was also left with but a small sum of money, barely enough to support me till I gained an appointment, and to pay for a slender outfit for Pessie, who had the offer of a situation as governess. It was madness for me to think of marrying, no doubt, and I don't know that I did think of it except as something afar off—though I knew for whom I would wait until I grew grey, if only it could be that she could love me well enough to, wait also, without my exacting from her such a sad and unreasonable promise. Forty-four pounds a year, and a rise to sixty, with perhaps ninety-five as the reward of long years of work in my country parish, would not, I thought, warrant my marrying then; but promotion might come, or I might set up a school. I was hopeful enough, and doubtless I might have realised all the moderate expectations of my life; but we both had too plain an experience of the constant difficulty of living in the eye of a parish as educated gentleness, with little more than a pauper's dole. In her sweet, pale, thin face, her neat, scanty dress, her carefully-mended gloves, her shapely hands, roughened with a share of household work and nursing a sick younger sister, her low voice and patient smile, I read that it would be ill of me even to bind her to a future promise. Yet I said words which she understood.

It was in the little shrubbery, one soft, silvery, summer's night; and her answer made my heart like lead, even though she put her hands in mine and kissed me. I refused to believe it; but there was a quiet brightening look in her eyes—a serene and heavenly smile upon her face, that convinced me how likely it was that she had spoken what would come to pass.

Yes, I had to face death—and she whom I loved was in heaven. How the daily routine of the quiet country-side, where I held my curacy in a wide and scattered parish, began to fall heavy upon me—how I was prostrated, and my dear sister came to restore me again to the world that I had work to do in yet—how while I lay ill there came the offer of this great London parish, where poverty is no crime, because almost all of us are poor alike, and how in daily duty, and daily helping from on high, the life that I thought blighted has put forth blossoms of hope and cheerful bloom of love to those around me, I thankfully remember, as I sit amidst John's children, of whom one—if it is not wrong to say so—is specially dear to me, though I sometimes look at her little gentle face, and soft pleading eyes, with a kind of fear that is quite unreasonable, no doubt.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SECOND.

AFTER DINNER AT DALMAHOV.

TEENIE had obeyed him; she was in bed; but her eyes were fixed upon the door, eagerly watching for him, and her face brightened at the first sound of his step on the stairs. She ate and drank because he wished her to do so, and because he was sitting beside her, holding the tray, and trying to tempt her by carving tit-bits of a chicken for her. Although the food seemed to sicken her, she took it to please him. At last the tray was removed to the table, and he sat down again beside her. She held his hand in both hers, as if she were afraid that he would leave her, and she kept her eyes upon his face with such fond yearning in them as shines in a lover's face on the eve of a long separation.

She tried to show her happiness and gratitude in smiles, since he objected to her speaking; but the smiles were not successful, they were too full of sad regret. He had spoken no word of reproach; he had given no hint of the vexation he must have endured on account of what she had done. How clear her vision was now! how plainly she saw the many ways in which she might have helped him, and in which she might help him still, please God! She had sought to redeem her error by one great sacrifice, and she had failed in that most ridiculously.

Now she began to see that it is in the trifles of life that help is needed most; in its great crises the nature of man or woman is strung up to hardihood, and is ready to stand or fall, as may be; but in the ordinary frets and cares of daily work, nature craves for sustaining sympathy. She was growing wise betimes: would it be too late?

The love in his eyes reassured her; there was time yet to redeem the past, and she meant to be very submissive. She was determined even to take charge of the Sunday-school, and of the winter charities. She was resolved to listen to his sermons and lectures without falling asleep.

He, too, was thinking of the many things left undone; of the many ways in which he might have given her pleasure; of the many ways in which he must have given her pain, by his unconscious neglect. He, too, was forming grand resolutions for the future.

At length her eyelids drooped, and she seemed to sleep; but by-and-by she awakened up, shuddering, and was only soothed by the pressure of his hand.

"You'll not guess what I've been thinking about," she said.

"I wish you would not think, but go to sleep."

"And you used to wish that I would think," she cried, laughing.

"Yes, but not when you are so tired as you are now."

"But I must tell you—it was awful. I thought the Christina was a wreck, and that my father was drowned; was not that terrible?"

"Yes, but it was only a dream, and you once told me that dreams go by contraries. So we'll see the skipper home safe and merry as ever."

"Aye, but it could not be a dream, for I was not asleep. It just came to me as I was thinking about everything; and then there came one of the verses of that old ballad I used to sing to him, and he liked so much—the verse that says—

"And hey, Annie; and how, Annie;
And Annie, winna you bide?
And aye the louder he cried Annie,
The braider grew the tide.

Was not that queer?"

"Not at all; you have been thinking about your father; you are fatigued, and so dangers and nightmares come to disturb your mind. Now try to sleep."

"Put your arm round me then, and I'll try."

He placed his arm round her neck; she rested her cheek upon it, and with a weary sigh closed her eyes in sleep.

The Laird was delighted by the news of Teenie's safe return to the manse, and he gave Habbie a crown-piece with thorough good-will. He had journeyed far and near in pursuit of her; he had telegraphed to everywhere within a circuit of thirty miles; had fretted himself and exhausted himself in the vain pursuit, and returned that evening late, much tired and ver, hungry. He had often grumbled at the stupidity of detectives in failing to arrest criminals who got the start of them: now that he had tried the detective business on a small scale, he pitied them.

Miss Burnett was methodically manufacturing point-lace from a new pattern; Alice was reading sleepily, and marking every comma with a yawn, when Drysdale entered with the announcement that Habbie Gowk urgently desired to see the Laird.

"Confound the fellow! what does he want at this time of night?" grumbled Dalmahoy, stretching himself. "Did you finish that speech, Alice?"

"I'm in the middle of the reply," she answered, hiding another yawn with the paper.

"TOSsing HIM IN THE AIR"

He had dined; he was dozing in his easy chair in the drawing-room whilst Alice read the Times to him, when Habbie arrived.

Of late Dalmahoy had been paying more than usual attention to public affairs; he was going earnestly into the question of the law of hypothec; he was zealously interested in regard to the repairs of farm-steadings, the erection of labourers' cottages, the abolishment of the bothy system, the drainage of land and the reclaiming of moorland; his interest in these matters became most intense just as he was about to cease to be a proprietor, and when he would have no opportunity of carrying out the grand schemes of amendment which occurred to him.

"Yes, yes, of course: capital speech; very clever; but the reply, so far as it has gone, promises to demolish it utterly."

"Why, it admits everything the speaker said."

"To be sure, child—we are always ready to admit everything we feel confident of being able to knock down. That's why I say it promises to demolish the argument."

He half rose from his chair, intending to see the visitor down-stairs; but he altered his mind, sat down again, and had Habbie brought into the drawing-room. The poet was not at all shy; he bowed to the ladies, and addressed himself to the Laird. As soon as the message was delivered, Dalmahoy jumped up as nimbly as a youth.

"How funny!" exclaimed Miss Burnett, pausing with her needle half through a loop of the lace.

"I'm right glad to hear it," cried the Laird; "it's the blithest news that has come to me this long while; and Beattie shall have the biggest feed he ever had."

"Thank you, sir, thank you kindly, but—Beattie's dead."

"Then you shall feed in his place," cried Dalmahoy, in his excitement forgetting the difference between man and beast.

The ladies smiled; Habbie saw nothing out of place, and gave his thanks quite sincerely. The Laird questioned him, and was still more delighted upon learning the details of the event. When Habbie had retired, he wiped his face with his bandanna, and thanked Heaven that there was one trouble the less to think about, as he resumed his seat.

"I do not see that her return under the escort of Mr. Gowk will at all relieve us of the scandal which her absence has caused," observed Miss Burnett, actuated by a severe sense of propriety.

"Confound the scandal, and the folk who deal in it!" muttered the Laird; "she's home and well, that's enough for us."

"But people will talk, papa, whether you are satisfied or not."

"Let them talk."

"You were not always so indifferent to what people said."

"There's no harm in growing wiser, Nelly, is there?"

"Oh, no, if it be wiser to champion the cause of one who has disgraced the family."

"The family be—just so; the family be happy; it has never done anything for me."

"Oh, papa!"

"Well, yes, I'm wrong: the family has done a great deal for me, and I have ruined it."

"You?"

"Yes, I have ruined it, and not Teenie; blame me, not her."

"And why should we blame you?" said Miss Burnett, rolling up her lace, and very much bewildered.

"Because I have spent the wealth of the family, and never made any for it."

"How funny!—excuse me, papa, the words came by accident; but why did you not make wealth for the family?"

The Laird drew himself up in his chair, feeling that he was put to the test.

"My dear, money-making is a special talent—I might say it is genius—just as money-spending is a misfortune. There are some men who toil like slaves, wear their hearts out struggling for money, who deny themselves everything, and yet never get their heads above water—they are for ever at the last gasp; do what they will, strive as they will, they can never overcome the necessities of the moment. There are others—those who are endowed with the talent—who dash along, recklessly we might think, but they always land on their feet. They enjoy life, appear in purple and fine linen, and deny themselves nothing; in time they become millionaires or bankrupts; but they are quite happy either way. If millionaires, they go on enjoying themselves; if bankrupts, they begin again with better prospects than ever. I belong to the first class."

"But you could not help that, papa, you never were in trade."

"So much the worse for me—or rather for you. I have a profound admiration for trade, and really believe that I had some qualifications for it. The trader is the modern knight-errant: he helps the needy, he conquers kingdoms and populates deserts; he wages a perpetual crusade on the undeveloped resources of nature, and his adventures are none the less daring because they render practical service to humanity." ("Humph! capital that would have been for the agricultural dinner. Pity the best things always occur to me after my speech," he muttered to himself; and then aloud) "I refer to this, my dears, because I am likely to begin business myself."

"You, papa!" exclaimed Alice, without yawning.

"How funny!" ejaculated Miss Burnett, closing the top of her dainty work-table and locking it; "I can't imagine you beginning business at your age."

"My dear, you have a happy way of supplying us with the most uncomfortable memoranda."

He got up and stood on the white Angola hearth-rug, swinging his glasses meditatively.

"Age is honourable," he went on, "but youth is beautiful; and most of us would be pleased to dispense with the honour in order to share in the beauty."

"I did not mean to offend you."

"Not the least offence in the world is imagined, my dear. But this business idea of mine is not a whim, it is a necessity."

"A necessity—how?"

The Laird coughed and changed the subject.

"I wish we could discover some nice present to give Teenie," he said as if his whole mind were devoted to the discovery.

Miss Burnett became prim immediately. She had not forgotten Walter's reception of her on Sunday, and she could not overlook the outrageous impropriety of Teenie's escapade.

"But I really cannot understand why Christina should be permitted to do with impunity what would be severely punished in others. She was admitted to a family of distinction, she was accepted as one of its members and made welcome. I think it was her duty to respect that family, and to suffer anything rather than bring disgrace upon it. I really cannot excuse her, papa, and I cannot understand how you are so lenient to her."

"Oh, Helen, you are too hard upon her!" cried Alice.

"You are such a giddy young thing, Alice, that I forgive you. I am not hard upon Christina, but she has been hard upon us. Poor people who have been raised to a position should remember the gratitude they owe to those who have raised them. I pity her, but I think that she ought to be made to feel her action has been most reprehensible."

Alice shrank behind the Times at this severe reproof, and ignominiously retired from the defence of her sister-in-law.

"Don't talk of poor people, Helen; or if you do, talk of them with friendly feeling," said the Laird, with a long-drawn sigh; "you don't know how soon we may be reckoned amongst them. I was telling you about that business project of mine. I mean to take a farm—I could manage a farm, I think—and shall try all my new theories of drainage and manuring in a practical manner. I mean to work with my own hands."

"Oh, that will be delightful, papa!" cried Alice; "and I'll learn to milk the cows, and I'll get such a pretty milkmaid's dress; and you shall learn to sing, 'Of a' the joys of earth that the tongue of man can name, is to woo a bonnie lassie when the kye comes hame.' It will be charming, and I'll enjoy it so much."

And so with that pretty picture of a pastoral life, as represented in china ornaments, Alice was eager to begin the business adventure of which the Laird had spoken. He held out his hand, and she, though not accustomed to familiar endearments, jumped up, put her arms round his neck, and called him her "dear, young papa."

"Ha, ha, you rogue! you are ever so much more sensible than that wise sister of yours."

Miss Burnett was quite indifferent to this depreciation of her merits, and with an admirably practical view of affairs she observed—

"But why should you take a farm, papa? Why should not this pretty experiment be carried out at home?"

That pulled him up; he felt for a moment spiteful enough to declare why he was compelled to think of this speculation, and to humble Miss Burnett by showing her upon what very thin ice she was standing. But there was Alice in her pretty childish way hanging round his neck, and forming such sweet visions of a toy farmstead, that he could not find it in his heart to dispel the dream.

"They'll learn the truth soon enough," was his thought; "let them be happy in their ways as long as they can. Why should I disturb them? The time is so short when they must know all and suffer."

So he put off the question with a jest, and said good night with even more good-humour than usual.

"We cannot try it here, Helen, for several reasons. We might spoil your butter by new-fangled experiments; and in the strict order of things we might find it necessary to send your pet lamb to the flesher."

"Oh, fie, papa!" cried Alice; "you never could do that."

"Necessity has no law; needs must when the—etc. Good night, my dear, and pleasant dreams."

He kissed her, and turned to his eldest daughter, who rose and kissed him—an unusual display of affection, which made him hold her arms a minute, looking into her eyes curiously.

"I hope I haven't vexed you, papa, by anything I have said about Christina. I will try to think of her as you do, but I can't help feeling that she has been most foolish."

"We are all so foolish at times, my dear, that we are only wise when we pardon the folly of others. What would you say, now, if I told you that in consequence of my folly we would have to quit Dalmahoy—have to walk out, penniless and homeless, with nothing to depend upon but what we could earn for ourselves? What would you say to that piece of folly?"

"What ridiculous things you do think about, papa!"

"Is that all you would say?"

"How can I tell you in just what I would say if you spoke in earnest? I would be very unhappy, of course, but I would try to help you all the same, in whatever way you thought best."

"And you, Alice?"

"I don't know, you dear, imaginative papa. I suppose I would say you had been very very foolish, and that I was angry with you, and that I would work day and night, and that I would love you more and more, because you were unhappy."

"My darlings"—and he embraced them both—"don't speak of the folly of others until you know what folly you have to excuse at home."

Then, with a hasty good night, he went out of the room, took up his candle from the table in the hall, and went down to the library.

The two ladies regarded his abrupt departure with surprise, and then they looked at each other inquiringly.

"What can papa mean?" exclaimed Alice anxiously.

"He is only making fun of us," said Helen composedly.

That was satisfactory, and the two retired for the night.

The Laird found his lamp burning low, and he turned it up. Although it was still early autumn, a fire was cheery in the evenings. He poked the fire, and settled down in his chair, without book or paper, apparently content to amuse himself with his own reflections, and the phantasms he might discover in the embers.

It was hard—much harder than he had anticipated—to give up the old life of position, and of comparative comfort, and to begin a new life of struggle and speculation at his years, as Helen had said. He had thought that he could meet it calmly, and, depending upon the innumerable schemes for attaining wealth which he had concocted, and which he had never carried out for want of capital, but would now be able to enter upon with other people's capital, since he had nothing of his own to lose, he had fancied that it would be an easy matter to retire from Dalmahoy, and to make a comfortable living for his children by the force of talent and industry. But it was not easy. Sentimental reasons aside—and these sentimental reasons assumed huge proportions as the day of doom approached—he found his confidence in his own powers rapidly decrease as the calamity became more imminent.

What was he to do with those children—he always thought of them as children, notwithstanding their years—who had learned nothing useful, and who were utterly unfitted to earn their own living? He blamed himself. He ought to have taught them something that would have been of practical value to them in such a crisis as the present. But who could have suspected such a crisis? That was no excuse. He ought to have been ready for it, and he was much to blame. That would not have mattered, only they had to suffer in consequence of his neglect.

Then there were strange shadows reaching out of the past, which added much to the bitterness of his position. He began to feel that his years were weighing very heavily upon him, and that the farce of youthfulness was played out.

"A man without money, without the vigour of youth, and with a family to feed and dress—what a helpless beggar he is! I begin to appreciate the blessedness of the rest which is to be found in the kirk-yard—ugh! how morbid I grow!"

He stirred the fire again, and found a sort of grim comfort in watching the old forms and faces which appeared to him in the embers. What duties he had neglected—and what a number of pleasures of which he had stupidly failed to take advantage! Night has a strange influence on the nerves.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-THIRD.

WITH THE BABY.

WALTER would have persuaded Teenie to keep her bed during the next day; but something of the old rebellious spirit showed itself already, and she prayed so hard to be permitted to go down-stairs that, although he saw how excited she was still, and that she was quite feverish, he yielded. She kissed him and thanked him so gratefully that he was glad he had yielded, notwithstanding his conviction that it was wrong.

She dressed with a sort of wild gaiety—like a child who has just been pardoned some offence for which severe punishment had been expected. But she watched him with eager eyes, wondering why he asked her nothing about her absence. Down-stairs she met Ailie, who showed no surprise, no unusual delight at seeing her home again—spoke and acted just as if those weary wanderings of Saturday, Sunday, and Monday had never occurred.

Teenie felt puzzled and frightened by this silence. Had it been only a painful dream? Or was this a plan to make her feel the more the punishment that was to come? She would rather have had it all out at once, and yet it was pleasant to drop into the old routine of life as if there had been no break, no torture of fear and suspense to Walter, no frenzied effort on her part to save him by sacrificing herself.

But she had been very weak; she had begun a sacrifice which would have been of service to him, and had utterly failed to carry it out. She winced terribly at that thought; she felt herself to be so weak and worthless—and yet it was so sweet to be near him again, to hear his voice, and feel his loving care for her as she had not felt it for many days, that she was almost glad at her failure.

The gaping mouth and staring eyes of Lizzie, when she brought in the tea-kettle, were sufficient proofs that the adventures of the past few days were real. The girl had been warned by Walter and threatened by Ailie with severe punishment if she forgot that she was not to say a word to her mistress; but neither warning nor threats could extinguish the amazement expressed on her face.

The feverish excitement of Teenie's manner seriously alarmed her husband, although he tried hard to be quietly cheerful. She would scarcely allow him to leave her for a moment, and she would not allow Baby to be taken from her on any account. She washed him and dressed him herself; she fed him and nursed him, although it was plain that she was sustained only by excitement which would break down suddenly. She wanted to show how strong she was, and that her wickedness had not injured her health, at any rate.

But Walter, as he saw the flushed face, and occasionally felt the dry hot hand, became more and more anxious about her, and more convinced that he ought to have insisted upon her remaining in bed.

The Laird came shortly after breakfast.

Teenie, who seemed to have eyes and ears for everything, was the first to be aware of his approach.

She trembled; the blood rushed violently to her face, and then forsook it, leaving her cheeks white. She was almost as much afraid to encounter Dalmahoy as she had been to meet her husband.

Walter, observing these signs of agitation, proposed to speak to his father before admitting him; but she grasped his arm and held him back.

"No, Wattie," she said with apparent composure, "I would rather not have you begging mercy for me."

There was no time for discussion. Dalmahoy was already on the threshold of the room. He was not so spruce this morning as usual; his face was not so fresh, his hair seemed to have more white than formerly, and his shirt-front was not so scrupulously smooth as it was his custom to have it. There was, however, a sly twinkle in his eyes when he observed the position of husband and wife.

She had placed Baby in his basket, and he was lying there crowing manfully, and trying to swallow his fat, puffy fingers; and she was still standing in the act of restraining Walter from going out to meet the Laird.

"So, madam," exclaimed the latter sternly, striding up to her, and clutching his riding-whip as if he had some thoughts of using it, "you have been trying to frighten us; you have neglected your duties as a wife and a mother, and you have been disgracing our family! What have you to say for yourself?"

"Father!" cried Walter, in utter amazement and horror at this address, for it entirely reversed the system by which he had been trying to win Teenie back to peace and content.

She had been trembling with timidity at his entrance, remembering the tenderness he had shown her in their last interview at Dalmahoy; but this grim address completely changed her—she became doubly defiant. Love could lead her anywhere, make her do anything; but sound a harsh note, and strong ropes could not move her.

"It's none of your business what I have to say for myself," she retorted fiercely.

"So that's your humour, is it? We must tame this proud spirit, and——"

There was passion expressed by her features, but there were bitter tears in her eyes, and he paused.

She saw a tender father's smile growing through the sorrow which was stamped on his face; she saw his arms open as if to receive her, and with a little joyful sob she threw herself into them.

"God bless you, my child!" he said, and his voice faltered slightly as he kissed her; "I did not think you would believe me in earnest. I'm right glad to see you, my braw lass, and I don't care a button what you have to say for yourself, since you have had the good sense to come back to us and relieve us, though you have made my old bones a'le hunting after you."

"Did you seek me, then?"

"DID we seek you!—my certes! we have been all over the country looking for you, and how you escaped us is a puzzle to me. But I blame that gowk of a man of yours for everything."

She became fierce again, and withdrew from his arms.

"But you must not blame him!" she cried; "he is true and brave, and I shall never be able to love him enough for all his goodness to me."

"Well, well! there's no accounting for tastes," grinned the Laird, quite wickedly; "as I've often said, he has capital ideas in his head sometimes, but they are like a midge's dance, so ravel't that you can make nothing of them."

"You must not say that; and I'll run away from you if you do."

"Well, I won't say it. Wattie understands me, and he'll take no offence. I dare say he is a good-enough sort of a chiel when you come to know him."

"I'm content to leave my character in your hands," said Walter, smiling; for he was very happy to see how Teenie had won the Laird entirely to her side.

Seeing that, he determined to obey a summons which he had received an hour before, and which was just then repeated urgently—to attend old Mr. Geddis, who wished to see him; he had only to cross the road, so he would be back soon. As he was going out, Baby began to assert his authority, and to call attention to himself by a vigorous and continued cry. Teenie lifted and soothed him by means of various tender arts and his feeder.

"I detest babies," said the Laird; "they are such stupid lumps of flesh and fibre, and they howl so. But this is a half-decent chappie, and seems to laugh more than he cries."

At the same time Dalmahoy patted the chubby cheeks of Baby, and was vastly amused when the little fellow clutched one of his fingers, and crowed over it as a prize.

"How touzy your hair is to-day!" cried Teenie, laughing; "and now I'll punish you for giving me such a scare when you came in—there, hold Baby till I come back."

She deposited her charge on his lap; the Laird dropped his whip, called her back, and sat in much confusion at the absurd position he occupied. Baby began to cry again.

"The wee rogue," growled the Laird; "can he not be quiet till she comes back?"

Then, to quiet Baby, he baa'd like a sheep, cackled like a hen, crowed like a cock, and imitated other animals, tickling and hoisting his charge the while; so that when Teenie returned, she heard the child screaming with delight—saw the Laird tossing him in the air whilst he brayed like a donkey.

GAZELLE HUNTING IN EGYPT.

WHILE encamped on the desert near the old pilgrim route between Cairo and Suez, and about midway between those towns, we were one morning surprised to see two horsemen advancing at a rapid pace over the heights northward, and evidently making direct for our tents. On nearer approach, we recognised one as an old Mem-look, or white freed slave in the service of Halim Pacha; and the other a negro slave, about twenty years of age, owning the same master; and we knew them both as the principal hunters of the Pacha's staff, so we had no difficulty in guessing their errand—either to hunt gazelles, or make arrangements for their master to do so, as he was a great lover of all sports, especially gazelle hunting.

After supplying the new-comers with refreshments—of which they were in great need, as they had ridden more than thirty miles with nothing but some biscuits and one gourd of water—we were informed that the Pacha, hearing we were out in that part of the desert where gazelles could generally be hunted, had sent these two men to inquire if we would show them any tracks in our neighbourhood, and afford one night's accommodation to the Pacha himself if he came out to hunt. We at once willingly agreed to do whatever we could for him, as he had shown us several kindnesses, and was much respected and liked by the English community in Egypt, from his enlightened views, and generally pleasant and urbane treatment of Europeans in the country. Besides, his being a keen sportsman was by no means the least recommendation to us, who had not joined in a good chase for some months. We mounted our dromedaries and, accompanied by the two hunters, soon found enough fresh tracks of the beautiful animals to justify them in at once returning to Cairo; and after taking a small supply of food for their journey they started, without their horses having had more than half an hour's rest since they had left their stables at Shubra early that morning.

During their absence, we made all the preparation we could from our limited stores to receive our guests—for we had no idea how many the Pacha might bring with him—fitted up a new spare tent, and built a kitchen in an old tent capable of cooking for a dozen people.

On the third day the Pacha arrived, bringing with him only the Memlook, the negro, and a French cook, who did not seem at all comfortable after his long ride on a swift dromedary, laden with the Pacha's cuisine; indeed, as soon as he dismounted he threw himself on the ground, vowing every bone in his body was broken with the shaking he had received. The Pacha had also brought two capital Arab horses for our use, as he knew our dromedaries were not very well suited for this kind of chase. And the negro led, attached to his saddle, four fine gazelle-hounds. These animals were not unlike English coursing hounds in height, and their long fine heads and powerful jaws; but their backs, flapping ears, and long tails were covered with thick rough hair similar to that of a colly dog; each was protected from the sun during their journey by a piece of sheepskin covering the head and body—a precaution taken by all Arabs owning these valuable dogs.

After some little rest, the Pacha asked us if we would join him in the sport, as he could only spare one day, and must return to Cairo next morning. We were all soon mounted, the dogs uncovered and let loose, and after frisking about and rolling in the sand, they all started off for the nearest high ground from which they could get a view over the desert below—for these hounds hunt only by sight. We all spread out in line, and moved quickly after them. For some time the dogs ran from mound to mound, and on reaching the summits looked eagerly in every direction; but more than an hour passed before one at length, giving a short bark, dashed down the opposite slope of a bluff, and was immediately followed by all the others at full speed. On our again getting sight of them, they were far ahead of us, racing over a wide expanse of almost level desert; and with some difficulty we discovered in the distance five specks, which, although we had had much experience, we could scarcely distinguish as gazelles from the surrounding sand and stones where they reclined. They had not yet discovered their rapidly advancing enemies, but as we horsemen rattled down the steep rotten slope of the bluff, bringing down a shower of stones and raising a cloud of sand, the quick eyes of the gazelles were instantly upon us, and off they went with the tremendous bounds peculiar to them, springing from ten to fifteen feet each bound, their heads raised high, and occasionally glancing backward.

These beautiful and graceful creatures seemed as if they would soon outstrip both dogs and men; and so they certainly would had they kept straight ahead, but instead of doing so they turned constantly to right and left, slackening their pace, consequently allowing the dogs and ourselves to gain rapidly upon them. We soon discovered the reason of their erratic movements in the presence of three young fawns, about two months old; and they, being able to keep up with their elders, kept turning aside and stopping, when the others closed round them as if to hide them from their pursuers.

The dogs were soon upon them, and as the gazelles bounded off, leaving the young ones to their fate, the leader, a fine buck, halted and turned so suddenly that he caught the foremost dog directly in the chest with his sharp curved horns, and both were hurled over and over with the impetus of the powerful hound; but before they could disengage themselves, the gazelle was seized and instantly killed by the other dogs. We all passed on, leaving the disabled hound and the dead gazelle, and continued the chase; but the negro dismounted, and after much trouble succeeded in catching two of the young ones, by throwing over them his large white bournous, and entangling them in its folds. The four does now led us along at a tremendous pace, but we could see they were getting fatigued; and as one of the hounds ranged up alongside the rearmost, she turned short off to the right so quickly that her pursuers shot straight ahead, and being unable to follow her manœuvre in time, she was allowed to escape, especially as she was a small lean animal. Two others were soon caught and killed, but the foremost, largest, and most powerful gazelle kept up at unabated pace straight for the broken ground and ravines at the foot of the Attaka mountains; on reaching which she bounded from rock to rock, and over the rough stones in the dry water-courses, with the greatest ease, followed by the dogs; but we were all obliged to dismount, as we were several times nearly thrown by our horses stumbling among the stones and bushes.

Halim Pacha, taking a short double rifle which had been carried by his Memlook, now led the way up the ravine, being determined to get this last gazelle, even if he had to shoot her, for the long chase she had given us; and we followed only to see the end of our pursuit, as we had no fire-arms with us, and the Memlook remained with the horses. But what was our surprise to find, on going some distance up the ravine, all the dogs halted and barking fiercely, but refusing to advance. We saw the ravine terminated in a high perpendicular precipice affording no outlet; the gazelle had rushed up to the extreme end, but among the fallen rocks at the foot of the precipice she had, in avoiding the dogs, been seized by three huge hyenas, and as we approached we saw one standing over her body, while the other two came forward towards the dogs, yelling savagely, and evidently intending to add them to their meal, for very few dogs are a match for those great powerful brutes; they, however, halted and then turned back at our appearance, and next moment both fell, pierced by the bullets from the Pacha's rifle; but the third hyena, to make his escape, rushed down towards the entrance, and snapped so savagely at the Pacha in passing, that had he not thrust the butt of the weapon forward, he would have been seriously bitten. The animal, however, continued to hold the stock in his strong jaws, and gave us time to drive our long hunting-knives into his body, when he fell dead, still retaining his hold of the rifle, which, when disengaged, showed the deep marks of his tremendous teeth.

We should have recovered the body of the gazelle, but as it had been killed by these impure animals, the flesh was considered as unfit for food by our Mohammedan companions, and we did not require it ourselves; so, remounting, we after a long ride rejoined the negro, who had secured the two young ones and the two does which had been killed; then made for our camp, which we reached late in the evening; but all managed to enjoy a delicious supper prepared by the French cook, and afterwards a night's rest, most welcome after our fatiguing chase.

A few months after this chase, I and my companion had another for gazelles, but of a very different description. We were encamped in a spot not many miles from the previous one, but the season was in the very hottest part of summer, when the air seems like a flame, and the desert glitters in white heat; no cloud is seen in the glowing sky, and not a breath of wind is felt to cool the burning surface of sand and stone. We had been many weeks without fresh meat, owing to the cattle murrain, when it was difficult to get meat even in the towns; our stores of preserved food had failed entirely, and finally we had an invalid friend staying in our tents, to whom even a little soup would have been a great luxury; so we determined to try and get a gazelle, as we knew they frequented a wide open space of desert to the southward of the old road, and the wadys or dry courses formed by the winter torrents from the mountains.

We started soon after daylight, that we might march during the coolest time of the day, as the places frequented by the gazelles were some four hours' walk from our camp—no joke in that season of the year. Our costume was of the lightest flannel, but our heads were protected by thick shawl-turbans. We carried nothing but our hunting-flasks of water, ammunition, hunting-knives, and double guns—one barrel smooth, the other rifled, the most useful of all pieces for desert work. Our two servants had gone to Cairo for provisions, but would return during the day, so we left instructions for them to follow us on their arrival.

As we neared the old road we became painfully aware of what the last caravan of pilgrims, which had passed two months previously, must have suffered; for not only were the skeletons and half-picked bodies of camels to be seen at very short distances from each other, but a few paces beyond the road our attention was drawn by some rags flapping in the light morning wind, and then we distinguished the half-buried remains of some poor pilgrim who had succumbed to the fatigue, want, or disease which makes such havoc in every pilgrim caravan. The fleshless skull was still partly encircled by the well-known green turban, and entangled among the remains was the broad leather double belt used by most Orientals to carry their weapons around their waist. We passed quickly by, only to find at a few more paces the remains of another poor victim in a similar condition; near this one lay a rusty discharged pistol, and as we journeyed on, we speculated whether this poor fellow might not perhaps have defended himself, when almost helpless, against the wild animals and birds of prey which always follow the route of the caravans.

When we arrived at the wady where we expected, to find the game, the sun was high and blazing fiercely upon us, the light wind utterly gone; and, seeing no trace of gazelles, we almost decided to return to our camp, so thoroughly lonely and hopeless did it seem—no living object to be seen but our two selves in those miles and miles of glowing desert around us, and no shelter nearer than our tents. We had both had long experience of the desert, but we agreed that this day it looked particularly dismal.

However, as we came across tracks of the animals of which we were in search, although some days old, we determined to persevere until we could find something more tangible than foot-prints. Two hours passed and still we wandered about on this fearful plain, which extended almost as far as the eye could reach without apparently a rise of ground as high as our shoulders. At length we suddenly discovered in the glittering mirage before us the indistinct form of a standing gazelle, magnified seemingly to the height of a camel. We dropped upon all-fours immediately, and began crawling in the direction of the animal, which we could not now see, or judge at what distance he could be, as in the phenomena of the mirage objects a mile distant sometimes seem but a few hundred yards off. On we crept, occasionally rising to relieve our hands and knees from the burning sand and gravel, and then we again discovered the gazelle apparently in the same position. At length, after a very long crawl, the heat was so unbearable that we started up, unable any longer to support it; and immediately before us, at about four hundred yards, were three fine gazelles standing staring at us. Down we went again, but next instant they bounded off, and did not stop till they had placed another four hundred yards between us. We now agreed to separate, and each do our best to stalk to the right and left of them. Again we crept forward, only to see the provoking animals trot gently off another two or three hundred yards; then two of them began nibbling some shrubs, while the third, with his head raised high, and evidently snuffing the air, looked straight towards us. I was now separated from my companion by about four hundred yards, and both were rather more than five hundred from the gazelles; but, knowing our rifles would not carry with certainty that distance, we still crept on, but with the greatest difficulty, for the sun struck on my back, and was refracted from the sand to my face—now only a few inches from the ground—so that I felt I should faint if I did not soon rise up. I drank my last drop of water and again struggled on, the heat being so great that I could only hold my gun by wrapping my shooting-jacket round it.

Just as I had lessened the distance by another hundred yards, the gazelles still in the same position, and I was wriggling between some bushes about eight inches high, I saw, not more than two feet immediately before me, a large horned snake (Cerastes), the most venomous of all desert snakes, and so fatal is the bite that I have known several instances of death happening to persons in less than two hours after being struck by this reptile. It would never do to fire at him and so lose the gazelles; and as I gently drew my heavy loading-rod to give him a tap, I saw another snake of the same kind on my right, and at about the same distance, but raising himself to striking position, with his vicious ruby-coloured eyes fixed on mine. Not a moment was to be lost; I drew the rod wildly out, struck at the serpent on my right, and luckily swept him down with the first blow; but before I could recover myself to strike at the one in front, he darted at me, and as I involuntarily rolled on one side, passed over me. I sprang to my feet and, as he prepared to make another spring, gave him the contents of my smooth barrel, making him spring high into the air; next moment I heard my friend's rifle crack, and saw a gazelle fall; but though I fired my rifled barrel after the others as they bounded off, my bullet went far wide, so unnerved was I by my long crawl, the danger I had been in from the two reptiles, and the heavy recoil of my heated gun. When I had somewhat recovered I joined my companion, who laughed at my bad shots, as he thought I had fired both at the animals; but on seeing the dead snakes he owned he should probably have made a worse, as he had a most intense dislike to serpents of all kinds.

We both now made the discovery that we were so exhausted we could scarcely stand; we had no water, were miles away from the camp, and our eyes, tongues, and faces so inflamed with the intense heat that we could scarcely speak without pain. However, we sat down, and cutting slices of the warm flesh from the gazelle, applied them to the inflamed parts, and continued doing so until we were both considerably relieved. Then we laid the animal across our guns, and carrying them litter-fashion, started on our weary homeward trudge.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

IT is Christmas Eve, in the year of grace One thousand eight hundred and seventy. A cold, bleak day.
 Snow everywhere : snow whitening the turrets of church-towers, the roofs of houses, the linden that surround the most pretentious residences in the little town of Wiermar, in North Germany ; snow upon the Christmas-trees that line the streets ;
 snow in abundance upon the holiday garments of the purchasers ; snow in the air, in the clouds, and upon the frozen ground. A biting wind and a pitiless sky.

Bustle and excitement reign in the crowded Market Platz. An utter disregard of weather is exhibited. Knots of eager talkers gather on the pavements, and obstruct the free passage of the streets. Abundant subject for conversation is found in the news lately received of the repulse, five days ago, of a French sortie from Paris. Ludwig, vendor of Christmas-trees, and wide-famed politician, harangues a band of listeners stationed around him, in the corner nearest St. Mary Magdalen's Church.

"Another week, and the capital of France will be in the possession of the Germans," he confidently asserts. "The general has said so—General von Fehrenstein, whose knowledge is vast as that of Von Moltke himself. See, the general approaches. Hear him."

General von Fehrenstein, a grey-headed, portly gentleman, appears in the market-place. He joins the band of Ludwig's excited auditors.

Yes, the general is full of rapturous expectation.
 "Paris must fall. The beautiful city already recognises its inevitable doom."

General von Fehrenstein is an authority on military questions. His old age of rest has followed years of indefatigable toil, and honourable suffering in his country's service. He reviews the history of the late sortie with infinite satisfaction. His hearers are legion. They raise their voices in exultation as he concludes.

Ludwig leads the cheering manfully. All honour to the Fatherland ! All honour to its arms ! A glorious and a joyful Christmas, this, to all her children !

Glorious ? Joyful ? What witness to its gladness bears the young widow, who turns shudderingly from the gay throng that impedes her course, and, drawing her weeping son closer to her side, speaks to him in broken voice of his father, slain on the battle-field of Woerth ? What witness bears yonder bereaved mother, whose fondest hopes lie buried in a soldier's grave beneath the friendless skies of France ?

The wail of bereavement rises wellnigh as loudly as the shout of triumph throughout victorious Germany.

Five o'clock. The gay shops are lighted. Bright ornaments for Christmas-trees sparkle in the windows. Hungry-looking street-boys flatten their noses against the glass that glitters before confectionery wares in Fraulein Engel's establishment.
 The Fraulein herself, attired in Sunday garb, and presenting to view a coiffure calculated to strike anguish to the heart of the chivious lady who rears the neighbouring emporium, stands at her door, listening to the patriotic oration of her admirer, Ludwig. His voice rises high above the tumult of the wind. He is threatening with condign vengeance "our natural enemies, the French."

"God greet you, Fräulein."

General von Fehrenstein's daughter enters, and the Fräulein retreats, in a flutter of anxiety, towards her deserted counter.

"Your pleasure, gracious lady?"

Anna von Fehrenstein is the belle of Wiermar. Her eyes are the bluest in the province, her skin the whitest, her golden hair the most luxurious. Hers is a lovely face, with timid, gentle eyes, that rise slowly and quickly drop; her air of sweet refinement, and meek unconsciousness of her wondrous grace and beauty, wins the coldest hearts. All the world accords her the first place among the fair ones of Wiermar—all the world with one exception—Franz Siegel, brother of her betrothed.

Is this her betrothed, who enters with her? Alas! no. Karl Siegel has obeyed his country's call to arms; has fought with her armies on foreign soil; has sought, before Paris, a soldier's laurels or a soldier's grave. A soldier's grave! May not that bourne be already reached? Far from country—far from the friends who are dearest to his soul—may not Karl Siegel be already sleeping the long last sleep of the warrior whose work is over? News of a sanguinary conflict before Paris has reached Wiermar, but no list of the names of the German dead accompanied the tidings. On how many a sad heart, weary with suspense, with sickening apprehension of bereavement, will the news of the realisation of its most gloomy forebodings fall during the next few days!

A gentleman stands by Anna's side—a gentleman in the uniform of a French officer. Fräulein Engel recognises him at a glance—Monsieur Henri de Montbrison prisoner of war, nominally guest of General von Fehrenstein. Fräulein has seen him before, and admires him immensely. Ah, the bel air!—the grace of manner—the deportment, at once easy and distinguished! What a bow! What implied recognition of her manifold charms!

The Fräulein congratulates herself on the unimpeachable character of her Sunday garb—on the fashionable arrangement of her multitudinous plaits of flaxen hair.

A dark Southern face, bronzed by fiery Marseilles suns, black piercing eyes, and a haughty mouth, are Henri de Montbrison's. His figure is tall and straight—his bearing soldierlike. A handsome man, beyond all manner of dispute.

"Our natural enemies indeed!" mutters Fräulein Engel, under her breath. "Would that Ludwig resembled these foes of the Fatherland."

"Your pleasure, gracious lady?"

"Bons-bons, Fräulein. The best, the sweetest, yes, even the most expensive of your stock. Thus late on Christmas Eve, my mother finds that her store of confectionery is insufficient for her guests. Give me bons-bons—life-cakes—whatever your shop contains of a tempting nature.—Monsieur, you have the basket."

Monsieur assists in the selection of bons-bons. What taste!—what discrimination! Our natural enemies forsooth! Listen to this praise of German workmanship! Observe this utter disregard of French-prepared articles! Fräulein raises her hands aloft with almost Parisian grace.

A prisoner, this Monsieur de Montbrison, thinks the Fräulein, with no consciousness of captivity in his graceful bearing, his gay manner, his light-hearted laugh.

The choice of sweetmeats necessitates apparently much low-toned conversation, much meeting of hands, much drawing together of bent heads. A fitful colour is ever rising in Anna's cheeks; there is in her blue eyes a feverish light, which Fräulein Engel never remembers to have remarked before. She wishes that she could understand more readily the French discourse, that distracts her ear from the rapidity of its utterance. She notices the speakers' difference of accent—the one, clear, sharp Parisian; the other, broad, dull Germanic. But the voice which murders the polished language is soft and sweet; exquisite emphasis is lent it by a pair of eloquent eyes.

"Fruitful topics for conversation are bons-bons, apparently," murmurs the Fräulein, good-humouredly satirical.

"The basket is full, monsieur," says Anna at length.—"Fräulein, what do I owe?—Ah! I have left my purse at home."

Monsieur comes forward. He presents a store of bright guldens from the depths of his pockets. He is "petrified" to find that the purchase demands but few of the coins.

"Mon Dieu! how cheap are the necessaries of life in this delightful land!"

De Montbrison attempts this remark in German, but the Fräulein finds it even more difficult to understand than his fluent French conversation. She returns the officer's bow, however, with an elaborate curtsy, and, accompanying her customers to the door, watches them down the street.

There is a rattle of sledge-bells in the frosty air. The snow has ceased to fall, but the wind blows keenly. A cold walk home for the "gracious lady" and her companion.

"Ah! down the Crauzie Strasse leading to the Park. Whither goes the general's daughter with her father's visitor? The general's house lies in a totally different direction," observes the Fräulein meditatively.

"Ludwig," she calls to the wide-famed politician, "come hither. Tell me how goes thy trade this cold Christmas Eve?"

"Blithely—and thine?"

"Fairly well. The general's daughter has just left my shop. Didst thou see her, Ludwig?"

"I saw her well."

"And the Herr von Montbrison who was with her?"

"I saw him too."

"Shall I tell thee a secret, Ludwig—a charming piece of news?"

"If thou wilt."

"Know then" (the Fräulein leans over Herr Ludwig's shoulder, and whispers with an air of mystery and importance) "the handsome French officer is in love."

Ludwig laughs unconcernedly.

"Very possibly, my friend. Thy secret is a safe one. It affects none in this country, I should say, and is not difficult to keep."

"But I tell thee, Ludwig, that the handsome French officer——"

"Handsome?"

"He is adorable—this Monsieur de Montbrison."

Ludwig scowls. His broad German face assumes an expression of angry scorn.

"Thou art easily pleased, my Gretchen."

"Easily pleased or not, my news may be relied upon, Ludwig. The handsome French officer is in love with the general's daughter."

"Gretchen!"

Ludwig's indignant voice astonishes the Fräulein. She backs into her shop, with an amazed and frightened countenance.

"I speak but as I firmly believe, Ludwig. The handsome French officer is in love with the general's daughter, and the general's daughter is in love with the handsome French officer. Ah, thou mayst frown. My eyes cannot be——"

"Thunder-weather! What tissue of absurdity wilt thou offer next as thy latest news? Get thee to thy work, I say. Employ thy hands rather than thy imagination. The general's daughter! I am aghast at thy folly, girl. The general's daughter! In love with a Frenchman—a coxcomb—a—the general's daughter!—the betrothed of the illustrious Herr Siegel! In truth, I consider thee to be demented, Gretchen."

And Ludwig stalks off, majestically contemptuous.

Meanwhile, Anna walks on in pensive silence by De Montbrison's side.

Is there any justice in Fräulein Engel's hastily formed, hastily expressed opinion? We shall see.

"This road will not lead us home, monsieur," speaks the German girl at length, in her German-French.

"Home?"

"To my home—my father's house. This path runs straight to the Park."

"And shall we not stroll there, and honour the skaters with a visit? The day has been triste beyond precedent, but the weather grows every minute more complaisant. The American performer, whose gambols amused you yesterday, will be desolé to miss approving glances from your eyes, mademoiselle. Come."

Anna hesitates—then walks forward very slowly.

"It is past five o'clock. My mother's guests will have arrived before we return," she says.

"A little moment. See, the water is very near us. Ah! Monsieur the American, cutting his everlasting figures. See, mademoiselle, he salutes you—the graceful skater, whose antics yesterday won your heart. Surely you——"

"Whose antics yesterday—Pardon, monsieur; I——"

"Won your heart, I presumed to say. Do I deceive myself?"

"Ah, yes."

There is a fund of meaning in the sad voice—in the quiet words—in the bent head. The grave manner forms a striking contrast to the Frenchman's light-hearted demeanour.

De Montbrison leans forward quickly. A strange change passes over his mobile face; its gay expression disappears. Earnest inquiry and deep admiration shine in his eyes.

Only for a moment. When he speaks again, he looks steadily on the ground.

"I forgot," he says, and there is a tinge of bitterness in his voice; "that priceless gift, your heart, is in the possession of some German Karl, whose surname I have not the honour of remembering—some Karl, whose valorous achievements before Paris astonish an admiring world."

Before Paris! Words lightly hurried over, lest the speaker should find their utterance impossible. Words of dark import most difficult for a Frenchman to realise!

"He is to set the Seine on fire, this same German Karl, if his brother Franz be worthy of credence. Widows and orphans will dry their tears to gaze on the mighty warrior, when he enters the devoted city. His path to glory lies straight before him, over broken hearts, through desolate homes. A man worthy of all honour, this German Karl, according to Bruder Franz."

"Oh, hush, monsieur!"

The gently pleading voice dispels the storm that gathered over De Montbrison's face. Gently pleading eyes rise to his, and fall beneath his earnest gaze.

The clock of St. Mary Magdalen's Church chimes half-past five. In the falling shades of evening, the skaters are scarcely discernible. A cry for torchlight is already raised.

This very time, a year ago, Anna recollects she stood by the same water, watching a similar scene to the one which now meets her eyes. Better, then, was her betrothed, Karl Siegel. She remembers each word he spoke—each word of her replies. Loving Christmas wishes, fond promises of future happiness were constantly upon his lips. Does he think of her, and of the old time, now that danger is near him, now that death lies waiting on every side? Anna refuses to recognise the possibility of Karl's life having been already given for the Fatherland. Does he think of her, and of the old time, the old time never to return?

"I wish that I could love him as I did then," she murmurs wearily.

"Pardon, mademoiselle—you spoke?"

"No. But we must go home, I think. It is growing dark; we can barely see the skaters; and my mother will be angry if we delay. Besides, her guests will have arrived. The soup is fixed for six o'clock."

"Indeed! Delightfully primitive hours, yours, but difficult to bear in mind. Ah! behold monsieur—with the unpronounceable name—monsieur to whom you presented me yesterday upon the ice."

Many caps are doffed to the daughter of the celebrated General von Fehrenstein. In accordance with the custom of the country, De Montbrison greets, with respectful obeisance, all of his companion's acquaintance to whom she accords recognition.

Monsieur of the unpronounceable name neglects to return the Frenchman's bow.

De Montbrison colours. "The gentleman is a patriot," he says. "He disdains to acknowledge an unworthy foreigner's salute: a patriot of polished manners truly."

The moon rises above a bank of dull grey clouds. Anna shivers as its cold light falls across her path.

Moodily thoughtful, the Frenchman leads the way homeward.

"Tell me," he says, turning at last to his companion, "who are to be your guests to-night?"

"Let me reflect.—Herr Professor Gonsor."

"Who cannot speak one word of French."

"The Frau his wife."

"Who speaks only German. I shall be a wet blanket on charming society, this Christmas Eve."

"We expect the professor's daughter too."

"Ah!"

A French "Ah!" long and deep, accompanied by a shrug of the shoulders.

"General Kratzer has promised to come."

"General Kratzer!" De Montbrison's face brightens. "I know him. A gentleman and a German. Curious combination!—Ah, what do I say? Malheureux that I am! I ask your pardon, mademoiselle."

"Then we hope to see Ida von Monstatt, the greatest beauty in Wiermar."

"Mademoiselle! mademoiselle!" De Montbrison raises his hands deprecatingly.

"We have invited two artists whom you do not know, three or four more friends whom you have never met, and Franz Siegel."

"Brother of the devoted Karl?"

"Brother of Karl Siegel—yes."

"Franz Siegel the hunchback! I shall be delighted to improve his acquaintance. Franz Siegel, inscrutable mélange of the grotesque and sublime—grotesque in his appearance and manner, sublime in his indomitable faith in the superiority of Germany over all other existing nations, in the superiority of his brother Karl over all other subjects of your German Emperor. A character worthy careful study—that of your friend, Franz Siegel."

"Oh, do not laugh at him, monsieur. If you knew how great and generous his nature is, how honest, how tender, you could not scoff."

Anna's voice falters.

De Montbrison bends over her, supplicating forgiveness.

"Indeed, I will never knowingly scoff at anything which you hold dear. Believe me, never."

He stops short in his walk. Lower and lower bends his head. Very earnest are his whispered words.

Then, turning away from the broad road through which he and Anna have been passing, he leads the way down dimly lighted, sequestered paths.

After a few moments' silence, he says abruptly, in a troubled voice, "I do not shun the Christmas festivities in which your father kindly invites me to take part to-night, though my heart is full to breaking, with a sorrow that it is difficult for all my pride to cover. I trust to your sweet presence for courage and support. Let me tell you now how deep is the gratitude with which your consoling appreciation of the hardships of my position here has filled me. When I have been gayest, proudest—when your German friends have wondered most at the insensibility of the light-hearted French soldier, who apparently values slightly his country's happiness, then most clearly have I seen the light of divine pity shining in your kind eyes, and I have known that you only, among all the dwellers in this German town, understood me. You only recognise the keen anguish which I bear in silence, which I jealously hide from all other observation. Believe me, I could endure pity from no one else—from no one else."

Deep silence from Anna. Not a glance—not a sign.

"In a land of strangers, where every day I hear my country slandered, where the disasters of Woerth, of Metz, and of Sedan"—a shudder passes over De Montbrison's face as he speaks the last word—"are hourly gloated over in my presence, in what can I find refuge but enforced gaiety or scornful silence? Shall I let my enemies see how to the quick their blows have struck?—how painfully each insult they have paid to France has lacerated my heart? Let them strike! My arm is powerless. See how I laugh, the more gaily as the wound is deeper. The dull eyes of these passionless Germans can never discern a broken heart beneath a smiling face."

"Oh, monsieur, why this to me?"

"Because your sweet pity penetrates me, fills me with profound emotion. Only two feelings animate me now—sorrow for France, love, earnest grateful love for——"

"Monsieur!" Two burning spots shine out on Anna's cheeks.

"I anger you. Forgive me. But tell me that I have judged you rightly—that my country's griefs fail to inspire within your breast the exultation felt by your German friends."

"Monsieur de Montbrison"—Anna's tearful eyes rise slowly—"dearly as I love the Fatherland, I would give the best years of my life to recall the time before our victorious campaign with France commenced—would give the best years of my life if, by so doing, I could change the unalterable past—could cause that the triumphs of Woerth, of Metz, and of Sedan had never been."

"Do you speak thus?"—De Montbrison's voice is sharp, its tones discordant from thought of Karl. "Ah, me! the happy Karl; happy amid dangers. You wish him peacefully at home?"

"Indeed, indeed I do. Oh that he had never left us—that I had never——"

"Never what?"

"Never seen you, in all my life, monsieur!"

END OF CHAPTER THE FIRST.

THE WRECK OF THE "JUNO."

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE SECOND.

IN the morning of the 28th, Mr. Wade declared he could bear his sufferings no longer, and would once more go on the raft. Mackay refused to accompany him, but two Italian helmsmen, two Malays, and three or four of the Lascars joined him, and in a few hours they were out of sight. In the evening there came on a squall, which probably proved fatal to them, but brought merciful relief to those on the mast. They caught the heavy rain in their outstretched clothes, and drank it as soon as it had washed out the salt that at first tainted it. After this, rain fell generally once in forty-eight hours. In the intervals, when they had not strength left to go down themselves, it was their constant practice to lower a jacket or piece of cloth into the sea by means of a rope-yarn, and apply it thus moistened to their bodies. Whenever a heavy shower afforded them a few mouthfuls of fresh water, either by catching the drops as they fell or squeezing them out of their clothes, it infused new life and vigour into them, and for awhile they almost forgot their misery. The men always chewed lead and canvas to quench their thirst; leather they found intolerably offensive. Many of the sufferers died delirious, and then death and the final horrors of cannibalism were Mackay's especial terror. The body of a Lascar, who had died in the cat-harpings, got so jammed in among the ropes that it could not be disengaged for several days, and this added to the general distress.

"On the morning of the eleventh day (July 1st)

Mrs. Bremner found her husband dead in her arms; and our strength was so reduced, it was with the utmost difficulty," says Mackay, "we threw his body overboard, after stripping off part of his clothes for the use of his wife. In the course of this day two others died in the mizen, and two others in the fore-top, with which we had of late little or no communication, being no longer able to come down the rigging, or speak loud enough to be heard at that distance. After the gale abated, several of the Lascars went forward, and our numbers were now so diminished the two tops held us all."

Now the nights grew terribly rainy, cold, and benumbing, but the morning sun relaxed their limbs. Then came the intolerable meridian heat, and renewed their torture. Some died hard, and in great agony, yet the weaker men sometimes lingered longest. As a proof of this fact, Mackay gives us the following exquisitely touching instance:

"Mr. Wade's boy, a stout and healthy lad, died early, and almost without a groan; while another of the same age, but a less promising appearance, held out much longer. The fate of these unfortunate boys differed also in another respect, highly deserving of notice. Their fathers were both in the fore-top when the boys were taken ill. The father of the second, when the account reached him, hurried down, and waiting for a favourable opportunity, crawled on all-fours along the weather-gun-wale to the boy, who was in the mizen-rigging. By that time only three or four planks of the quarter-deck remained, just over the weather-quarter galley; and to this spot the unhappy man led his son, making him fast to the rail to prevent his being washed away. Whenever the boy was seized with a fit of retching, the father lifted him up and wiped away the foam from his lips; and if a shower came, he made him open his mouth to receive the drops, or gently squeezed them into it from a rag. In this affecting situation both remained four or five days, till the boy expired. The unfortunate parent, as if unwilling to believe the fact, raised the body, gazed wistfully at it, and when he could no longer entertain any doubt, watched it in silence till it was carried off by the sea; then, wrapping himself in a piece of canvas, sunk down and rose no more, though he must have lived two days longer, as we judged by the quivering of his limbs when a wave broke over him. This scene made an impression even on us, whose feelings were, in a manner, dead to the world."

On the 10th of July, the twentieth day since the wreck, a man said he saw something like land in the horizon, to the eastward; but no emotion was shown, and no one made any effort for some time. But slowly one by one they all roused themselves to see. Mackay told Mrs. Bremner that if it was land the wreck would be beaten to pieces a long way from shore, and they would all perish. At day-break Mackay could scarcely rouse himself for a long time, to see whether it was or was not land. But he said to Mrs. Bremner if it was the coast of Coromandel they would both be exhibited in the Long Room at Madras, under the pictures of Cornwallis and Meadows. In the evening, to their inexpressible anguish, they saw that the coast was wild jungle, without a sign of an inhabitant. Death then seemed near and certain, yet Mackay slept well, and was awake by the ship striking.

The tide falling left the gun-deck almost dry, and Mackay and the gunner got down to it. The Lascars, coming out of the fore-top, began to search among the rubbish for money. Two of them refused to bring Mrs. Bremner down from the cat-harpings for less than eight rupees, money to be paid on the spot. They then got into the gun-room, and found three or four cocoa-nuts jammed under some timber. The finder divided them generously, claiming only the juice, which however proved rancid. Thirst was the predominant agony now, and Mackay was haunted by thoughts of large bowls full of lemonade, and food that could be swallowed without chewing. Seeing no prospect of getting to land, Mackay resolved to die quietly in the wreck—not yet, however, surrendering all hope of being saved. No one had died since they caught sight of land. In the afternoon their hopes were raised by seeing something like men walking on the shore; but though the strongest of Mackay's companions got on the taffrail-rail and waved cloths, they took no notice. This, however, roused six of the strongest of the Lascars, who got six small spars out of the gun-room and, with infinite fatigue, launched them into the water. These were quite insufficient to support all, but the six Lascars towards evening got on them, and at the young flood soon gained the beach, though there was a heavy surf. "We saw them find a stream of fresh water, drink deeply, and then lie down, as if in despair, under the shade of a bank. The next morning, to our great delight, they had not been destroyed by tigers, and we saw them come again and drink." On the wreck there were still left two women, three old men, a middle-aged man (an invalid), a lad, and Mackay. All these were too weak and faint even to move a single spar. The young and robust had nearly all perished.

Towards noon, to their frantic joy, the people on the wreck saw a large party of natives approach the Lascars, and kindle a fire, evidently to dress rice, and some came to the water's edge and waved signals to them to venture ashore. Mackay's heart now swelled with hope, and life again seemed precious to him. Getting no help from the gunner and the Serang, who were exhausted, he and the boy with difficulty got out a spar and made it fast with a rope to a piece of floating plank. Mackay hesitated for some time to leave Mrs. Bremner, now quite helpless, till urged by the boy, and convinced that the natives might leave the place, and that he should be still weaker the next day. Once on shore he could send rescue to the poor woman, who gave him a rupee at parting, and dismissed him with a thousand good wishes for his safety. Just as Mackay was recommending himself to the Divine protection the plank floated away, leaving only the square spar, which kept rolling Mackay under it, and exhausting him more and more at every roll. "I found," says the brave man, "that I did not get nearer to the shore, but drifted in a direction almost parallel to the beach. Fearing that I should not be able to hold out much longer, I tried every method to keep the spar from turning, and at last lay alongside it with one hand and one leg over, while with the other arm and leg I struggled hard to guide it towards the shore. For some time I succeeded tolerably well, but all at once was overwhelmed with a tremendous sea, which broke over me, and tore away the spar. I now thought all was over, and, after a short struggle, was beginning to sink, when another surf threw me right across the spar, which was carried back with considerable force by the reflux of the sea. I was almost breathless by the shock, yet I instinctively grasped it with both my arms and legs, and was several times rolled round and round along with it. I was also scratched with the sand and shells which the surf had carried back from the beach; but this I considered as a sign that I was near the shore, though I could not see it, which greatly animated my hopes. One or two more surfs threw me violently on the rocks, and, to prevent the returning surf from carrying me back, I laid fast hold of them. The only clothes I had when I left the ship were a flannel waistcoat, part of a shirt, and a pair of trousers. The two first, being ragged, I tied in a bundle at my back, to prevent their encumbering me, but I lost them in the surf. The trousers I still had on. Finding them entangled in the rocks when the surf had retreated, I tore them off, and made shift to crawl on all-fours, for I could not straighten my back, beyond the reach of the surf. Being now perfectly bare, I found the wind extremely cold, and therefore laid myself down under the lee of a rock, where, in a few moments, though I observed some of the natives coming towards me, I fell asleep."

The men who woke Mackay told him he was in Ava, only six days' journey from Chittagong. They were company's ryots (peasants), and promised to take him with them. They then led him to the stream, and, as he insisted upon drinking, let him fall face forward into it, and there he stayed, taking great draughts until he felt more revived.

Round the natives' fire Mackay found the six Lascars, the boy, the gunner, and the Serang. The latter, swimming better than himself, had reached the shore first. The joy at seeing them almost deranged Mackay's mind, and the oftener they told him how they got on shore, the more bewildered he became at their meeting. He waited patiently till the rice was boiled and some brought him on a leaf, but when he had chewed a grain or two he found he could not swallow it. A Hindoo, observing Mackay's distress, dashed some water into his face with his hand; this, although it at first almost choked him, caused the muscles to expand and restored their power, though he was obliged at first to take a mouthful of water with every mouthful of rice. Mackay's lips and the inside of his mouth had blackened and cracked with the external heat and internal fever, and they bled and gave him great pain every time he moved his jaws. Then a sweet, deep, refreshing sleep stole over the mind of the rescued man, and he rested till the evening.

When Mackay awoke, his staunch and true nature revived also, and he tried, by promises of reward from her, to induce the natives to rescue poor Mrs. Bremner. Some of them promised to watch for the high midnight tide, when the wreck would drift nearer; but while they discussed their probable spoil, their leader, a warm-hearted man, saved her without stipulating for reward; and that same night the ship, as if its work for good or evil was over, parted in two. The bottom stuck still to the teeth of the ravening and greedy rocks, and the upper part floated in so near the beach that the two remaining men waded through the dangerous surf to the shore. Mackay, in vain importuning the natives to cook more rice, fell asleep again, and at midnight awoke, and found Mrs. Bremner and her maid safe on shore. The deepest joy was depicted on Mrs. Bremner's face.

In the morning the eight Mussulman Lascars bargained by themselves for future food, and Mrs. Bremner agreed to pay eight rupees for four days' rice for the whole European party, till they gained strength to reach the nearest village, thirty miles to the northward.

We have no need to follow Mackay and his party to Chittagong, which, after these prolonged and almost incredible sufferings, they eventually reached in safety.

IN HONOUR BOUND.

BY CHARLES GIBBON,

AUTHOR OF "ROBIN GRAY," "FOR LACK OF GOLD," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FOURTH.

A DISCOVERY.

THE Laird looked shamefaced, and a little vexed, when he found that he was observed: then he laughed heartily.

"'Pon my soul, Teenie, you're a witch!" he exclaimed, "and you make a fool of me just as you please. Here, take your confounded bairn—he's a nuisance."

"No, keep him till I dress your hair. He's very happy, and laughing as if he had the best nurse in the world."

Baby screeched with delight as the Laird tickled him, crying, "Chucky, chucky, chuck—y!" and uttered other nonsensical sounds which represent baby-language. She combed and brushed his hair, drawing back now and again to study the effect of her arrangements with the eye of an artist. Finally, whilst he still nursed Baby, she drew him to a mirror to look at himself.

"There!" she cried proudly, "isn't that better?"

"Wonderful!" he exclaimed, putting up one hand to arrange a curl at the side of his head—"ten years knocked off the account. I'd kiss you if my hands were released from this bundle."

So he placed the bundle in its basket, and he took her hands, and touched her brow with his lips. He became serious at that moment.

"You have made me young again, my child; but why are you so hot and feverish?"

He now observed how strange she looked; there was a wild restlessness in the eyes and a quivering of the lips, which at first might have been attributed to her agitation and doubt as to the reception she was to have, but could not be explained by these suggestions any longer since they were friends re-united. Her whole frame seemed to be on fire, and yet she was shivering; that startled him.

"I don't know what is the reason—I'm queer," our neighbours' burdens; so I try to think it is not me, but another fool, who is about to be turned out in his old age to learn how to gain a decent living."

He spoke gaily enough, but there was a rueful shadow in his eyes. Then she, with a voice that was full of pain—

"I wish I had never come back—I wish I had died by the roadside, and I would have been happy, looking down upon you all."

"You would have seen us miserable beggars when you were away from us, Teenie."

"HE SETTLED HIMSELF IN THE SADDLE."

she answered hurriedly, and flying away to the subject which was uppermost in her thoughts—"but what about Dalmahoy?"

He gave his shoulders an uncomfortable twist.

"There's nothing new about it," he said with a grin; "there will be letters of horning issued against me soon, I suppose."

"What's that horning?"

"Only a summons in the name of Her Majesty the Queen (God bless her); commanding me to pay the siller forthwith or—get out."

"And you say that as quietly as if it was the ruin of somebody else you were talking about!" she said, smilingly.

"Just that; it's surprising how easily we can bear

"No, no, you would have been safe and comfortable—I went away thinking that Mistress Wishart would give you the money if she only knew me to be out of the road. But I've come back and spoiled it all."

Walter was at the door, and heard her. He understood everything now—the idea of self-sacrifice which had possessed her, and which he revered none the less that it appeared to him a foolish one, and he understood the bitterness of heart she experienced in her failure. He knew something of the bitterness of failure, and he loved her more and more, if that could be. He embraced her tenderly.

"My poor wifie, you must not agitate yourself in this way," he said affectionately; "you must not take all our sins upon yourself. Come, be cheerful, Teenie, I have splendid news for you."

"Has the cow calved twins?" said the Laird, laughing, and yet with a kind of grin in the laugh, as if he found it difficult to be cheerful under the circumstances.

Walter's touch revived her, and she looked at him for explanation.

"Better than that, sir; old Geddies sent for me to say that he has determined to resign the church and all its emoluments to me."

"That's four or five hundred a year at least," ejaculated Dalmahoy; "I congratulate you, Wattie—and myself, for now I'll be able to borrow from you."

"Will it save Dalmahoy?" was Teenie's question.

Walter was unable to answer, but the Laird took up the matter.

"You must get Dalmahoy out of your head, Teenie," he said quite blithely; "we'll manage to live without it. Wattie's luck will make you comfortable here, but it can do nothing up the way."

"Unless we could obtain a loan on the strength of this income," suggested Walter.

"Fiddlesticks! we'll try nothing of the kind. We'll keep what we've got, and make the best of it. I'm as blithe as a peacock with a new tail spread out, Wattie; but if I let you sink your good fortune in the whirlpool of mine, may I be—All right, Teenie, I was not going to swear."

Peter Drysdale, upon urgent business, was announced by Ailie. The old butler entered eagerly.

"You bade me bring any letters direct after you, sir, and as you were anxious, I came on with this myself."

The Laird read the letter, and quietly refolded it.

"It's all over, Wattie; I have humbled myself and asked this scoundrel for time to pay. He refuses—says he is pressed for money himself, and that the debt is so long owing, I ought to be ready to redeem it now. So up go the bills for the sale. Now then, gentlemen, here's a fine property, and an ass of an old man—going, going—gone!"

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FIFTH.

WALTER'S TRIAL.

DALMAHOY spoke with a sort of forced levity, but he displayed much more agitation than his son had ever witnessed in his manner before.

"It will be fine fun for our neighbours, and they will show marvellous wisdom in descanting on my ruin," he went on with a half-bitter, half-humorous grin; "throughout the nine days' wonder you will hear them crying, 'Serve him right—what a scamp he was in his young days!—what a wastrail!' and so on, and so on. The worst of it—or the best of it,

I am not sure which—is, that it's all true. Well, sowing wild oats was very nice—for me—and I won't say a word about that; but they produce a confoundedly nasty crop for those who come after me, and that's disagreeable to think about. Good-bye—come over this evening if you can; I would like to have a chat with you, and ask your advice about the arrangement of things for the sale. I must hurry off now to write some letters, and to meet the architect, who is to show me a plan for the improvement of the steadings on the estate. I don't think it will all go; but we'll see. Where's Teenie?"

She had become very quiet; she heard every word that was said, but she was bending over Baby's basket, pretending to be deeply occupied, although healthy and ignorant little Hugh was fast asleep. The crisis had come at last, and her pulses were beating wildly; the pitiless words of Dame Wishart were ringing in her ears, making them burn with pain and shame; and the thought that she alone was accountable for all this misfortune—that but for her there would have been no difficulty in arranging the Laird's affairs—maddened her. There was no news of Skipper Dan yet.

She rose up when Dalmahoy asked for her, and he took her hands kindly.

"You are very feverish, my child; you must take care of yourself for all our sakes—God bless you—good-bye."

"Good-bye," she answered with a curiously trembling voice, and suddenly she put her arms round his neck, kissed him, and ran out of the room.

"That's fine, Teenie; come back and do it again," he cried quite gaily; adding with much satisfaction, "On my soul, Wattie, I feel the better of it."

Every sympathetic word or look supplies an appreciable quantity of nerve-force, and helps a man more than pounds of money. It is so much courage, and therefore so much strength, to a man with the least sincerity in his nature. That was the Laird's experience at this moment.

Walter accompanied him to the gate, where his horse was tied. As he was putting his foot in the stirrup—

"There was a time, Wattie, when I might have been grumbling at you for this; but I see now it's my own fault and my own ill-luck. You were right to marry Teenie; she's a fine creature, and I'm fond of her. Be good to her, and she'll make you happy. As for me, I have been selfish, therefore a fool, and I am punished."

"I too have been selfish and thoughtless—which is the worse sin?" muttered Walter.

"I don't know, and it doesn't matter," was the answer as he settled himself in the saddle; "but next time you preach, take that text about being" sure your sins will find you out—is it a text or a tract? My sins have found me out at any rate, or rather they have caught me at home, and they are using the lash without mercy. I'll tell you a secret—but don't be too hard on me, Wattie: we are none of us pretty under the microscope, and poverty is about the most unsparing microscope I ever heard tell of. That fellow, Geordie Methven, was my son, and there he has left a million which nobody is like to get the least good of, and here am I, his father, about to be made a beggar for want of a few thousands. It's hard lines, take it how you will. Good-bye—take care of Teenie—she's not well."

He rode away without giving Walter time for reply. The revelation was startling enough, but scarcely so startling as it would have been had not Walter, at various periods, heard faint rumours of the paternity of George Methven. The case did seem a hard one, and, minister though he was, he pitied rather than blamed his father. At the same time he experienced a sharp pang at the thought that Methven should have been capable of amassing wealth which would have relieved their father of all trouble, whilst he seemed to be scarcely capable of struggling above poverty.

He pulled himself up at that; he had adopted a career which was full of possibilities for serving others; he was bound in honour to accept all its responsibilities and difficulties with brave steadiness of heart, and he would do so—please God.

A quiet nature, full of devotion to religion, and to the practical expression of it by helping all so far as in him lay, by blaming none—that was Walter. He was capable of pitying the most atrocious criminal; he was so conscious of weakness in himself that he was sorry for the errors of others, and whilst he condemned the sins, he was merciful to the sinners. Always he argued, "Under the same circumstances, I might have acted like them." And so he was kind, gentle, and helpful to the backslider, because he pitied and sympathised with him or her.

He attended the funerals of Red Sandy, Buckie Willie, and of other unfortunate fishers who had perished in the recent storm, and whose bodies had been recovered from the sea. The entire male population of Rowanden paid the last mark of respect to their dead comrades; the women kept indoors, as, according to custom, they were not permitted to proceed to the churchyard.

From the top of the hill the procession looked like a long dark line curving to the bends of the road, and moving with slow solemnity up the hill towards the church. Most of the men were dressed in black suits, all in black coats. The coffins were conveyed in carts the greater part of the way; but when near the church they were taken upon the shoulders of stalwart fishermen, the carts drawing to one side, to permit the procession to pass. All spoke in undertones, as if they were afraid of disturbing the repose of the dead. The conversation generally related to the deceased friends; their many good and kindly qualities were affectionately remembered; all their faults were forgotten. But there were also occasional references to the state of the weather and the prospects of the next night's fishing.

It was a bleak day; there had been rain, the grass was heavily wet; and the "Razor" was blowing keenly over the land, compelling the mourners to put up their hands to their hats, tossing their hair, and flapping the tails of their coats.

There were a number of gigs and other vehicles following in the wake of the procession—farmers, extensive fish-curers, and others, from Kingshaven, amongst whom was the provost, five proprietors who had to attend a meeting of heritors, and Mr. Forsyth, banker, lawyer, and factor to Sir James Scott, the patron of Rowanden Kirk. Mr. Forsyth had been summoned by the old minister, Mr. Geddis, in regard to the latter's proposed resignation.

The burial over, the fishers returned to the village, and enjoyed a holiday. There was mourning for a little while, and many regrets for those who were lost. But work must be done: the mourning was soon over; women gathered bait and men went out to the fishing just as usual—laughed and made merry when they were in luck, and grumbled when they were out of it. There is a merciful buoyancy in human nature, and ordinary sorrow, as well as ordinary joy, only touches the heart and is gone.

Walter had several unpleasant experiences to endure this day, and he had need of all his patience. He had to listen to some severe reflections upon himself—he could bear that: but he had also to listen to disagreeable reflections upon his wife, offered to him in the form of condolence, and that he could not bear. To the surprise of everybody, he defended Teenie with a vehemence which he had not previously displayed out of the pulpit. He would not permit one word to be said in her dispraise; they might say what they pleased about himself, and he was mute; but touch her name, and he was up in arms, fierce as a raging lion.

Mr. Pettigrew, with his partiality for unpleasant truths (and possibly with some recollection of the way in which the young minister had snubbed him on various occasions), was the first to hint that, as an elder, he could not possibly give his sanction to the appointment of Mr. Burnett as the successor of the much-respected Mr. Geddis, until certain scandals connected with his household were investigated by the presbytery, and satisfactorily explained to them.

Walter writhed under this vulgar publicity of his household troubles, and his first impulse was to refuse the appointment altogether; but that would be to cast a doubt upon his faith in Teenie, and so he said quietly that he would not permit Mr. Pettigrew, or any one else, to interfere with his private affairs. It was torture to him to speak in this way, for he felt how weak it was without explanations, which he could not give even to friends, and which he would not give in the presence of such a man as Pettigrew. Then again came the thought to turn away at once from the thankless task he had undertaken; and that suggestion was met by the resolve to hold his place, even for her sake, and to defend her honour by showing his own faith in her. But it is easier to spoil a good impression than to erase a bad one, and he had much to endure for days afterwards. People looked at him askance, whispered about his affairs, pitied him; and a few members of his congregation (those who had declared he was not "sound" after his defence of the poor woman who had been charged with selling sweeties on the Sabbath) openly expressed their disapproval of Mrs. Burnett's conduct, and of the minister's in defending her.

It was hard to bear, but he did not flinch or falter. His chief anxiety was to keep the scandal from Teenie's ears; and in this desire he was successful, but the source of his success was a sad one.

On reaching home after the harassing work of the day, Ailie told him that Teenie had gone to Craighburn.

"To Craighburn—what for?" he exclaimed.

"I canna say, but she got Drysdale to take her in the gig."

"Did my father know?"

"He was away before she started."

Walter had no difficulty in guessing the object of her journey; and, worn out by the events and discussions of the forenoon, he felt irritated with her for going to see his aunt without consulting him. Frowning, he put on his hat again, took his staff, and went out to meet her.

END OF CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FIFTH.

A CHAT ON COMMON STAIRS.

N an iron-grey street hard by the Edinburgh College, I once had lodgings on, or rather off, a common stair. The bed in which I slept was the one in which the English opium-eater died. My sitting-room had been his; and when I called to mind that he had written his musically-stately prose on the table upon which I scribbled, I could not help considering myself an interloper there. The relics he had left were interesting rather than magnificent: a worn-out little brush, with which he swept up his hearth, and a hat which must have been wreathed, so to speak, with the recollections of many a lustrum of his life—a hat that ought to have been venerable, but that unfortunately did not appear so to all to whom it was proudly exhibited. The opium-eater's tastes in costume were latterly, perhaps always, eccentric. At any rate, the grey-haired Phillis who waited upon me in those Edinburgh chambers informed me that he could rarely bring his mind to order clothes, and never to purchase a whole suit at once: now a coat, now a waistcoat, and anon a pair of pantaloons—dissecta membra—she was sent forth to buy for her literary lodger. Once he desired her to procure him a pepper-and-salt coat, lined with red. In his latest years, her "bonnie wee gentleman," as Phillis called him, used to lean upon her arm when he took his walks abroad. When he had been coaxed into dining out, she escorted him to his host's door, to make sure of his keeping his appointment, and called again in the evening to "convoy" him home. At other times he hired a trap, and took Phillis and her niece out into the country to dine. He also took them, or rather went with them as paymaster, to the theatre, and was not in the least disconcerted by the remarks which were passed on his odd dress and queer companions. More than once Phillis had found him in a state of reverie, and also of combustion, his head-propping papers being alight—had come into his room just in time to save him. An irreverent friend of mine, having been informed of this fact, exclaimed fervently—

"Thank goodness I'm not a genius! Just fancy the servant bringing in a pail of water like a coal-scuttle, to stand ready to put you out the next time you caught fire!"

Although a writer on political economy, it is well known that De Quincey had peculiarities of private economics. In "The Book-hunter," if I remember rightly, a story is told of his having tried to pawn a fifty-pound note for five shillings. He was not troubled, I think, with many fifty-pound notes in his old age; but Phillis told me that some of his few one-pound notes he gave away to pensioners, when he had carefully brushed and smoothed the dirty, greasy, crumpled billets. Sovereigns and shillings he likewise gave away, when he had scoured them as if they had been dirty sheep.

That Lothian Street common stair is the first I ever mounted in Scotland; but I have been up many a Scotch one since. Some weird stories are told of the Edinburgh common stairs. There is one in the Lawnmarket on which, in the small hours, may be heard the fall of an invisible, intangible foot, ceaselessly going up and down, with solemn slowness. And then there is the stair at whose foot lay poor Begbie, the robbed bank-porter, stabbed with a bread-knife, on whom the little lassie, running out to fill her kettle at the well, trod and stumbled in the winter dusk. And many another such-like tale might very probably be told, with truth, of stairs which have no recorded history.

The old common stairs, however, are invitingly curious places to explore. Edinburghers are very fond of talking about their New Town. No doubt it is well enough in its way, but really it is nothing very wonderful per se. For interest, commend me to the filthy Old Town. I have been in some of the worst slums of London, but the Edinburgh Canongate and Cowgate distance them in dirt. On the other hand, London "rookeries" cannot compete with those of Edinburgh in picturesque appearance and historical association.

In spite of its smells, which rival in malodorous multitude the odours of Cologne, the Canongate was a favourite lounge of mine in my Edinburgh days. The Netherbow is a fit vestibule to it; the well, girt with bare-footed, "muted" and besmuted, short-petticoated gossips; John Knox's house, with its fore-stairs, projecting floors, quaint blinking windows, big and little, ancient inscriptions, and the Reformer, in his miniature pulpit. John Knox, with his "LVFE-GOD-ABVFE-AL-AND-YI-NYCHTBOVR-ASYI-SELF" looks down in stonily-speaking silence on a strange congregation now-a-days. Broad-shouldered, high-checkboned men, with blue bonnets pulled down on their ears, loiter about, scenting the air with rank tobacco and fiery whisky, and scowling at the policeman who threads the loafing throngs. Short-skirted girls in brown-holland jackets, with bare, grease-plastered hair, patrol in couples, tranquilly knitting. Lean, harsh-featured, dirty-fleshed women, in skimp rags as dirty, cluster round barrow-women to match, and chaffer over strong-scented fish. Not here does the buxom Newhaven fishwife, with snowy mutch, well turned and shod and stockinged leg, good-natured bronzed face, clear eye, brazenly over-pricing, silverily-wheeling, liquidly "Caller-ou"-chanting tongue, blue gown and striped petticoat, ply her trade. More rags dangle wet, but not washed, from the rake-like clothes-frames, and their rope-rigging, which project, flat above flat, from the many-windowed "lands." Foul-mouthed in two senses is the head of each cramped and crowded "close" and "wynd." And as is the Netherbow, so is the Canongate, Edinburgh's court-suburb of old.

Here is an inscription which may still be read upon its walls: "MISERERE MEI, DOMINE: A PECCATO, PROBRO, DEBITO, ET MORTE SUBITA, LIBERA ME." There seems to be a "prophetic strain" in the old lettering in the midst of so much poverty, unbridled passion, and its consequences.

On a common stair in a street off the Canongate, Smollett lived for a time, picking up character according to his wont; but in his days the locality was still a far more "respectable" quarter of the town than it is now. In the same street with Smollett lived Lord Monkeys-with-their-tails-worn-down Monboddoo. In Moray House, Cromwell lodged, and from its balcony the Marchioness of Argyll spat upon Montrose. The Heart of Midlothian has vanished, but the Canongate Tolbooth still stands, or did stand very recently, projecting its fryingpan-like dial, as if to warm the dreary-looking house over the way, which once was the Duchess of Gordon's. In the Canongate graveyard lie Robert Ferguson and Adam Smith, who lived hard by, and used, according to Dr. Robert Chambers, to rob his own sugar-basin when his domineering house-keeper's back was turned. Gay has been at Queensberry House, which the notorious "old Q." found so dull that he dismantled it. In the White Horse Inn, Boswell found Johnson growling at the waiter for presuming to make sugar-tongs of his grubby fingers. At the foot of the Canongate a line of stones let in across the road marks off the Sanctuary of Holyrood, within which many men of many manners have sought refuge.

It was an old not-up-to-time charwoman, however, of whom I was in search when I first explored a Canongate common stair. I knew her name, but that, like her stair, was a common one; the number of her "land" I also knew, but such numbers seemed to be scattered about very much at random in the Canongate; I had further been informed that a pawnbroker tenanted the first floor of the lofty land in which she lived, much nearer to the stars; but although other forms of relationship may be cold in Canongate, it abounds in omnirecipient "uncles."

Accordingly, up and down I had to wander through crowds of ragged, dirty, depressed, or fiercely-wrangling people, clustered in doorways, languidly strolling, or squatting frog-like in the street, beneath a dreary array of old clothes hung out to dry, drooping like very unvenerable tattered banners in the air, whose sickly malodours a hot August sun brought out in almost overpowering potency. At length, by good luck, I found the stair I wanted—a lantern staircase, bulging from the building like a huge lanky candle-box. The doorway was blocked with little children, who seemed never to have been washed since they opened their sullenly defiant eyes on the filthy section of the world into which they had been born. They squatted sturdily in serried rows, making no attempt to move. I had to stride over their heads to mount the mud-caked steps. On the first flat there were brass plates upon the doors, but above that there could be no mistake that the tenants were of the poorest of the poor. Flight after flight of stairs I panted up, until I reached the topmost landing—a passage bare of everything but dirt, but light in comparison with some of the dungeon-like corridors I had passed.

On the floor sat a girl cuddling a baby. I asked her at which door I must knock for my old woman, whereupon she nodded impartially, one after the other, at all—over and over again—with a good-natured but idiotic smile. In one room I found a mite of a child, who could not speak plainly, left in charge of two tinier babes. In another dark room lay a bristly-bearded man “sleeping off the drink.” In a third a poor girl, bearing the hectic finger-marks of consumption on her pinched cheeks, was spitting blood—“nursed” by an old hag who was swearing at her. In a fourth den a grey-haired cobbler was bristling and waxing his shoemaking thread.

At last I found my old woman, acting as “howdie” to her married daughter who had recently been confined.

The young mother, on whose breast lay the little red-headed new-comer, seemed to think it the most natural thing in the world that I should be asked into the room, and invited to drink her health and the baby's in a glass of whisky, the bottle being brought from under the bed. Four other bairns—fortunately just about to be packed off to the Queen's Park—were staring at their new brother or sister.

When the father returned to his one-roomed home in the evening, I wonder whether he considered himself a very blessed man on finding another shaft in his full quiver. Every drop of water the family used had to be brought up all those flights of stairs. The young mother had been toiling up them with bucketfuls upon her head only the day before.

To those who have lived long on the Continent there is nothing strange in “flat” house-keeping; the system is being adopted in fashionable quarters of London, and in unfashionable London it has long been in vogue, in fact though not in name; but to most Englishmen, on a first visit to Edinburgh, it has been a novelty to note fishmongers', spirit-sellers', fruiterers', butchers', and bakers' shops down in the basement, with piles of private flats above—crushing them down, as it were, into still greater obscurity—and the door swinging open and closing so mysteriously, no porter appearing, between its many-handled and many-plated jambs.

But there are common stairs that have no doors, or doors which are seldom closed, and these are not so pleasant. To say nothing of other annoyances, it is not exactly agreeable, on your way to or from your home, to be tripped up by a warm, growling bundle of something, and to find that a drunken man—drowsily indignant at being disturbed—has made his bed upon your common stair.

On the whole, I most decidedly prefer the “self-contained” system of house-keeping. Let people say what they like, it is far more difficult to avoid, willy nilly, making acquaintance, or getting into quarrels, either personally or by servant-proxy, with vertical neighbours you pass on a stair, than with lateral neighbours you pass in a street. In Glasgow I had my most disagreeable experience of the vertical system. Slumbering on a second flat, I dreamt that I heard the voice of many waters. Waking up, with my little household, in a very damp condition, I found that water was cascading down the common staircase, rushing under my front-door, swirling about the floors, and rapidly distilling in very dirty dew through the ceilings, a portion of which giving way, my snug little kingdom up two flights of stairs was deluged with a most unsavoury shower-bath of muddy water, sodden laths, cow's hair, and plaster.

The vertical neighbours next above me had, considerably, gone to bed leaving their water-tap running.

RICHARD ROWE.

NATURE'S WONDERS.

In the year 1702, the celebrated Dutch zoologist, Leuwenhoek, on examining microscopically the refuse of a gutter in his house-top, discovered the first of the curious animalcules, the history of which it is our purpose very briefly in the present paper to trace. The attention of the naturalist had been drawn to the red colour and appearance of the rain-water which had collected in the gutter, and seized with the laudable curiosity to investigate the cause of this phenomenon, he placed a drop of this water under the object-glass of his microscope; and then he tells us that he saw disporting themselves in the water an immense number of animalcules. “The largest of these,” writes Leuwenhoek. “viewed through the microscope, did not appear bigger than a large grain of sand to the naked eye; the size of the others was gradually less and less; they were, for the most part, of a round shape, and in the green ones the middle part of their bodies was of a yellowish colour. He further describes in comparatively minute detail the structure of these little creatures; the chief points in his description of their external characters being "certain short and slender organs or limbs, which were protruded a little way out of their bodies, by means of which they caused a kind of circular motion and current in the water." Then Leuwenhoek also saw the animalcules at rest, and observed that they fixed themselves to the glass by means of a short stalk or "tail."

Such was the account given by this acute observer of the first "wheel-animalcule" that had found its way to human observation and research; and to the form thus discovered, the name of Rotifer vulgaris was given. Leuwenhoek, at a later period, also discovered another form of wheel-animalcule, the Meliceria; and his contemporaries and successors added greatly to the number of different kinds or species, without, however, making any effort to correctly determine their relations and affinities with other animalcules.

This latter task, first begun by Ehrenberg, has of late years been very fully completed, and we now know sufficient of their history to distinctly separate out the wheel-animalcules from among all other minute organisms, and to assign to them a definite place in the great series of animal forms.

The Rotifera, or wheel-animalcules, then, are inhabitants of all our fresh-water ponds and pools, and are also found in the refuse of gutters, and in most other situations where water collects and tends to become stagnant. Regarding the external characters by which they are distinguished, we note first in order of importance the possession, at the anterior portion of the body, of a curious disc, furnished with minute, vibratile, eye-lash-like filaments, known as "cilia." The motion of these cilia gives to the disc the appearance of a revolving wheel; and to watch these animalcules rushing through the miniature sea in which they are contained, apparently propelled by this front paddle-wheel, affords one of the most curious and interesting sights which the microscope discloses to the ordinary observer.

But it must, at the outset, be remarked that the appearance of this revolving "wheel," from which the class derives its name, is only illusory. The observer, watching these animalcules in motion, would firmly believe that the wheel-like disc borne on the head or front portion of the animalcule's body, actually revolves. Such, however, is not the case.

The illusion or impression is always produced by the motion of the minute filaments, or cilia, with which the disc is fringed. These filaments, moving rapidly in succession, give the appearance of the revolving wheel. The disc itself is therefore fixed, and it is the cilia that move. This action has been compared to the rising and falling of the waves on the shore, where the waves seem to be continuously moving forward, whereas they only rise and fall in succession. And the same appearance or illusion is seen on looking at a field of full-grown corn or wheat, set in motion by the summer breezes. The observer would imagine that regular waves were passing across the field, whereas the undulating motion is produced simply by the bending of the individual and fixed stalks of grain.

The older observers, however, fully believed in the actual motion of the wheel-discs of the Rotifera; but better microscopes, with higher powers, and the close study of these animalcules, have shown us the error of the earlier naturalists, and confirmed us in the true explanation of the cause of motion in these forms.

The presence of the wheel-disc, with its moving cilia or filaments, thus forms the chief feature which distinguishes the Rotifera from their numerous neighbours. But in addition to this first character, the possession of a distinct structure, exhibiting peculiar points of interest, constitutes a no less efficient mode of recognising them. And lastly, certain extraordinary features connected with the suspension of their vitality must also be noticed, as tending to form a life-history among the most remarkable that the study of modern zoology has disclosed.

In habits and conformation, the wheel-animalcules may either be fixed or free-swimming organisms. By far the greater number of the Rotifera belong to the free-swimming group; and curiously enough, as if in compliment to the so-called "weaker sex," the females attain a much greater size and development in this class. The males are generally small and diminutive as compared with their female neighbours, and in many points of structure the males evince a decided inferiority to the opposite sex.

In size Rotifera are all minute, although they attain dimensions which seem large when compared with the generality of their animalcular neighbours. The largest Rotifera measure about one-thirty-sixth part of an inch in length, but many of them do not exceed the hundredth part of an inch.

The internal economy of the wheel-animalcules has been already remarked to evince a high degree of organisation. Thus we find that the mouth opens at the lower aspect of the ciliated "wheel-organ," and within the throat we generally observe a complicated apparatus of "jaws," suited for the trituration and mastication of food. Then, in addition, we find a definite stomach-sac, intestine, and digestive glands, constituting a perfect system for the assimilation of food.

We have no knowledge of any distinct heart and system of blood-vessels in the Rotifera, but a very peculiar arrangement of vessels exists, to which the name of the "water-vascular" system has been given.

This system, concerning the nature of which naturalists are still in doubt, consists of two tubes that open from a contractile, bladder-like sac at the posterior extremity of the body, and then run forwards, one along each side of the body, to the anterior part of the animalcule. Each tube bears a number of pear-shaped sacs, in the interior of which cilia are contained.

The contractile sac from which these tubes take origin, is seen to contract and expand in a regular manner, as if employed in the propulsion of some fluid throughout the system of tubes. Some authorities favour the view that this system represents an excretory apparatus, serving like the respiratory or breathing-system, to excrete part of the waste materials from the body. And although eminent authorities differ from the above view, it nevertheless appears to be that which obtains most support from the actual investigation of these forms.

A large mass of nervous matter placed towards the wheel-organ, constitutes the nervous centre of the Rotifera, and associated with this centre a pigment spot, or "eye," is found. It is worthy of remark that the nervous mass of the Rotifera is said to be proportionally larger, when compared with the size of the body, than the brain and nervous system of the higher animals.

Then, lastly, we must observe the high development of the muscles of the body, and the so-called "foot-organ." This latter consists of a pair of forcep-like pincers situated at the posterior extremity of the body, and by means of which the free-swimming animalcules can fix themselves at will. In some, a suctorial organ appears to replace the pincer-like foot; whilst in the fixed Rotifers a permanent root-like process secures the animalcule to any fixed object. In some forms a shelly covering protects the body. And as to the functions of the wheel-organ, these are two-fold in nature. The first use of the ciliary movements is obviously that of locomotion in the free-swimming forms. But in all Rotifera, whether locomotive or fixed, the currents excited in the water subserve the important function of nutrition, in that particles of nutrient matter are thereby swept into the mouth, and thus brought within reach of the digestive system.

We thus see that within a body of so minute dimensions as those of an ordinary Rotifer, a wondrous complexity of organisation may be contained.

But a more wonderful part of the history of these animalcules yet remains to be told. And this last recital bears a very remarkable aspect when we particularly keep in mind the intricately delicate structure of their bodies, and the general complexity of their frame.

These latter remarks have reference to the peculiar faculty possessed by the Rotifera, in virtue of which they may exist in a dried, mummified state for considerable periods of time, and yet be restored, by the addition of a little moisture, to all their wonted vigour and pristine vitality.

Thus they may be dried up by the heat of the summer sun from the pools in which they reside. They may be blown about as mere dried dust-specks by the summer winds, and in this condition they may persist for months, or even years! Yet upon being simply moistened with a drop of water, the mummified Rotifers immediately resume all the functions of their life. The wheel-discs begin once more their illusory rotations, the little food-particles are again swept into the mouth, the systems of the body again begin operating as of old, and the current of life flows on as energetically as before, and as if no serious suspension of its functions had taken place.

Leuwenhoek himself was aware of this peculiar faculty, for he tells us of experiments he made, in which several of these Rotifera were resuscitated, after having been dried up and shrivelled, so strongly indeed that "one could see the wrinkles in them."

Professor Owen tells us of an animalcule having been resuscitated after four years' desiccation; and Dr. Carpenter possessed two Rotifers which had been desiccated and recovered six times in succession.

In what condition was the life of these animalcules? we may lastly inquire. We know that life was still present, since they could be revived, and because no human skill can revitalize a dead animal or plant. Hence we assume in the case of the Rotifera, and in the case of the dried-up seeds of plants, that life is present in a "dormant" or "potential" state—its functions suspended, it is true, but only wanting the necessary conditions to be at once set in operation, and to manifest their vital activity as before.

We must distinguish, however, between "reviving" and "revitalising." We cannot revitalize; we may only revive. Revitalisation is the bringing back of life which has departed; reviving is the restoring or awakening of life which has merely been suspended—as in the case of the half-drowned man, or as in the parched Rotifer—with this important difference, however, that in the case of humanity we pull the subject out of the water whilst in the Rotifer we once again immerse it.

YES OR NO?

"RESECHING PREVIOUS ALMS."

DECEMBER'S stars stirred frostily, when first her laughing words
 Won him, another prisoner! and coloured all his dreams.

The buds were breaking through the bark, nest-building were the birds,
 When next her voice ran lightly o'er a dozen merry themes.

As grew the leaves so grew his trust ; yet she was hard to reach ;
As higher spread the summer arch, so farther stretched his aim.

She should be his ! Yet, apt enough in all that Love can teach,
He speech had none when Hope cried, "Come ;
the happy guerdon claim."

To-night he shares her neighbourhood—alas ! the crowded dance ;

No nearer than the stranger he who would be closer far,

Until they walk apart, and talk, encouraged by a glance,

Glow, warm with wedded feeling, to music without jar.

Long gusts of soothing melody steal through the fan-like palms,

And tremble in the myrtle twigs and float among the flowers,

As these he bends, proud mendicant ! beseeching precious alms—

The sovereign right to call her his through all the coming hours.

Now she is won ! A searching look, and sharp suspense is slain ;

He treads the threshold of his fate, and weighs the quiet days

That lie beyond ; no longer his the half-delicious pain,

The doubting joy of one who winds through Love's perplexing maze.

The sense may fall in whispered words that break upon her lips ;

The fountain of her happy thoughts in speech refuse to flow ;

He never heeds ; so true the touch of those white finger-tips !

In eyes he reads the ready "Yes," though lips half murmur, "No." BYRON WEBBER.

A STROKE OF FATE.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

PASSIONATELY spoken words, that sound strange from the quiet Anna ! They are in German, and De Montbrison does not understand them, but their emphasis strikes him with surprise. He leans forward inquiringly.

"Do you know," he says, "that you addressed me in your own tongue, which sounds very soft and sweet from your lips, but which I do not comprehend ? I notice that you relapse into German whenever deep emotion is aroused within you. Tell me, in my own language, what you said."

"I wished that you had never come to Germany—never been a prisoner, that is—never known what you call the "disaster" of Sedan. You are right, monsieur. I am sorry—bitterly sorry—for your misfortunes. I do pity your position here, and I earnestly admire your gallant struggle to sustain its troubles manfully. I wish you back, monsieur, in the land which is dear to you. With all my heart, I wish you happily restored to the friends whom you love—who, doubtless, love you very tenderly."

Anna's hand trembles on the Frenchman's arm. As she enters, with De Montbrison, the lighted town, the glare of the street-lamps falls upon her pale, troubled face. She turns persistently from her companion's gaze.

General von Fehrenstein's residence is reached at last : a tall quaint house, standing in a quaint old street. Very quiet, very picturesque. Gable-end without number, a queer carved doorway, small irregular windows—these are the characteristics of Anna's home, remarked at a glance by casual observers. The basement storey is divided into two large shops, in the windows of which are displayed a choice collection of Christmas gifts.

As she toils up the broad oak staircase, a sound of many voices falls on Anna's ear, and the clock on the landing strikes six—the hour fixed for the souper.

"We are late, monsieur," she says. "Will you hurry into the salon, and announce my speedy appearance ?"

In a few minutes De Montbrison enters the room occupied by his host and hostess, with their guests. There is a buzz of eager, anxious conversation, as he opens the door, but his entrance is the sign for instant silence. The prospects of Paris, doubtless, were under discussion.

De Montbrison is greeted by his host, a grave, stern-looking gentleman, whose manner is dignified and kindly. Then he turns to salute his hostess, a pale, sickly, middle-aged lady, stretched at ease on an invalid sofa.

Embarrassing silence reigns. The Frenchman colours hotly. "I am afraid," he says, "that I interrupt agreeable conversation. Don't let my presence, gentlemen, be any restraint on your mirth."

Then he walks off to a window, near which stands a youth of about sixteen, whom he recognises at a glance.

A keen watchful face, small restless eyes, surmounted by bushy eyebrows, a discontented mouth, an expression of perpetual inquietude, hollow cheeks, a sallow unhealthy complexion, a figure cruelly deformed. Behold the portrait of Franz Siegel.

"Your servant, Monsieur Franz."

"Yours, Monsieur de Montbrison. Do you bring Anna with you, from your long, cold walk?"

"The lady came in with me, certainly. Her toilette, doubtless, engages her present attention."

Franz frowns darkly. "This is not the first long walk that you and she have taken together."

"Decidedly no. I have requested the honour of mademoiselle's companionship in many a saunter. Mademoiselle is complaisance itself."

De Montbrison looks with a curious expression of countenance on the boy's nervous fingers, that clasp and unclasp themselves, that twine and twist into extraordinary contortions, as he speaks.

"I have watched you," he says, and his voice betrays inward rage, "often at a distance when you have not dreamed that my eyes were upon you. I have followed you in the Lust Garten, in the Park, in the town, walking with Anna, and talking, oh! so intently and—what is the word?—I cannot speak your diabolical French—intently and—"

De Montbrison laughs gaily. "I am afraid," he replies, "that I cannot help you, monsieur. I belong, you know, to a nation of deplorable linguists. The French language, which it is your pleasure to call diabolical, is the only one which I comprehend. If you told me in your own charming tongue—a charmingly guttural tongue, Monsieur Franz—the word which puzzles you, I should not understand it. Assuredly we have walked together—mademoiselle and I—in your Lust Garten, your Park, your delightful old town, in the surrounding beautiful country. Of the honour of your constant observation I was not aware—we were not aware. I think I may answer for the lady."

"Do you know, monsieur, that——"

An angry colour deepens in the boy's face; his eyes flash fire; he draws in his breath quickly, and hesitates.

"Do I know? Pardon, monsieur."

"Don't call me 'monsieur.' Your eternal politeness maddens me. I am too young for the title. All the world addresses me as Franz—Franz Siegel. Do you know, I ask, that Anna is betrothed—has been, for years—betrothed to my brother Karl?"

"Yes, I am aware of that fact, Franz Siegel."

"Do you know that my brother Karl is the bravest soldier in our grand German army—the worthiest man—the truest patriot?"

"No, I am not aware of that fact, Franz Siegel."

"I wish to God he were here to night—my dearest brother."

"I reciprocate the wish," says De Montbrison, still laughing gaily. "I should rejoice to welcome all your grand German army back to your grand German land! Pardon me, do you not excite yourself unnecessarily?"

Large angry tears gather in Franz's eyes; his head drops upon his breast; a convulsive sob falls on the Frenchman's ear. The object of the boy's passionate hero-worship, the brother in whose service he would willingly spend his whole life, is far away and in deadly peril—nay, may possibly have already met a premature death. Karl's name arouses a flood of intense emotion.

De Montbrison moves away—pauses—ponders—returns. "Reflect, my friend," he says, "the return of Christmas brings a sad sense of loss to other hearts than yours." Soothingly he lays his hand upon the boy's shoulder.

Then he turns away, towards a lighted Christmas-tree, near which is seated Ida von Monstatt.

"May I recall myself to mademoiselle's remembrance?"

Ida von Monstatt is decidedly pretty, and decidedly cognisant of the fact. An air of conceited affectation detracts from the beauty of her face, from the grace of her manner. Franz Siegel has named her the belle of Wiermar; he refuses to give the pas to Anna von Fehrenstein. De Montbrison is of very different opinion.

"Good evening, monsieur. Best wishes of the season. Our mode of celebrating Christmas is new to you, probably."

"Indeed, yes. New Year's Day is, with us, a far greater fête than Christmas, you know."

"You were in France last New Year's Day?"

Ida speaks in an inquisitive manner. She regards the Frenchman as the lion of the evening—a person to be "brought out."

"Ah, yes. I left Marseilles, I remember, early on New Year's Eve. The new year I spent in Paris."

"You were doubtless very gay."

"I amused myself fairly, mademoiselle. In the evening I attended a soirée at the house of the Duchesse de Valmont. Mademoiselle has heard of the duchesse?"

Mademoiselle's face seems to defy the Frenchman to mention any celebrated name with which she is not familiar.

"Mon Dieu! how vividly I see again the scene in which I moved that night! A charming room, furnished in the style of Louis Quatorze—windows looking down upon the Boulevard—delectable society—the crème de la crème of Paris—men of science, letters, art—above all, of brilliant conversational powers; ladies of unspeakable fascination—a terrestrial Paradise opens to the view. And yet —and yet”—De Montbrison checks himself in some embarrassment, and bows profoundly—“amid all the blaze of beauty that dazzled the eyes of the duchesse's guests that New Year's evening, one might look in vain for such transcendent loveliness as shines upon us to-night.”

The Frenchman's face wears an inscrutable expression. No irony tinges his voice, or looks from his eyes. His manner is perfectly quiet and polite.

Ida toys languidly with some choice flowers that lie in her lap. She makes no reply to De Montbrison's speech.

“What a monster of a Christmas-tree! Tell me, mademoiselle, are all these articles that deck its branches to be given away to-night?”

“Every one. Each guest will be presented with some token of friendship. Ah! do not fear. Monsieur de Montbrison is not likely to be forgotten.”

A swift coquettish glance Ida directs towards her companion. He does not see it.

His eyes are turned eagerly to the door, which now opens widely, only to admit a servant.

“You are looking for Anna,” Ida exclaims in a half-angry tone. “She has not yet made her appearance.”

“Pardon. For whom should I look in my present neighbourhood?”

Another low bow.

“Confess to me, monsieur—you admire Anna immensely?”

“I admire beauty—I pay homage to beauty—whenever I meet it.”

With a courteous inclination, and a meaning glance, Ida tosses her pretty head, and then looks simperingly down.

“Monsieur speaks German?”

“Barely a word.”

“Is it possible? Monsieur remarks how seldom one meets a German lady who cannot speak at least two languages?”

“The ladies of mademoiselle's country are as accomplished as they are beautiful.”

“Beautiful! Oh, fie, monsieur!” Ida raises her fan chidingly—then threatens to brain the Frenchman with a camellia. “We are better educated than your countrywomen, doubtless.” (This with an air of good-humoured superiority.) “For myself, I read with ease at the age of ten years the works of your poet, Racine. You call him a poet, I presume. Ah! you will never know the meaning of the word till you can study, in the original, the masterpieces of our Schiller and Goethe.”

De Montbrison reddens, but his self-possession is perfect.

“Monsieur is musical?”

Monsieur adores music.

“Monsieur studies, of course, only the productions of the great masters—Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn? How strange that monsieur's country should not have produced any musical genius whatever!”

Again monsieur reddens, but again he bows profoundly.

“The souper, gentlemen,” exclaims, in a loud voice, General von Fehrenstein. “Monsieur de Montbrison, will you conduct the Frau my wife?”

Anna has entered now, and joins the procession to the room devoted to the evening repast. One rapid glance the Frenchman directs towards her as she quietly salutes her friends. A strange hectic flush brightens her face; a curious light shines in her blue eyes. De Montbrison sighs deeply as he gazes.

Souper! A substantial meal, to which ample justice is done by the general's guests. Green-corn soup, sausages of wonderful appearance, and more wonderful taste, greasy hams, cheeses of remarkable hue, an abundance of Rhine wine. And all these articles of consumption are duly appreciated.

“You are English, Fräulein,” De Montbrison remarks abruptly to a young lady seated beside him—a lady with a pale, plain face, which he instinctively likes—“English, I see at a glance. Tell me—the extraordinary viands that grace this table are as startling to your mind as to my own?”

“Oh, no,” is the reply, delivered in a frank, pleasant voice; “I am more German than English in my habits and tastes. My father has been English pastor in this town for the last eighteen years, and my remembrance of my own country is a very vague one.”

“And you really like this Germany?”

“I really like this Germany. And you?”

The Frenchman shrugs his shoulders, and shakes his head violently.

“I hate it cordially.”

“And its inhabitants?”

“Its inhabitants above all. Cold-blooded, inflexible prigs, devoid of breeding, of refinement, of feeling. Within the last ten minutes I have been informed by a lady in this company that my country has produced never a poet, never a musical genius—that my countrywomen possess no education—that—alas, for the manners of these educated Germans!”

“A lady in this company. Surely you don't refer to my dear friend, Anna von Fehrenstein! I won't hear one word against Anna, I give you notice, monsieur,” exclaims the English girl bluntly.

“Believe me, I should be the last to speak that word,” returns the Frenchman gravely. “The lady is not German—not German in mind or manner. She stands alone, unapproachable among her compatriots. Listen, Fräulein: Mademoiselle von Fehrenstein realises my ideal of perfection. The reverence with which she inspires me increases daily—hourly. Not one of the hasty words which I have spoken against the German boors, applies to the Fräulein von Fehrenstein."

"I am glad to hear that you bestow honour where honour is due," answers the English girl very simply. "Anna von Fehrenstein is betrothed, you know," she adds in a serious tone of voice.

The company rises. An adjournment to the room lately quitted takes place. The Frenchman walks quickly off, after a hasty, graceless bow to his late companion.

"Betrothed!" he angrily murmurs through his clenched teeth. "Am I to hear from every tongue of the good fortune of the detestable Karl?"

Anna advances to the lighted Christmas-tree, and breaking from its branches gift after gift, commences to distribute them among the guests. De Montbrison, gazing intently on her, thinks he has never seen her look half so lovely as she looks to-night.

"Franz Siegel."

Anna turns nervously round as she calls the name. The boy comes sulkily forward, and takes from her hand a roll of uncut music. He murmurs some ungracious words of thanks, and, standing close at her side, watches her with angry eyes.

"Monsieur de Montbrison."

Anna's face is suddenly dyed crimson; her voice trembles. A scowl gathers on Franz's face. The Frenchman advances.

"You will not, I hope, monsieur, refuse to accept this trifle, which my mother and I venture to offer, in accordance with our national custom. The workmanship is—is—" (the girl's timid voice sinks almost to a whisper)—"the workmanship is French."

She holds towards De Montbrison a cigar-case, curiously embroidered in rich silk.

"The workmanship is French." Simple words, simply spoken; but they affect the Frenchman visibly. He shades his face with his hand; in absolute silence he takes the offered gift—in absolute silence places it near his heart.

"You are not offended, monsieur?"

"Offended?" De Montbrison raises his head. There is in his eyes a passionate fire, from which Anna shrinks.

"Your gift shall never leave me, mademoiselle—never."

"Monsieur, monsieur!" cries the sharp voice of Ida von Monstatt, "the general is organising a game at the Schlüssel Spiel. You will need preliminary instruction. Come and receive a lesson."

END OF CHAPTER THE SECOND.

ORANGES-AND THEIR GROWING.

THE islands of the Azores owe their wonderful fertility to the nature of their soil, which gives evident signs of an eruptive origin. That of St. Michael, which is the home of the celebrated oranges, has evidently been in two islands, the interval between having been filled up by cinders and lava. Numbers of volcanic cones are found in this space, and streams of lava have poured the detritus over the rocky ground, which, when modified by the humidity of the sea, constitutes a vegetable carth of incomparable fruitfulness.

This favoured spot is divided and sub-divided into enclosures, surrounded by high walls, and designated in the country by the name of "quintas." Here the orange is cultivated. Hundreds of thousands are yearly gathered, embarked, and transported to the London market. There is probably no district in the world where the culture produces so much in so small a space. The tree does not belong to the primitive flora of St. Michael. The precise time when it was introduced is unknown, but it was certainly soon after the discovery of the islands. Botanists believe it to belong to the eastern countries of Asia, and admit that it was only brought to Europe in the fifteenth century. A hundred years after that it was largely cultivated at St. Michael's, at which time the flower, neglected in the present day, furnished to the distillers a large quantity of exquisite essence.

The exportation of oranges was not much developed until the middle of the last century, whilst the war, and continental blockade, which ruined other commerce, seemed rather to favour it. The close alliance which was then established between England and Portugal created commercial relations, and a market for an unlimited supply of the products of St. Michael. The culture of oranges has thus very considerably increased during the last thirty years, and the manner of cultivation has much improved.

In former days the plants were left unsheltered. They were planted at great distances from one another, thus forming magnificent trees, covering a large surface of ground, one of which would bear from fifteen to twenty thousand oranges. A heavy stone was laid on the top of the tree, to force the branches out in a lateral direction, and to keep a low level, so that the wind might not destroy them.

This system has, however, been entirely abandoned, as the damage was so great during the fearful storms of winter blowing over the Atlantic. A tempestuous night sufficed to cover the ground with oranges, and thus destroy a fine harvest. On some occasions the trees were themselves uprooted, or torn to pieces; besides which, the delicate buds coming out in spring generally suffered much from the damp saline spray brought from the sea by the wind. The idea was then adopted of enclosing the trees in small plots, surrounded by trees; but it was soon discovered that the shadow prevented the growth and ripening of the fruit; and it was not until 1845 that the present system was finally adopted. The quintas are now squares of from forty to fifty yards across, whilst stone walls, from three to six yards high, surround them. The strongest blasts are broken against these masses of thick basaltic blocks, the unhewn surfaces of which are mortared together. Within this rampart a hedge of the faya-tree is closely planted, and thus forms a green curtain several yards in height.

After many attempts to discover the kind of tree which suited best for a shelter, this native of the island has been unanimously chosen. For many years the cultivators tried the Pittosporum undulatum, an elegant evergreen tree imported from Australia. The beauty of its leaves and the rapidity of its growth seduced the eye; but it exhausted the land and interfered with the growth of the trees it was used to protect. The laurel of the Canary Islands, and also that of India, possessed good foliage and quick growth, but their roots extended too far into the ground. The faya, on the contrary, improves the land, as its dead leaves form an excellent manure. Not only does it leave the trees which are planted near it all the nourishing juices, but it is found that many other varieties, such as the oak and elm, thrive better near it than when planted alone. Near the sea, however, the Pittosporum is used, as it resists the dust and salt from the sea better than the faya. During the time necessary for these trees to grow, the land is sown with a kind of broom, which is destroyed after three or four years. Some cultivators think that the quality of the orange has suffered from this protection, both air and sun being intercepted; but time is required to solve so difficult a problem, as well as a continuous series of observations.

The ground of the plantations must be ploughed and tilled for four or five years. After that twice a year it undergoes a superficial ploughing. The lupin is often sown and dug into the land with a hoe, to improve it. This plant plays a large part in the agriculture of the Azores. The volcanic soil spontaneously furnishes flint, salts of potash, and phosphates. If it contained azote, any additional manure would be unnecessary. This is exactly what the lupin is so rich in at its maturity; thus it is pulled up and dug in to complete the natural richness. Then the ground will yield, without rest, two harvests in the year; and melons, cucumbers, and pumpkins, which with us require special beds, prosper in the common soil.

Every year the dead wood is cut out, and the shoots thinned; but, as a rule, the orange-tree is never pruned. In dry seasons it is well watered if the supply be near, and sufficient in quantity. The trees are planted in a quincunx, leaving between them a distance of twelve or fifteen yards; and from the first year the cultivator looks for some fruit as a reward for his labours, though the tree does not enter into full bearing for ten years. Then, if it be healthy, and planted in good earth, it yields from one thousand to fifteen hundred oranges yearly. An old and vigorous tree, whose branches are long and well-thinned, furnishes the immense harvest of seven or eight thousand. In those quintas which are too large, the medium does not exceed six hundred fruits, whilst the smaller ones bear from two to three thousand, showing how much good shelter and care will do towards increasing the crop.

There are six principal varieties of sweet oranges cultivated in the Azores. The common one is of middle size, slightly acid, and very sweet-scented. The skin is thin, and adheres well to the fruit, becoming a little thicker towards the end of the season. The Comprida is more aromatic than the preceding one, and also more acid. This tree is rarely loaded with fruit. Under the name of the Silver Orange is designated a much smaller one, with very firm flesh, extremely fine skin, and a greenish yellow colour. The Selecta, or choice orange, is large, of first-rate flavour, little acidity, and of a deep yellow colour. It has scarcely any pips, and does not ripen until April, which gives it a higher value. The Ombigo is flatter, and sweet, whilst it furnishes the largest crop of all. Finally comes the Mandarin, which differs little from the same variety grown in Malta.

The fruit, as a rule, enters into its maturity in October, but the best varieties are not gathered until January, the season terminating in May. The trees are increased by layers, or slips. The first mode of propagation was derived from the Chinese, and has been much in use of late years. A branch of the diameter of four or five inches is chosen, in which is cut a circular incision. Around this, straw matting is wound in the shape of a funnel, and filled with beaten earth, from the 15th of May to the same day in June. Roots soon begin to push, and by the following winter it is provided with sufficient to support it when detached from the parent stem. The young plant thus obtained often bears fruit at the end of two or three years. Formerly grafting was employed, and is indeed still used; but it is somewhat out of fashion, on account of the relative slowness with which it comes into bearing. It is, however, asserted that the trees to which it has been here applied give the best fruit, and last longer than the others.

The sweet orange may also be reproduced by seed. This is a fact deserving the attention of botanists, who often consider the sweet fruit as a variety derived from the wild or bitter one. If this were so, when a pip of the former was sown it would, according to the general law of nature, bear a seedling of the primitive type. In the Azores this does not occur. Though the plants have the leaves and appearance of the bitter orange, and do not attain the fine flavour of the parent plant, they are yet devoid of the bitter flavour. Perhaps after many successive sowings it would be possible to obtain a nearer resemblance to the earlier species; but experience at present does not confirm this probability, so that it may be admitted that the sweet variety springs from a separate species, only differing in the quality of its fruit.

The gathering in of the fruit is carried on rapidly, and without difficulty. Notwithstanding the constant emigration going on from the islands to North and South America, labour is very cheap. The oranges are gathered with care, and carried to the packing-shed by large companies of men, women, and children, who bear on their heads or shoulders heavy baskets loaded with the golden fruit, and run bare-footed to the dépôt. There each is separately wrapped in a dry maize-leaf, and put in the box. The shape of these boxes has been entirely changed of late years. Formerly they were very large, and held from seven to nine hundred of the common variety. Thin, flexible planks formed a convex covering, without any solidity, and containing in the lid almost as many oranges as in the box itself. Those who have seen cases unpacked will remember this curious arrangement, which was explained by saying that the air circulated more fully between these planks than in a box properly constructed, and that this was essential to the preservation of the fruit; but really the custom arose from the wish to escape the tax imposed upon all exports, which only prescribed the dimensions of the lower part of the case. The growers were faithful to the letter, if not to the spirit, of the law, by making the right size, and then surmounting it with an enormous cover. Thus formed, they could not be packed on board ship with any exactness, and the oranges were but too often crushed.

There is now a better understanding with the Custom-house authorities, and the large cases have finally disappeared. They are now rectangular boxes, about a yard in length, and hold only half what the former ones did. They are divided into three compartments by solid partitions, and surrounded by bands of chestnut-wood. The expenses of gathering, carrying to the town, storing, packing, embarking, and paying the dues, including the case and maize-leaves, only amount to the small sum of half-a-crown a case. As for the price of a box of oranges, that varies very considerably during the season, generally advancing much towards April and May, when it is double or triple. There is also a great difference between one year and another, the state of the season, speculation, and a number of other causes influencing the London market. Sometimes oranges, when gathered, are sold in the full season at St. Michael's at twenty shillings the thousand, packing and transport being at the cost of the buyer; other years they have been sold at seven-and-sixpence.

In 1840 the number of cases exported to England was only from sixty to eighty thousand; in 1850 it rose to a hundred and seventy-five thousand of the old cases; lately about six hundred thousand of the newly-sized cases are exported. Formerly sailing vessels alone were employed for the transport, but now about half are steamers. The charge for freight to London is between seven and eight shillings the case, which, it is hoped, will be lowered. Steamboats engaged in this service make eight voyages to England from the 15th of November to the end of April; each carries about five thousand cases. The application of this kind of navigation has been of immense service. The sea is so stormy during the winter on the shores of the Azores, that a sailing vessel only reached London with a large part of its cargo spoiled. During the last ten years at Ponta Delgada they have been working at a mole, within which the ships can shelter in bad weather; but it is only the steam-boats that can get out to sea during a south-west wind, which unfortunately is the prevailing one. Sailing vessels, when laden, have been obliged to wait whole weeks, to the great detriment of their cargo, before a more temperate sky permitted of their departure. Before the mole was constructed, many sad shipwrecks occurred. Whilst the vessel was loading, the captain watched the signs of a change in the weather with the utmost anxiety, often interrupting the work, and giving the signal for flight, for fear of being dashed on the reefs round the coast. Such events are scarcely thought of now; and the contingencies being so few in the trade, the expenses can be much more surely estimated.

Under a warm, damp climate like that of the Azores, it must be expected that various parasitic maladies, of an animal or vegetable kind, will develop themselves on the trees from time to time. The constant communication of St. Michael and Fayal with all parts of the world facilitates their introduction. Thus during the last forty years the trees have been devastated by particular maladies. In 1834 the bark was evidently decaying; the holes, which were chiefly at the lower part of the trunk, permitted the escape of a gummy liquid that was compared to tears, for which reason the name of "lagrima" was given to the disease. Soon after the bark fell off; the wood, left bare, decayed; the root soon showed bad symptoms, and the tree perished. During this period it was remarked that the crop of oranges was larger than usual, but the quality was poor.

The unfortunate owners tried every means to stop the advance. Large transverse incisions were cut in the trunks, to admit of the escape of the unhealthy sap; the worst were dug up and burnt; others had the roots laid bare, in the hope that contact with the air would renew their vitality. Noble and mutilated trees were thus lying on the ground, where their vigour was still so great as to bear fruit, until the young plants in their vicinity grew up to take their place. In 1840 the disease became at its height in St. Michael's. Whole plantations were annihilated; others partially destroyed; and it was calculated that a quarter of the orange-trees in the island were cut down. About two years after it decreased; and now, though it has not wholly disappeared, it has ceased to be feared.

When, however, this plague had departed, a new enemy appeared. A kind of beetle, originally from Brazil, was found on the trees of Fayal, and soon multiplied immensely, until it covered the whole of the group of islands. When the gall-nuts of the insect developed, the plants died, the leaves grew yellow, the fruit could not ripen. At a time when the destruction of all the plantation was feared, the anxiety ceased suddenly; for it was found that the beetle, accustomed to the warm regions of Brazil, could not bear the climate of the Azores; and it has entirely disappeared.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SIXTH. THE DAME'S WHIM.

THAT time when she became so quiet, Teenie had devised a scheme by which she might yet help Dalmahoy and Walter. The hope was very faint—the execution of the scheme demanded the sacrifice of every remnant of pride which still lingered in her breast. But her nervous excitement had attained such a pitch, that she seemed to have strength for the most desperate adventure.

Drysdale, who had much liking for her, readily agreed to stay behind the Laird, and to drive her to Craighburn. Arrived at the door, she found it open. Pate was lying on the mat, and saluted her with a kindly wag of his tail. There was no one about, but there were sounds of laughing voices in the kitchen regions. Teenie marched straight in and up the stairs to the door of Dame Wishart's room. She paused an instant. What was she going to say or do? Impulse had carried her thus far; on the road, eagerness to be at the place, and fear of her own resolution failing, rendered her incapable of forming any plan of action. The dame had inspired her with a certain awe, and, if she allowed herself to think about it, she dreaded the possibility of being frightened away without accomplishing her purpose.

With feverish haste she turned the handle of the door, and so committed herself beyond the possibility of retiring.

On the instant she seemed to become unnaturally cold and calm; now that there was no retreat, fear was banished. Her eyes and brain became clear;

she saw everything, understood everything, and yet she felt as if her soul were standing aside, watching her body going through the scene which followed.

Grace was sitting near the window, sewing; Dame Wishart sat in her big chair, leaning back on the soft cushions, apparently sleeping. Grace turned at the opening of the door, gave a little start of surprise at seeing Teenie, and, finger on lips as if to beg silence, advanced quickly. She embraced her affectionately.

"Come down-stairs," she whispered, "where we can speak without disturbing my mother."

"I came to beg of you," said Teenie in a low voice.

"What?"

"To let me speak to your mother, alone. It is for Walter's sake, and the Laird's."

Grace looked at her, and divined her intention; but she did not like the excited brightness of her eyes.

"Go in," she said; "I'll help you if I can."

She passed out, closing the door gently after her.

Teenie stepped forward, and stood beside the big chair. The dame's head was thrown back—the eyes still remained closed. The large features, wrinkled and sallow, were like those of a strong man whom the hand of Death has touched. A hard unyielding face, and yet now in its repose there were lines of suffering scored upon it which commanded sympathy, if not affection.

Strange caprice—the face reminded her of her father's; all that the dame had done on account of Grace, he would have done on her account. Impulsively she stooped and kissed the withered lips.

"Aye, aye, Grace—you thought I was sleeping, my doo, but you're mistaken; I've been watching you," muttered the dame.

She slowly opened her eyes upon the stranger; she glanced at the seat her daughter had just vacated, then at Teenie.

"Who are you?"

the visitor with a frowning brow, and the thin lips tightly drawn. There was a kind of sarcastic indifference in her tone.

"Aye, lass, you've a glib tongue in your head—who put you up to it?"

"To what?"

"To come here—who sent you?"

"No one."

"My certes, then you're not blate to come to me without leave asked. You are no friend of mine."

"TEENIE OBEYED"

Teenie was calm and resolute as the dame herself now.

"I used to be called Teenie Thorston; Burnett is my name now."

Dame Wishart stared at her for a minute in silence; then, impatiently—

"What do you want?"

"Your help—money."

"What for?"

"Dalmahoy."

Surprised as she was by this singular attack, and puzzled as she was by the unaccountable absence of Grace, the dame, having somewhat of the Laird's sense of humour, was amused by the sharpness and directness of the replies. But she still regarded

"I know that," she said simply, and her heart seemed to swell with a sob which she had difficulty in suppressing; the effort threatened to upset all her resolution.

Harsh and stern to her as Dame Wishart was, Teenie's heart was yearning so for a kind word, a kind look, that she could have loved the old lady tenderly if she would have given her leave.

"Then what right have you to come to me with such demands?"

The dame reached out her hand to touch the bell which stood on a little table by her side.

"I have no right," she said, and her voice was very pathetic in its submission; "only I wanted to speak to you, because there is nobody to save us but you. You have satisfied the Laird and Walter that there is no help to be got from you—they would be angry if they knew what I was doing, but I do it because you have not satisfied me.”

“Why not, since the others know me well enough to take my word?”

“Because I won’t believe that your heart is dead.”

The dame started, withdrew her hand from the bell, and allowed the arm to rest on the table.

“The heart may be quick enough, and yet seem cold when it is doing justice. What else?”

“Because you have a daughter who is good, brave, and noble—who has sacrificed her life to you—I cannot believe that you are ready to make her ashamed of your memory.”

The dame looked at her sharply, lips trembling a little. Then—

“You are a bold hussy—what do you mean?”

“I mean that in refusing to save your brother from ruin you bring misery on us all, and Grace will share it—she will feel it worse than any of us, for she will feel that you, her mother, have doomed her to a life of shame and regret.”

“What shame or regret can there be to her?”

“The shame of thinking that you, because you could not force a man to marry her, revenged yourself upon those who were blameless in order to reach him.”

“The cold stern eyes were fixed on her face; hard and pitiless sounded the voice.

“Did you come here to preach—to me?”

“No; to beg.”

But with these words all Teenie’s courage evaporated; the woman seemed so immovable, cold and hard as a rock; she seemed to have vexed her rather than persuaded her—seemed to have rendered her more resolute than ever not to give the needed assistance. Teenie made another effort to control herself, to remain calm and firm; but her body swayed to and fro, she seemed to stagger and then she dropped down at the dame’s feet.

“Ah, madam, I cannot speak right—I am like a child. I spoke just now thinking to frighten you, and trying to hide from you the pain that I am suffering. But what I said is true, although I cannot hide my pain. I wanted to persuade you to act for their sakes as if I had no share in their joy or sorrow; and now I can only cry to you—think of them, and forget me.”

Teenie’s piteous appeal did not appear to have more effect than her bold argument. The dame remained silent, looking at her, and yet the eyes seemed to be seeking something beyond the kneeling figure. There had been things said which had already suggested themselves to her mind, and stirred disagreeable sensations. She could be unforgiving to everybody except Grace. On her account she was ready to do much that was opposed to her own humour.

Imprisoned for many years in this room by physical ailment—although comforted by the happy hallucination that the disablement was only temporary, and that she would soon be up and doing with all the brisk activity of early days, and resolutely shutting her eyes to the lapse of time until she became really insensible to it—the dame’s sympathies had become narrow as her life. She saw nothing to care for, felt there was nothing worth caring for, beyond Grace, her constant companion and nurse.

Yet she had quick eyes and keen appreciation for all that affected her daughter. She knew of her love for Walter, and the whole of the solitary life became concentrated upon that one scheme of the marriage, and the union of Craighburn and Dalmahoy. Never a shade of doubt as to the realisation of the plan occurred to her, until the revelation came that it was not to be. Then the revulsion to disappointment made her hard and relentless. Having had only one thought directing and sustaining her narrow life, she was too old to learn submission, to condone faults and to forgive, when the fact became known to her.

But she was shrewd and practical in most things; her agent and grieve found that, when they came to discuss business with her. There was not a grain of romance in her nature; therefore Walter’s marriage to Teenie would have appeared to her a piece of unpardonable folly, even had there been no question about Grace; but when Grace was involved, his conduct became in her eyes criminal, and meriting the severest punishment. She knew nothing of sentiment, but she was full of devotion to her daughter. For her sake she would do what neither pity nor a desire for her own comfort could tempt her to do.

So, the natural shrewdness and the love for Grace moved her now. She spoke abruptly—“Get up, and take a chair, wise-like.”

Teenie obeyed silently, her heart quite still, under the impression that she had failed as utterly in this mission as she had done in her attempt to run away.

“That’s better,” continued the dame, adding sharply, and as if it were a subject of personal offence, “but you’re not looking well—what’s ag? For heaven’s sake, don’t faint—I hate people who faint. There’s no use in it, except with a man, maybe. There’s a smelling-bottle yonder on the table: take it; smell it—get better, and listen to me.”

Teenie was obedient, but she did not get better, and she was very weary. Dame Wishart was, pleased by this ready compliance with her directions.

“That’s better; you’re not such a gowk as I thought you were. Now let us see if we can have a sensible chat. At first I was going to ring the bell and get you taken away ; but you don't seem to have much nonsense about you, and so I'll speak to you."

"Thank you," said Teenie quite indifferently, for she was now hopeless.

If she had been scheming to propitiate the eccentric old lady, she could not have done better. The dame was always suspicious of any one who made a fraise with her.

"Good ; now hearken to me. I don't like you—do you know what for?"

"Yes—Walter Burnett married me."

"Just that. Well, my brother Dalmahoy and Walter came to me, both begging for help, and I refused them. Then you come, as if there were any chance of your succeeding when they failed. What made you think of it?"

"God knows ; I came without thinking, or I would have known that the journey was useless. You never can guess the despair I felt before I could come to you. The thought stirred me that you might not be so very hard, and I came. I'm sorry. I'll go now."

She got up to leave.

"Sit down," commanded the dame, and she obeyed mechanically. "I said we were to have a chat, and mean it."

The dame was sitting up, erect in her chair, her features fixed in an emotionless gaze which seemed to exert the power of mesmerism over Teenie. The latter made an effort, and spoke—

"What have you to say ?—you refuse my prayer. Very well ; we are done, and I can go."

"No, I have not refused, and I want you to tell me what I am to do."

"Me !"

"Yes, you."

"In what way?" she cried with new hope ; and then doubtingly : "Ah, madam ! don't make me suffer more than you can help ; it cannot do you any good, and it may be death to me."

"I am meaning you no harm ; but you shall decide between us. I'll tell you everything. Suppose your father had lived for—there's no saying how many years—in the notion that Wattie was to marry you. Suppose he toils, and plans, and thinks, and arranges, all his life, so that it may serve you and Wattie when you are married. Suppose there has been nothing in the world for him but this marriage—that his very life hangs on it, and that some fine day Wattie comes to him and says, 'I've married somebody else, but I want you to help me'—what would the skipper say? Would he say, 'I'm sorry for you ; there would have been no need to ask me for help if you had kept your bargain with me ; but I'll help you all the same as if you had not upset the whole plan of my life?'—would he say that?"

Teenie felt her heart beat quickly, then stop, and begin again more violently than ever. There was a brief struggle with herself, for she saw clearly what the dame meant, and she would have liked to answer falsely ; but she could not.

"No, he would have been angry—he would have refused his help," she cried, with a sensation as if her heart and brain were bursting with the wild throbs which agitated them. But she had spoken truth, and although it involved her own despair, she experienced a faint sense of relief.

"Very well," said the dame coldly, "you have told me what I ought to do."

There was a curious silence in the room—silence, and yet the breathing of the two women was distinctly audible.

Teenie bowed her head as if in resignation, and rose to leave the room.

"You see it's not my fault—you cannot blame me," cried the dame.

"No, it is not your fault—there is nobody to blame, but me."

With what a weary hopeless voice she said that, and how heavy seemed to be the weight of that blame which she took so bravely on her own shoulders !

She was at the door—paused, turned back to Dame Wishart, who sat watching her curiously. The girl was better than she thought ! But when Teenie returned, she hastily seized the smelling-salts as if to be prepared for a scene : hysterics—or a faint, which was equally abhorrent to her.

But Teenie was very quiet.

"I want to shake hands with you, Mistress Wishart, and to say good-bye. We are not likely to meet in this world again, and I wish to part friends. Try not to think very hard about me : I had doubts, but I could not know that I was to be the cause of all this trouble."

"And what will you think about me ?—that I'm a cruel old witch that has neither heart nor gumption, and that ought to be burnt ? Is not that it?"

"No, I will try only to remember that you are the mother of Grace."

The dame searched her face suspiciously, as if to detect any trace of deception or cajolery. But she discovered none, and so, briskly she said—

"You have told me what I ought to do : now I'll tell you what I'm going to do—I'll find the siller for Dalmahoy, so you need not be downcast on that score."

"What !"

"I'll find the siller for Dalmahoy. Grace wants it, and so I agree, now that I've had a chat with you. You're not half so bad as I thought you. Don't say a word, but go and tell them, and if one of them comes to thank me I'll refuse to do it. It's Grace who wants it done—it's Grace's doing. I would have seen you all far enough before I would have done it. But she's a fool, and I'm half-minded to set you down as another. Come and see me again this day six months. Go."

Teenie stood dazed and dumb; she was like the condemned one who obtains pardon at the foot of the scaffold: she could neither understand nor realise the position at first; and during the whole of the dame's eccentric address—delivered with great volubility—she scarcely moved.

The revulsion of feeling from despair to joy was too sudden, and the first thing she did was to give a big hysterical sob, to seize Dame Wishart's hand and cover it with warm kisses of gratitude.

This the dame resented fiercely.

"I hate hysterics, and the whole cleckan of women's ways," she cried, and rang her bell violently.

Grace appeared.

"Take this gowk away, or she'll smother me," was the dame's command.

"God bless you!" gasped Teenie.

"You have consented at last!" exclaimed Grace, her pale beautiful face illumined as if by sun-light. She had never doubted that her mother would consent.

"Away with her, or I'll take back my word."
